TEL AVIV — For as long as Ariel Rejwan can remember, she has loved Israel. "I've always felt a connection here – with the people, the spontaneity, the energy, the spirituality.

"Living in Israel is something I've always wanted to do," says the 40-year-old water scientist, who made aliyah in 2008 from Toronto.

Her personal version of the Zionist dream was to help solve Israel's water problems. Before making aliyah, Rejwan worked for 20 years all across Canada as a limnologist. Limnology deals with the physical, chemical and biological properties and features of fresh waters.

"I've enjoyed living and working in all the places I have been in, in Canada," she says. "But I always felt like a stranger. I never felt that any of those places were home. Israel feels like home."

Now that she is home, she has focused on changing career paths and working in the field of water management.

"My dream is to help Israel with its water management challenges in a multi-dimensional way," says Rejwan, explaining that Israel's water problems must be met not only on the scientific playing field but also on national, political, social and cultural levels.

"I never got involved with sociopolitical issues in Canada, since in Canada the water issues are not a major obstacle to survival and comfort," says Rejwan, "but in [Israel] they are."

She has spent the last several months reaching out to governmental and non-governmental agencies in Israel that tackle water issues from a national perspective, including the Water Authority, Ministry of the Environment and the Peres Center for Peace. She has also taken on several contracts consulting for biotechnology companies.

"It's not exactly what I want to be doing," admits Rejwan, referring to the latter. "But the major player in this country is water technology, and startup companies are such a prominent part of the country's economy."

She counts this small setback among many that she has faced since arriving in Israel.

"When I first arrived, I had so much trouble finding work that one day I had no plan, I just left my apartment… walked straight to the beach and started randomly asking people if they needed help," recalls Rejwan.

Soon after, she discovered Gvahim, an organization dedicated to helping new immigrants find employment in Israel. At the end of the organization's nine-week workshop, Rejwan had gained a greater understanding of the Israeli job market.

"They were very helpful," she says. "All the people at Gvahim were also very compassionate. It was such a relief to know them."

However, Rejwan still wasn't having luck finding work. Just as she was about to take a job as a lifeguard, her first biotech firm contract came through.

She has faced numerous other challenges since making aliyah, such as learning Hebrew. "My career focus meant I had to put Hebrew on the back burner," she says. "It's a real shame, because not knowing the language is a barrier to so much… Learning the language makes you feel Israeli much more quickly."

Ariel Rejwan, a water scientist, hopes to help Israel with its water management challenges.

In addition to the language barrier, she also discovered a significant cultural barrier. "Although I feel a great sense of belonging in Israel in general, I don't yet have a feeling of social comfort," she says. "It's difficult to meet people I really connect with."

This, Rejwan says, has to do with living in Tel Aviv, where popular culture is centred around fashion, fine dining, entertainment and other elements of big-city life, as opposed to her preferred nature-centred Canadian culture.

"I like hiking and the great outdoors, so being in Tel Aviv has been quite an adjustment for me," she says. "I do, however, have a complete love affair with the sea. I go there at least a few times a week to swim, run, walk."

When the going gets tough, Rejwan thinks of her family. Her parents, both Iraqi Jews, fled for Israel. Her mother's family left Iraq at the turn of the century for India, then China, where Rejwan's mother was born and raised until she was 19, when her family moved to Israel. Rejwan's parents met and married in Israel and immigrated to Canada in 1968. Rejwan was born in Toronto in 1969.

"Whenever I hit a rough patch here, I think of the time my father must have had when he made aliyah," says Rejwan. "It's a good thing to remember. It puts everything into perspective."

In a lot of ways, she considers her aliyah a continuation of her parents' journey.

"It's kind of weird, but I am picking up where they left off in a way," she says. "No matter what challenges I encounter, I wouldn't trade the decision to come here for the world. My only regret is not having moved here 10 [or] 15 years ago."

TanenbaumCHAT Cougars celebrate their victory in the York Region Athletic Association baseball program.

Cougars are king

The Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto Kimel Centre boys baseball team completed an undefeated post-season by defeating Alexander Mackenzie High School 14-7 to win the York Region Athletic Association (YRAA) championship.

The Cougars jumped out to an early lead with four runs in the first inning and three more in the second. Jordan Rostowsky, David Garbuz and Justin Heller had key RBIs.

Alexander Mackenzie closed the gap and tied the game in the fourth inning. The game remained tied at 7-7 heading into the eighth inning when the Cougars exploded for seven runs, finished off by an Eli Sherman double.

Zach Danilewitz pitched four strong innings and picked up the win in relief. He struck out the final batter to clinch the championship for the team.

Ripken headlines annual sports dinner in Winnipeg

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Following in the footsteps of baseball legends Mickey Mantle, Pete Rose, Johnny Bench, Steve Stone and manager Sparky Anderson, Cal Ripken Jr. headlined the most recent edition of Winnipeg's annual "Y" Sports Dinner.

The famed iron-man played 2,632 consecutive games over 21 years. During this time, he whacked 431 homers, banged out 3,184 hits, made 19 straight all-star appearances, earned two MVP awards and was elected to the Baseball Hall of Fame.

Ripken limited his time onstage to a presentation that centred around his book, Get in the Game, which he co-authored with Donald T. Phillips.

Ripken appeared to welcome applause by the 1,100 dinner guests assembled at the Rose and Max Rady Jewish Community Centre. His presentation resembled a seminar that might be attended by a group of teachers desperately searching for inspiration.

With remote in hand, Ripken outlined the contents of his book, in which he explained what it took for him to achieve his iron-man status.

During his presentation, he listed his eight steps to success: the right approach and attitude, the will to succeed, passion, competitiveness, consistency and ability to adjust to change, conviction in what you believe, physical and mental strength and proper life management skills, especially with regard to family.

Ripken noted that balance in his own life remains important. The nature of his career necessitated being a good husband and father while being forced to sometimes miss important life events when he was on the road or at spring training.

"Your personal life is a work in progress every day," he said.

Another significant issue the former Oriole had to deal with was almost daily interviews by journalists who would sometimes paint a negative picture. In the latter part of his career, he said, some of them took umbrage with his never taking a day off as he approached eclipsing Lou Gehrig's consecutive-games streak, which some believed was hurting his team.

"You develop techniques to handle them," he said of this coverage.

In response to queries from the audience, he talked about how at age 19 and in AAA ball at the time, he once played in a 32-inning game. He disagreed with baseball commissioner Bud Selig's decision not to reverse umpire Jim Joyce's botched first-base call, thereby costing Tigers' pitcher Armando Galarraga a rare perfect game. Still, he admired both player and ump for their class in a difficult circumstance. And as for the reinstatement of Pete Rose and his chances of entry into the Baseball Hall of Fame, Ripken laughingly responded: "I won't go there."

The event also included fundraising and sports awards such as the Jewish Athlete of the Year awards, which were given to Lauren Sera, starting goalie with the University of North Dakota Sioux women's soccer team, and Daniel Fainman, standout forward with the St. Paul's Crusaders hockey team, and recognition to former Winnipegger Nathan Jacobson, a longtime supporter of the Jewish community centre.

Ripken was the 13th pro-baseball player to be summoned to the plate as main speaker since 1973, when the annual fundraiser for the YMHA began. Recent headliners included Indianapolis Colts' quarterback Peyton Manning and sports broadcaster Chris Berman.

Tricks can help seniors 'exercise' their memory

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Hours after Dr. Kelly Murphy finished speaking at a recent seminar sponsored by the Association of Jewish Seniors, chances are everyone remembered her name.

In her talk on maximizing memory, Murphy taught participants about space repetition. "Repeat a name when you hear it, and a short while later repeat it again. If you do that a few times, you are exercising your memory. It is a good technique for remembering a phone number or address."

Dr. Kelly Murphy

Murphy is a clinical neuropsychologist in the cognitive and behavioural health program at Baycrest, an assistant professor of psychology at the University of Toronto and an adjunct faculty member in graduate studies (psychology) at York University. She runs a clinical service specializing in the early detection and treatment of memory decline in older adults with mild cognitive impairment who are at risk of developing future dementia.

Also speaking at the seminar was Gerry Phillips, MPP for Scarborough-Agincourt and minister responsible for seniors.

Murphy told the group of almost 150 people that memory has three components – coding, storage and retrieval, "and a breakdown anywhere affects memory.

"The ability to code or digest information changes a little bit as we age, but the ability to store information does not. What gets in, stays in. We're not as good, however, at retrieval or getting the information out of our memory."

Strategies such a space repetition are effective at getting information into our long-term memory, she said. "Another strategy to remember names is to think about whether the name has an obvious meaning, or to associate it with someone else you know. The more meaningful you make something, the more you will remember."

Even people in their 30s can't retrieve memory as readily as they could in their 20s, she said. "It is a subtle process, though. There needs to be quite a difference before we notice."

In attempting to improve our memory, she said that it's "important to remember that whatever is good for our body is good for our brain. [Good life choices] seem to delay the onset of dementia, and it's never too late to try and change things up a bit."

Age is the biggest risk factor in cognitive decline, she said, but by taking good care of ourselves, we can age well and sustain independence."

Phillips, 69, said that part of his job is to put a positive light on Ontario seniors. "Lots of people are anxious to contribute. We have to provide opportunity to the growing number of seniors who want to work for pay or volunteer, and make sure our communities are age friendly."

About Life

Dear Ella,

My friend, Cindy, is a lovely woman, but she has no sense when it comes to money. Cindy is the type of gal who has to have everything – the latest trendy outfit, pair of shoes, car. She has her nails done every week and is forever going to her masseuse. The problem is that she has no money! She lives off some money her parents left her, but that will soon be gone. She has no savings, no RRSPs, no real estate. Her car is leased, her condo is rented and her credit cards are maxed out.

She has come to me for a loan from time to time, but I've always managed to weasel out of giving it to her. I feel like I'm standing by and watching my friend self-destruct. At this rate, she's going to end up homeless. How do I get through to her?

Lousy Money Manager

Dear Lousy Money Manager

Cindy may be spending to fill a void. This excessive spending behaviour is no different than any other addiction.

Being a close friend, you have to care enough to actually get involved. You must call her out on what you see and not let her make excuses for her actions. Are you prepared to take her by the hand and lead her through the steps she will have to go through? If you are, here are some practical measures to help Cindy.

For starters, you need to get her to admit she's in trouble. This will be the hardest part. Let her know what you've noticed and try to scare her into reality. Be honest and tell her why you won't lend her money. If she's willing to disclose her financial situation, you can show her on paper how she's setting herself up for disaster.

If you can get through this first step, you can move on to a positive solution. Help Cindy come up with a budget. Write down every expense she has and every bit of money she has to work with. See if she's willing to be accountable for her spending. This is a huge undertaking, and you need to decide if you can make this commitment. You might want to suggest getting a professional involved.

Don't be surprised if Cindy isn't willing to listen, but feel good knowing that at least you've planted the seed of concern. Let her know you will be there when she comes to terms with the fact that she needs help.

A fast track to happiness

Life Coach Corner

By JUDY SIBLIN-LIBRACH

I often talk about following your joy and finding ways to reconnect with your happiest self. I love the book Be Happy by Robert Holden because it is chock-full of wonderful ideas to train yourself to live a happier life starting right now.

One of the jewels in the book is Holden's exercise called the "Well-Being Pledge, which is an invitation to let your well-being flourish and prosper. It harnesses all of your good intentions in making a personal investment in yourself that will pay great dividends in optimal health and vitality." Holden suggests giving yourself eight weeks to "recommit to following your joy." The Well-Being Pledge is not about "something you should, must or ought to do. It is about the joy of doing it and the joy you experience because you have done it. It is all about self-care and self-love."

Holden recommends that your goal is to make five positive commitments to your personal well-being, including your physical, emotional, mental and spiritual well-being.

An extra commitment is to your "blind spot." Holden suggests you can diagnose your own blind spot. However he recommends that you ask your partner, a friend, or your children to give you their assessment.

Another happiness tool that can't be overlooked is finding gratitude. In the chapter called One Hundred Gratitudes, Holden suggests thinking about what gratitude really means and also the potential power of gratitude. Having the intention to be grateful at the beginning of the day also works wonders.

So actually saying, "I intend to appreciate and give thanks for today, no matter what happens," begins your day on such a positive note, you can't go wrong.

In the exercise One Hundred Gratitudes, you are invited to reflect on your life and write down 100 entries of things you are grateful for. Holden suggests you "compile a list of 100 experiences, relationships, places, people, books, songs, pieces of arts, events, adventures and other 'moments' that you are truly grateful for. [This list of] One Hundred Gratitudes is like a thank you letter to God."

But probably one of my favourite parts of the book is the chapter on the joy of forgiveness. Holden says, "Some people demonstrate a consistent capacity to be very happy. What is clear is that these people don't necessarily enjoy better circumstances than you, but they do exhibit certain happiness traits that help them to be happy

"For me, the one standout happiness trait is forgiveness. Over and over again, I find that people who are good at happiness are also good at forgiveness. For example, if you are hurt, you choose personal happiness over a lesser goal like revenge or righteousness.

"Here is the question: do you want to be happy or right? The more you hold on to a grievance, the less good you feel about yourself. Through forgiveness, you can be happy again. Forgiveness is restoration. It returns you to yourself."

Happiness challenges you to make peace with yourself, and the happiest people are less caught up in the their own personal stories than they are in giving to others. Happiness is also about being authentic and true. When you are at peace and when you are a loving presence in the world, you will be on "a genuine fast track to happiness."

As Holden says, "When you wish happiness for another, you wish happiness for all, and you wish it for yourself."

A precious few seconds

When I blessed the Queen

By RABBI REUVEN P. BULKA

When just a few weeks ago I received a kind invitation from Prime Minister Stephen Harper and his wife, Laureen, to attend a dinner to celebrate the 2010 Royal Tour of Canada of Queen Elizabeth II and the Duke of Edinburgh, I was more than delighted. I was thrilled. The thrill was rooted in appreciative nostalgia. Both my parents enjoyed the safe haven of England during World War II. I was born in that safe haven.

So, my gratitude to England is enormous, and the opportunity to see and possibly even greet the Queen is, for me, an event of the goose-pimple variety. The lead-up to the event was relatively uneventful, until the day itself, when just as we were getting ready for the dinner, the power went out in the entire area surrounding the Fairmont Royal York Hotel in Toronto, where the dinner was scheduled to be held.

We made our way via stairs rather than elevator to the Canadian room for dinner, and everyone was in good spirits, sans air conditioning and in the midst of a pronounced heat wave. I was in the midst of a discussion with Toronto Archbishop Thomas Collins when the lights came back on. We both decided that we would not advertise this as an ecumenical miracle.

The person in charge of the evening let us know that everyone would have a chance to meet and greet the Queen. However, based on the number of people in attendance, and considering how quickly he said this part of the evening should take, I calculated that everyone would have 3-1/2 seconds with Her Majesty. Talk about talking fast!

Man charged for advocating genocide

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) last week announced that former York University student Salman Hossain has been charged with promoting hatred against Jews and advocating genocide.

It's believed to be the first time anyone has been charged with promoting genocide under Section 318.1 of the Criminal Code.

"This is certainly a benchmark case that would put this individual before the courts," OPP Commissioner Julian Fantino said at a news conference announcing the charges.

Hossain, who resided in Mississauga but is now living outside the country, is subject to detention if he returns to Canada, said Fantino.

"We are doing everything in our power to bring him to justice," said OPP deputy commissioner Vince Hawkes, provincial commander of investigations and organized crime. "There is no place in society for this reprehensible behaviour."

Hossain, 25, first came to the attention of police three years ago over postings to a website that attacked Jews. Following an investigation, the OPP recommended to Ontario Attorney General Chris Bentley that Hossain be prosecuted. Bentley withheld his consent for prosecution, saying Hossain could potentially rehabilitate himself.

Nevertheless, Hossain continued to post wild Jewish conspiracy theories on his website, "filthyjewishterrorists.com," and openly called for the mass murder of Jews and their supporters. Last spring, responding to complaints about Hossain's website, York University suspended him.

Hossain continued his wild anti-Semitic rants, even after he was charged. In a posting dated July 8, he responded to the charges by claiming there was a Jewish conspiracy against him and stating: "It has very little to do with calling for the revenge slaughter of the Jews and their allies.

'Bargain Harold' Dies

TORONTO — Harold Kamin, co-founder of defunct discount department store Bargain Harold's, died June 25 in Toronto at age 82. The Polish immigrant co-founded Bargain Harold's with Arthur Anisman in 1970 in Toronto, building it into a 52-store chain with $100 million in annual sales before selling it to Kmart in 1985 for $16 million (US). The chain went bankrupt in the early 1990s.

Lecture Cancelled

TORONTO.— A satellite video speech at an Islamic conference in Toronto by an Indian Muslim preacher who said that Jews are "our staunchest enemy" and "every Muslim should be a terrorist" was cancelled 15 minutes before he was scheduled to talk. Organizers gave no reason for the cancellation. Zakir Naik was to have spoken via video link July 3 at the Journey of Faith Islamic conference in Toronto, after his visa to Canada was revoked last month. A popular televangelist in India, he received a five-year visa while on a visit to Canada last year. In June, the 44-year-old physician was barred from Britain for his controversial views, which include the death penalty for gays and converts from Islam.

Historic Citations

WINNIPEG — Two prominent 20th-century Jews were designated national historic persons last week. Abraham Albert Heaps – an English-born activist, city councillor and MP from 1925 to 1940 who was also a founding member of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation – and the Polish-born Rabbi Israel Isaac Kahanovitch, who was Winnipeg's chief rabbi from his arrival in 1906 to his death in 1945, were honoured by Environment Minister Jim Prentice, who oversees the Historic Sites and Monuments Board, which advises him on such historic designations.

Cotler Testifies

JERUSALEM — After testifying before the Israeli Supreme Court for the 10th time on Ethiopian Jews' immigration to Israel, Canadian Liberal MP Irwin Cotler praised the court last week for ruling that Israel has four months to finish evaluating 7,000 applications by Ethiopian Jews waiting to come to Israel. Cotler, a renowned human rights lawyer, said the court noted that some applicants have waited more than 10 years to join family in Israel and that less than one-third of applications have been processed.

Rubashkin Appeals

DES MOINES — Lawyers for kosher meat-packing executive Sholom Rubashkin filed an appeal of his conviction on federal financial fraud charges and his long jail sentence. Rubashkin was convicted last November on 86 counts of fraud in connection with the Agriprocessors plant in Postville, Iowa. He was sentenced in June to 27 years in jail. That will be followed by five years of parole, and he'll also have to make restitution of $27 million (US) to several financial institutions. The Agriprocessors plant was the site of a federal immigration raid in May 2008 in which 389 illegal immigrants, including 31 children, were arrested.

FBI Widens Holocaust Claims Probe

NEW YORK — The FBI has widened its investigation into fraudulent Holocaust-era claims against the German government, the Jewish Week reported last week.

The FBI became involved when a probe was launched in December by the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, the paper reported. The Claims Conference processes Holocaust-era claims for survivors on behalf of the German government.

The fraud initially involved about 100 claims submitted primarily by Russians living in Brooklyn, N.Y., to the Claims Conference's Hardship Fund, which gives to Jews who fled the Nazis during the Holocaust and remained in Soviet-bloc countries after World War II, and therefore are ineligible for regular German reparations. The money for the fund comes from the German government and does not affect other survivors' claims to the Claims Conference, according to the article.

The probe has been broadened to include the Article 2 Fund, a pension program that may have been defrauded of $7 million (US) in the last 10 years, the Jewish Week reported. Individuals suspected of fraud in the fund have been notified and asked to return the money they received.

The fraud discovery also has held up the payment of many Hardship Fund claims as the investigation continues, the paper reported. Germany paid 7,000 Hardship Fund claims in 2008 and 18,000 last year.

Neturei Karta bring protest to Toronto

Claim Jewish graves desecrated in Ashkelon

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Neturei Karta set up protest in Toronto last week.

You can find them outside the White House, protesting the visit of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to Washington.

You can find them comforting wounded jihadis posing as humanitarians bringing aid to Gaza.

You can find them embracing the Iranian president who has called for the destruction of Israel.

But Yaen Vered didn't expect to find them – Neturei Karta activists – in front of his apartment building in North York, bullhorns at the ready, protesting the removal of allegedly Jewish remains at a construction site in Ashkelon.

Vered, Canadian representative of the Israel Antiquities Authority (IAA), was targeted because of the Neturei Karta belief that the IAA desecrated ancient Jewish graves. The human remains in question were discovered during construction of an emergency wing for the Barzilai Medical Center in Ashkelon.

Vered said the protesters have appeared twice at his apartment building on Yonge Street, between Sheppard and Finch avenues, and have promised to protest a third time at some point this week.

Although their numbers are small – five the first time, 10 the second – they're a nuisance and they've succeeded in frightening his wife. They've been asked to move along by shopkeepers and police, but he expects them to be back. They're likely getting instructions to protest, he said.

The demonstration at his Yonge Street apartment more or less coincided with a similar gathering of 2,000 haredim outside the White House during Netanyahu's recent visit. JTA reported that Rabbi David Niederman, a spokesperson for the Central Rabbinical Congress, said the protesters wanted to raise awareness of the alleged desecration of ancient graves in Ashkelon and Jaffa, to distinguish between Jews and Israel and to accuse Israel of suppressing protesters who disapprove of the excavations.

Vered's first inkling that trouble might be brewing came in late June, when he received a phone call from someone in the Bronx, N.Y., complaining about the treatment of the Ashkelon graves.

Summit matters

As gloomy and downcast as the images were after the Obama–Netanyahu meeting last March in Washington, the images after last week's meeting between the two leaders were positively lustrous and upbeat.

Writing about the meeting for JTA, Ron Kampeas observed that "the Israeli team emerged from the meetings reassured and even jovial."

From the editor's desk...

It was very clear from the outset that re-adjusting the public's image of "the relationship" between the two leaders was a key objective of the White House meeting, in addition, of course to holding substantive discussions on three key issues – the peace process, Iran and the Gaza flotilla fallout.

Both leaders made extra efforts to comment on "the relationship" at the post-meeting press conference and in various additional interviews with the press.

For example, after the meeting, President Barack Obama told the assembled media, "In terms of my relationship with Prime Minister [Benjamin] Netanyahu, I know the press, both in Israel and stateside, enjoys seeing if there's news there. But the fact of the matter is that I've trusted Prime Minister Netanyahu since I met him before I was elected president, and have said so both publicly and privately."

He made much the same point during an interview he gave to Channel Two television in Israel.

In an interview with CNN's Larry King, Netanyahu pressed the same point: "I think there's an underlying relationship there that people don't appreciate. We have our ups and downs. People focus on the downs, and the downs are exaggerated and sometimes distorted. But there [are] ups, and there's a basic bedrock of identification, common values between Israel and the United States. I think there is a solidity of ties between Israel and the United States that the president of the United States and the prime minister of Israel reflect in their meeting."

Of course, it serves the personal political interests of both men to demonstrate strong relations between them, and between the two countries. But more importantly than that, it serves the interests of the two countries to show the world, and especially the enemies of peace, that the bilateral relationship is strong.

While we do not know if the efforts related to the key substantive issues achieved their purpose, we can say for certain that the efforts related to repairing the public's image of a strained relationship did.

One of the aims of the leaders' meeting was to advance the Israeli-Palestinian peace process from its current indirect proximity talks to direct, face-to-face talks.

Netanyahu used the Larry King forum to "speak" to the Palestinian Authority (PA) leader: "President [Mahmoud] Abbas, meet me, and let's talk peace. We all have our grievances. We all have our, you know, our questions and things that we want answered. But the most important thing is to get together, sit down in a room and begin to negotiate peace. You cannot resolve a conflict, you cannot successfully complete a peace negotiation if you don't start it. And I say let's start it right now, today, tomorrow, in Jerusalem, in Ramallah or anywhere else... Let's get on with the business of talking peace and concluding the peace agreement."

In an interesting footnote to the Washington meeting, about the same time Netanyahu was speaking to King, President Abbas was in the home of the Palestinian ambassador to Jordan speaking with journalists about his approach to peace with Israel. Palestinian Media Watch has made available the text of what Abbas told the reporters. The following is the transcript from the July 6 issue of the official PA daily Al-Hayat Al-Jadida:

"We don't accept the statement [of Hamas]: a [Palestinian] state of resistance and refusal. What we hear from everyone is that the basis is negotiations, at a time that the entire world agrees about this, despite the absence of other options, we either have negotiations or no negotiations, what has put Israel in the corner.

"We are unable to confront Israel militarily, and this point was discussed at the Arab League Summit in March in Sirt (Libya). There I turned to the Arab States and I said: 'If you want war, and if all of you will fight Israel, we are in favour [my emphasis]. But the Palestinians will not fight alone, because they don't have the ability to do it.'"

This statement by Abbas is typical of the man's prevaricative, dissembling ways. He essentially said that coexistence and true peace with Israel are his second option. Indeed, they probably are.

I believe he was being truthful when he said that the only reason he is negotiating peace with Israel is because the Palestinians "don't have the ability" to fight Israel. Israel is correct to be wary.

FREEDOM MARCH FOR SCHALIT

The 12-day mass march in support of abducted Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit's release arrived in Jerusalem July 8. About 15,000 people arrived at the rally in Jerusalem at the end of the march, but not everyone agreed with paying the price demanded by Hamas of more than 1,000 Palestinian prisoners for Schalit's release. The man on the left holds up a poster that reads, "Today's children are tomorrow's kidnapped victims."

Volunteers load water bottles onto a truck to be distributed to the homeless. [Cara Stern photo]

Group brings homeless water as Toronto sizzles

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

Last week's heat wave had Torontonians facing temperatures that felt higher than 40 degrees Celsius. But not everyone was lucky enough to escape the heat.

That's why at its 11th annual distribution event last week, Project Water handed out about 210,000 bottles of water to agencies that will give them directly to the homeless.

"Your body can only live without water for three days," said Jody Steinhauer, president of the Bargain Group and co-founder of Project Water, which provides water to homeless people.

"You can be without food for three weeks, but without anything to drink, three days only."

This was the most successful launch yet, said Lorne Simon, Steinhauer's husband, who is also a co-founder of the project and chief of public relations at the Michael Communications PR Group.

The event couldn't have come at a better time, amid a week of extreme heat warnings that left homeless people at risk of dehydration. The water will be distributed in Southern Ontario as far east as Pickering and as far west as Hamilton, Steinhauer said.

Nestlé provided the water bottles and has been supporting the organization since 2006, donating more than 644,000 bottles in total.

Many volunteers carried the water to the agencies' trucks. Some of the participants came from organizations such as Home Depot and KPMG, but many were people in the community who simply wanted to help.

Project Water began at a meeting with Cathy Crowe, a Canadian "street nurse," from whom Steinhauer learned that more people die from dehydration during the summer than cold exposure during the winter.

"[My husband] Lorne and I said, 'That's crazy. This is the City of Toronto. We know lots of people. Let's just let people know and do something about it,'" Steinhauer said.

The couple had been working on Project Winter Survival, handing out sleeping bags and survival kits to the homeless. The season ended, but their appetite for helping did not.

"Once you get the momentum to get going, you want to keep going," said Simon.

The two have an 11-year-old daughter, Spencer, and a 6-year-old son, Dawson. Spencer was at Camp Kadimah in Nova Scotia and wasn't able to attend last week's event, but she helped during the planning stages.

Dawson was the event's youngest volunteer, having taken a day off camp to help the homeless people he sees on his way to camp each day.

"[I wanted] to help all the people out there survive so they don't die, and to make them happy," he said.

The Salvation Army is one organization that receives water from Project Water. It distributes the bottles to the homeless using a daily community response van, said spokesperson Dan Millar.

Cheyne Collins was one volunteer who helped initiate Home Depot's involvement. He discovered the project through his work with Crime Stoppers, which Simon chairs. As an assistant Home Depot store manager, he helped bring in forklifts to transport the bottles.

"There's a lot of negative impact that this hot weather has on [the homeless] community," he said, "so we've got to make sure to keep them hydrated and keep them safe."

Great Britain becoming less great

A report out of Britain last week provides a shiveringly ominous insight of the extent to which anti-Israel animus has invaded and is now poisoning its body politic, seeping and hissing out of even the higher, watchdog institutions of the country. British journalist and social commentator Robin Shepherd called it an "extraordinary moment in modern British legal history."

Seven men broke into and damaged the building and the equipment of a weapons factory in Brighton, causing about $275,000 (US) in damage. The men were apprehended, charged with causing criminal damage and tried. At their trial, they admitted the offences, but pleaded that they had a "lawful excuse" for what they did: they believed the company was manufacturing and selling military equipment to Israel for use in the West Bank and Gaza. The offences were committed last year during the period of time of Israel's fighting with Hamas in Gaza, and the men could not contain their rage at Israel.

As it turned out, the angry seven were wrong. According to JTA, the plant's managing director told the court that the company did not supply generalized military weaponry to Israel. Rather, it made parts for the F-16 airplanes. No matter.

The defence counsel seized the moment that hung in the court's clouded air like low-hanging, ripe fruit and argued that the men had committed their crimes to prevent what they said was the more serious crime of the "war crimes" being committed by Israel against Gaza. The jury accepted the defence counsel's plea.

Apparently, so may have the judge. In his charge to the jury, Judge George Bathurst-Norman reportedly told them, "You may well think that hell on earth would not be an understatement of what the Gazans suffered in that time."

One of the witnesses on behalf of the accused, Caroline Lucas, the MP for Brighton Pavilion, justified the men's behaviour on the basis that "all democratic paths had been exhausted before the activists embarked on their action" (our emphasis).

After the acquittal, defence counsel told the media that the verdict "sends a clear indication that sometimes direct action is the only option when all other avenues have failed." Of course, "direct action" was a euphemism for "breaking the law," "violating someone else's private property" or "committing a crime."As Shepherd sorrowfully noted in his commentary last week, "Bigotry against the Jewish state is now so entrenched in contemporary British society that juries have begun to acquit criminals merely if they can show that they acted against Israeli interests. No other defence is necessary."

Thus, we see the wretched signs of the inevitable outcome of the constant targeting of Israel for special opprobrium. Those who are obsessed with aiming their hatred at weakening Israel wind up also weakening their own societies. For such is the nature of hatred. It blows back. Great Britain, alas, is becoming less great.

25 years ago in The CJN

Ethiopian Jews at absorption centres across Israel protested angrily against the insistence by Israel's Chief Rabbinate that they undergo formal conversion ceremonies, saying that it constituted a grave insult to their authenticity as Jews and that they were the first immigrant group to be treated this way.

Complaints about home-based shuls

City of Vaughan councillor Alan Shefman estimates that in the last year, he has had "25 to 30 complaints about home-based congregations" in Thornhill, but he also suggests there are merely a handful of these small shuls in the community ("Vaughan takes a look at home-based shuls," July 1).

Since city councillors are constantly inundated with stories of neighbourhood strife, is this really of such concern that Vaughan council needs to enact new bylaws to address the issue? Perhaps Shefman should provide more details to the community about the types of complaints received and how truly widespread they are.

It is unfathomable that attendees of these Orthodox congregations would drive on Shabbat, and the number of cars for evening prayers and study sessions is comparable to friends getting together to watch sporting events or play cards, both of which result in numerous cars parked on neighbourhood roads. I would suggest that the inconvenience of a community-building Torah dedication ceremony that "disrupted an entire neighbourhood" pales in comparison to many parties that require police intervention.

Bylaws and regulations already exist to address issues pertaining to traffic, noise and crowd control. I would suggest the appropriate authorities ensure that all of us – home shuls included – comply. By targeting only those congregating for religious purposes, the city could be opening a Pandora's box of religious intolerance. The rationale for such a wide-reaching zoning change seems quite arbitrary and has the potential to pit neighbour against neighbour throughout this city, rather than deal with issues on a one-off basis. The end result is that Shefman and members of council may create an unnecessary crisis that will only polarize our community, and potentially cause intolerance and resentment.

Jewish Pride a kiddush HaShem

It was a pleasure to see so many members of the Jewish community marching in the Toronto Pride Parade on July 4, waving Israeli flags and holding posters, and giving the lie to the anti-Semites who were too much in evidence ("500 march with Kulanu at Pride," July 8). Kulanu thanks community groups

Thank you so much for article about the July 4 Toronto Pride Parade and our work in defending the State of Israel against those such as Queers Against Israeli Apartheid, who attempted to delegitimize and demonize Israel and the vast majority of Jews who support Israel ("500 march with Kulanu," July 8).

We certainly welcomed the support of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, which was mentioned in your article, but unfortunately, you did not include Canadian Jewish Congress, without whose help our efforts would not have been as successful as they turned out to be. In fact, Mark Freiman, CJC national president; Bernie Farber, CJC CEO; Benjamin Shinewald, CJC national executive director, and Len Rudner, CJC Ontario director, among many other Congress lay and professional leaders, joined us at the parade. I would also be remiss not to acknowledge the support of the Canada-Israel Committee and Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center, all of whom we thank and commend.

There was a rally for Israel at Queen's Park in Toronto on June 27. About 12 of us, mostly seniors, attended, and there were approximately 10 to 12 Orthodox anti-Zionists with signs denouncing Israel. Where were all our brethren? There is a lack of communication in our community.

Israelis reassured after meeting with Obama

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

The optics were perfect, but the meaning was elusive. U.S. President Barack Obama and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu sat together last week, joshing and smiling, trying to project a clear message: the rift was over. Israel and the United States are on the same track again.

"In terms of my relationship with Prime Minister Netanyahu, I know the press, both in Israel and stateside, enjoys seeing if there's news there," Obama said. "But the fact of the matter is that I've trusted Prime Minister Netanyahu since I met him before I was elected president, and have said so both publicly and privately."

The meeting capped months of tensions sparked by Israel's announcement in March of a major housing start in eastern Jerusalem during an official visit to Israel by Vice-President Joe Biden.

The image of a friendly encounter between the two leaders was almost tainted in the lead-up to the meeting when it was leaked that Israel's ambassador to the United States, Michael Oren, had warned in a private conversation of a "tectonic rift" between the two countries. Oren later explained that he had been misquoted: "Shift," he said.

In any case, U.S. officials said in a rare on-the-record call earlier this month that there is no fissure.

"There's absolutely no rift between the United States and Israel," Ben Rhodes, the deputy national security adviser, said in the conference call.

Dan Shapiro, the senior National Security Council official who runs the Israel desk, said he "can certainly underscore the incredible richness and intensity and quality of the exchange between our governments in military channels, in political channels, in intelligence channels."

Officials were brimming with superlatives. Details, however, were lacking, and in some areas there was evident disagreement.

The leaders agreed, for instance, on the need to go to direct talks with the Palestinians. The Palestinian Authority has resisted pending a full settlement freeze.

Obama, however, set a deadline of sorts when he made clear that he wanted such talks to start before September, when Netanyahu's self-imposed 10-month settlement freeze lapses.

"My hope is that once direct talks have begun, well before the moratorium has expired, that that will create a climate in which everybody feels a greater investment in success," Obama said.

Israeli officials, speaking on and off the record, made it clear that they were not confident the Palestinians were ready for direct talks and would not commit to a deadline.

The sides also spoke of confidence-building measures. Pressed for specifics, Obama cited the need for the Palestinians to further inhibit incitement, and called on Israel to "widen the scope" of Palestinian security responsibilities in the West Bank, given the advances that a U.S.-led team has had in training Palestinian security forces.

In the meetings before and after lunch, however, Netanyahu and his team suggested that the Israelis were not confident enough in the Palestinians to assume greater security control in areas outside their current purview of a handful of cities.

Most tellingly, Obama administration officials said the peace process and moving to direct talks was reason No. 1 for the Obama-Netanyahu meeting.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu with U.S. President Barack Obama last week in Washington.

Israeli officials placed it a distant third behind delivering assurances to Israel that the United States would not press Israel for nuclear transparency, and U.S. assistance in shepherding Israel past the crisis sparked by Israel's deadly May 31 raid on an aid flotilla that aimed to breach Israel's embargo of the Gaza Strip.

Still, the Israeli team emerged from the meetings reassured and even jovial. The nuclear issue was key.

"The United States will never ask Israel to take any steps that would undermine its security interests," Obama said, referring to his administration's efforts to get more countries to abide by the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

Israeli officials had raised concerns after a U.S.-hosted conference in May concluded with an agreement to consider the issue of Israel. U.S. officials said later that the issue should only be considered subsequent to a comprehensive, permanent peace, which is Israel's position.

The United States and Israel have a longstanding agreement to maintain ambiguity on Israel's nuclear capacity. Israel is believed to maintain an arsenal of up to 200 nuclear warheads.

Netanyahu thanked Obama for "reaffirming the longstanding U.S. commitments to Israel on matters of vital strategic importance."

Especially impressive to the Israelis, and to pro-Israel lobbyists that have fretted about the ostensible rift, was how Obama framed the announcement.

"We strongly believe that given its size, its history, the region that it's in and the threats that are levelled against us – against it – that Israel has unique security requirements," Obama said. "It's got to be able to respond to threats or any combination of threats in the region. And that's why we remain unwavering in our commitment to Israel's security."

The remark spoke to the "kishkas" factor – the concern among some pro-Israel groups about whether or not Obama has an intuitive, gut understanding of Israel's security needs.

"This recognition by the United States of Israel's security needs is a testament to the common understanding of the complexities of the Middle East situation," B'nai B'rith International said in a statement.

The American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) applauded the remark.

"For over 60 years, Israel has offered its hand in peace, demonstrating again and again its willingness to make real and heart-rending sacrifices – altering borders, relinquishing territory, uprooting families and entire communities – in the pursuit of peace," the organization noted.

Israeli officials said they were especially pleased with U.S. efforts to push back pressure for an international inquiry into the May 31 flotilla raid, which left nine Turks dead – including one Turkish-American citizen – and has disrupted ties among Turkey, the United States and Israel.

Netanyahu also said he was pleased by the Iran sanctions Obama helped shepherd through the United Nations Security Council, as well as congressional sanctions that became law earlier this month.

"I think the latest sanctions adopted by the UN create illegitimacy or create de-legitimization for Iran's nuclear program, and that is important," Netanyahu said. "I think the sanctions the president signed the other day actually have teeth. They bite."

President says Israel right to be skeptical

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — U.S. President Barack Obama has said there is hope for peace in the Middle East, but he told Israeli media that he's not "blindly optimistic".

Israel is right to be skeptical about the peace process, he told Israeli television in an interview that was taped last week. He noted during the interview that many people thought the founding of Israel was impossible, so its very existence should be "a great source of hope."

The interview with Obama took place a day after he met Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in Washington, D.C.

Netanyahu promised Obama during their meeting that Israel would undertake confidence-building steps toward the Palestinian Authority in the coming days and weeks. These steps are likely to include the transfer responsibility for more parts of the West Bank to PA security forces.

The two leaders met alone for about 90 minutes last week, during which time they discussed the peace process with the Palestinians, the Iranian nuclear program, and the strategic understandings between their two countries on Tehran's efforts to achieve nuclear capabilities.

"There are going to need to be a whole set of confidence-building measures to make sure that people are serious and that we're sending a signal to the region that this isn't just more talk and more process without action," Obama said during a joint press conference.

"I believe that Prime Minister Netanyahu wants peace. I think he's willing to take risks for peace... Now more than ever I think is the time for us to seize on that vision. And I think that Prime Minister Netanyahu is prepared to do so... We expect [the] proximity talks to lead to direct talks, and I believe that the government of Israel is prepared to engage in such direct talks," Obama said.

Obama had warm words for Netanyahu after their talks and affirmed the unbreakable bond that links the United States and Israel. The last meeting between the two leaders earlier this year was frosty, overshadowed by Israel's announcement of construction in East Jerusalem despite the temporary settlement freeze.

Netanyahu described the meeting as positive, adding that America has no better friend or ally than the State of Israel.

Netanyahu told U.S. Jewish leaders that direct Palestinian-Israeli talks would begin "very soon," but he warned that they would be "very, very tough."

Netanyahu told his cabinet before flying to Washington that the time had come for Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas to prepare to meet directly with the Israelis, as it was the only way to advance peace.

Israelis and Palestinians have been holding indirect talks mediated by Obama's special envoy to the Middle East, George Mitchell. Aides to Obama sounded a hopeful tone regarding the negotiations last week, telling reporters that shuttle diplomacy between the two sides has paid off and the gaps have narrowed.

At a meeting with representatives of Jewish organizations at the Plaza Hotel last week, Netanyahu discussed the efforts to promote Middle East peace. "This is going to be a very, very tough negotiation," he said, adding: "The sooner the better."

"Direct negotiations must begin right away, and we think that they will," he said.

Opinions

Is he really MIA?

Gilad Schalit is still listed as an MIA along with some of his fellow soldiers. But is he really MIA? We know who has him; we know where he is in general terms.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

He is missing in action in the sense that he was captured. But he is a prisoner of war, not the typical MIA. That term was coined for those whose whereabouts were truly unknown. Most frequently they had died on the battlefield, or if held as prisoners, no one knew their whereabouts at all. But we know that Hamas has Gilad Schalit. We know that they are using him as a pawn in some terrible political power play.

What we do not know is his condition. We cannot imagine the horrors he has experienced. What tortures, physical, psychological and emotional he has undergone? What does he think? Does he feel abandoned?

His parents have been steadfast in their campaigns to keep his plight in the public eye and gain his release. In their recent march on the prime minister's office, thousands joined them.

The government seems ready to deal. This may be a major moment in the process; it signals another step the Israeli government is taking to appease terrorists that won't be recognized. Once again the world will find a way to vilify the peace seekers and applaud the true terrorists. But that is not our issue today. Right now, we must think about our own reaction to the Schalit march and decide what is our responsibility in this case. Can we or ought we do something to help?

I believe as Jews we have an obligation to help. The Schalits are not alone. In discussing what we should do with my friend Sandy recently, I was impressed by her wise suggestion.

We cannot march on the Israeli government as the Schalit's are doing. That is their job, their government. Sandy proposed that we boycott the Red Cross. Why not? After all, they claim the responsibility to look after prisoners of war. That is their domain. Great.

Gilad is a prisoner of war and the Red Cross has not seen him once. They have allowed Hamas to bamboozle them with an excuse of non availability and security! What kind of humanitarian organization is that? Why haven't they insisted on seeing Gilad? If the tables were turned the world would be demanding access. So now the Jewish world should boycott the Red Cross demanding access and news of Gilad until he is released. That is our job.

A day to mourn

"In eternal memory to the men, women and children of Yaltushkow who perished at the hands of the Nazis in the summer of 1942." This is the memorial message carved on the pillar marking the landsmanschaft of the First Yaltushkow Benevolent Society in Queens, N.Y.

Now, like my father-in-law, the other members of this landsmanschaft lie with their spouses in Queens, N.Y., among the enormous silent congregations of similar landsmenschaften.

My father-in-law and his immediate family escaped this massacre, because they had the foresight to leave Ukraine after World War I. Like so many others, they settled in the Lower East Side of New York and went into the garment trade. Like so many others, their children went to university, settled in the suburbs and never spoke Yiddish. Their grandchildren studied Hebrew, visited Israel, went to university, etc.

The families who remained in Russia disappeared into the maw of the Nazi machine on that summer day in 1942, leaving no traces but a few pictures and postcards in Russian or Yiddish. Plowed under. Lost. Gone.

Judaism, wisely, has designated days on which all the horrors of the past 2,500 years can be memorialized: Tisha b'Av, observed the week of this paper's publication, and Holocaust Remembrance Day. Tisha b'Av, however, has the longest history and the greatest resonance on the religious calendar. Without these days, we might be overwhelmed by the sorrows and horrors of the past, hearing continuously millions of murdered Jews cry out from their graves.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

The most powerful observance of Tisha b'Av for me was spent in Israel. We began the evening by walking the entire circumference of the Second Temple walls, now marked by only a few rocks, then circling to encounter remnants of the Second Temple leading up to the Kotel. In the plaza, dozens of small groups sat on the ground and, illuminated by candles, chanted the book of Eicha, Lamentations. We were mourning the destruction of the first Temple in 586 BCE, the second Temple in 70 CE, Crusader pogroms, Chemielnicki's hordes in Poland and the final conflagration that erased European Jewry.

A great moan of woe arose from hundreds of throats. Yet we were sitting in front of a remnant of the Second Temple period in a Jewish state. That "solitary city" hummed all around us with life: not everyone was in mourning – people went to work in the morning, cars and trucks filled the streets, the markets were open, and those who hurried to synagogue for morning services went about their business by the afternoon.

So on one hand we imagined the not-so-distant screams of Jews lined up on a river bank to be shot by the SS, or the confused noise of battle as the Roman Legion broke into the upper city, putting it and its inhabitants to torch and sword, or pleas of mothers as Cossacks raped and murdered. On the other hand, all around us were reminders that we as a people had survived all this and once again were living in the homeland from which we had been driven 2,000 years ago.

What did the residents of Yaltushkow feel as they faced their deaths? We catch a glimpse of what it may have been like from a film or from the stories of survivors. Sitting in the Burnt House in the Old City we can, perhaps, imagine the final terror of that young girl whose arm bone was found clutching the stair railing.

Despite what Eicha argues, today we know not to blame the victim. Israel's king made a lot of bad choices, leading to the Babylonian attack, and Jewish resistance to Rome to the final conflagration in Jerusalem. But the deaths of Jews down the centuries were fanned by hatred, anti-Semitic church teachings, nationalism turned xenophobic, economic motives and sheer blood lust.

It's vital to have a day on which to mourn, a day to channel the sorrow that must rise anew when we consider the millions dead. Nothing would harm us more than to become consumed with endless anger.

The 2010 World Religions Summit

The G8 and G20 nations of the world gathered in Ontario in June to explore solutions to the world's greatest concerns. Issues addressed included the eradication of poverty and hunger, the achievement of universal primary education, the promotion of gender equality, the reduction of child mortality, the combating of HIV/AIDS, malaria and other diseases and the ensuring of environmental sustainability.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

Each year since 2005, these summits have been preceded by parallel gatherings of world religious leaders. This year, the World Religions Summit took place at the University of Winnipeg from June 21 to 23 and included meetings of the interfaith media as well as a human rights conference focusing on freedom of religion and a strong youth component.

Eighty-four delegates and 160 observers from 24 nations representing 47 faith traditions attended. Many of the world's great religions were represented, including Judaism, the United Church, Russian Orthodox, Lutheran, Catholicism, Islam, Mennonite, Shinto, Baha'i, Hinduism and aboriginal spirituality. Delegates came from around the world, including Canada, the United States, Rwanda, Great Britain, Japan, Russia, Zambia, India and Saudi Arabia. Prominent speakers included Senator Roméo Dallaire.

Rabbi Adam Scheier, of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim of Montreal, represented the Canadian Jewish Congress and he, together with CJC's executive director, Benjamin Shinewald, lent their articulate voices to the proceedings.

Setting the tone for the meeting, Lloyd Axworthy, U of W's president and a former minister for External Affairs, stated that "creating fundamental and positive change through the intersection of faith and politics is increasingly relevant today."

The summit began with an aboriginal ceremony, conducted by the Anishnabe Nation. This was followed by a Holocaust-related oratorio, I Believe, written and conducted by Zane Zalis. Beginning with the calls of the shofar, this work portrayed the rise of hatred, its horrific consequences, survival, liberation and the ability to love.

Virtually all of the religious leaders at the Summit were male, with such notable exceptions as United Church moderator Mardi Tindal; Methodist minister from Lusaka, Zambia, Suzanne Membe, and aboriginal elder Katherine Whitecloud. This reflects the lack of egalitarianism that characterizes religious leadership around the world.

During the summit, there was little discussion of the conflict in the Middle East. A representative of the Saudi Arabian Ministry of Islamic Affairs stated that the "most important [issue] for us in the Middle East is peace and security rather than the environment and poverty. In the Middle East, there is conflict and extremists on both sides who want to portray [the conflict] as religious. We don't think it is religious, we think it is political."

The final communiqué of the conference, titled A Time for Inspired Leadership and Action, contained a similar statement on the relationship between religion and politics. It stated that "there are those who inappropriately use religion to justify violent acts against others, and thereby offend the true spirit of their faith and the long-standing values of their faith communities. We condemn religiously motivated terrorism and extremism, and commit to stop teaching and justifying the use of violence between and among our faith communities."

This final document called on the world's political leadership to address poverty, care for the earth and invest in peace.

Conference delegates were not representatives of the fanatical or extremist factions that feed the world's conflicts with pseudo-religious rhetoric. They were faith leaders of goodwill who are genuinely determined to work co-operatively to heal the world.

Rev. Jim Wallis, of Sojourners magazine and a religious adviser to U.S. President Barack Obama, summed up the purpose of the religious summit when he said that "religious communities need to move well beyond what is politically astute to pursue their dreams and visions of a better world," a world where 30,000 children don't die every day.

Although it's unlikely that the final doeument of the World Religions Summit had an impact on the subsequent G8 and G20 meetings, one can hope that the essential message will guide the leaders of these powerful nations when they return home to work with their governments.

The Kirshner File

A cornucopia of books ...

It's summer, a time to catch up on your reading. The following books cover an eclectic range of topics. So sit back and enjoy them at your leisure.

Always simmering, if not boiling over, the Arab-Israeli dispute is nothing if not complex. Neil Caplan's concise and excellent primer, The Israel-Palestine Conflict: Contested Histories (Wiley-Blackwell), places Israel's struggle with the Palestinians and the Arabs in perspective. Caplan, a professor of history at Concordia University in Montreal, analyzes the key issues with piercing insight.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Jonathan Schneer's The Balfour Declaration: The Origins of the Arab-Israeli Conflict (Doubleday) is erudite and well written, examining a seminal 1917 document, issued by Britain and addressed to the Zionist movement, that paved the way for the establishment of Israel and the transformation of the Middle East.

Israelism: Arab Scholarship on Israel, A Critical Assessment (Ithaca Press), by Hassan Barari, a professor of Middle East studies at the University of Nebraska, breaks new ground on the status of Israeli studies among Arab scholars. The author concludes that, with few exceptions, Arab researchers are bogged down by prejudice and ideological baggage. He adds that Israel's continued occupation of the territories exacerbates "the stereotypical image of Israel."

David Cesarani's account of the waning days of the British Mandate in Palestine, Major Farran's Hat: Murder, Scandal and Britain's War Against Jewish Terrorism (Vintage Books), turns on the kidnapping of a member of Lehi, the far-right Jewish militia, whose disappearance was traced to British intelligence officer Roy Farran. It reads like a blistering detective story.

The paperback edition of Jerusalem: City of Longing (Harvard University Press), by Simon Goldhill, deftly delves into its convoluted history, riveting architecture and grand archeological relics.

M. Sukru Hanioglu's majestic A Brief History of the Late Ottoman Empire (Princeton University Press) focuses on the last chapter of a fairly tolerant Muslim empire that straddled three continents and encompassed remarkable ethnic and cultural diversity.

Izzeldin Abuelaish, a Palestinian doctor who works for peace and reconciliation despite a tragedy that killed three of his daughters and a niece during the war in the Gaza Strip in 2009, has written his memoirs. I Shall Not Hate: A Gaza Doctor's Journey (Random House) comes straight from the heart and is quite moving. Adina Hoffman's thoughtful My Happiness Bears No Relation To Happiness: A Poet's Life in the Palestinian Century (Yale University Press) is a biography of the Israeli Arab poet Taha Mohammed Ali, a man whose life reflects the bitter experiences of Israel's Arab minority.

In The Flight of the Intellectuals (Melville House), Paul Berman, an American critic, delivers a thought-provoking and troubling meditation on radical Islam and terrorism. He does so, in part, by focusing on Tariq Ramadan, an influential and supposedly moderate Swiss Muslim philosopher. Berman is skeptical of Ramadan's moderation and offers evidence to support his thesis.

Herb Keinon, in Lone Soldiers: Israel's Defenders from Around the World (Devora Publishing), tells the stories of 14 young Jewish men and women from 10 countries, including Canada, who came to Israel without their families to serve in the armed forces. His sympathetic profiles are illustrated by Ricki Rosen's sharp photographs.

Michael Brenner's lavishly illustrated and authoritative A Short History of the Jews (Princeton University Press) is not exactly short, given its 421 pages with the index. But since he is dealing with about 3,000 years, Brenner's feat of condensation is commendable. David Ruderman's bracing companion volume, Early Modern Jewry: A New Cultural History (Princeton University Press), covers such topics as Jewish migration to the Ottoman empire and eastern Europe, the Conversos and the Haskalah.

Menachem Mendel Schneerson, the late and revered Lubavitcher spiritual leader, is the subject of The Rebbe (Princeton University Press), a searching biography by Samuel Heilman and Menachem Friedman.

Ruled by the Habsburgs, Romanians and Soviets, Czernowitz is now located within the borders of Ukraine. Before the Holocaust, this cosmopolitan city was a thriving Jewish centre. In Ghosts of Home: The Afterlife of Czernowitz in Jewish Memory (University of California Press), Marianne Hirsch and Leo Spitzer poignantly explore it by blending historical inquiry with personal recollections.

Bezalel Bar-Kochva's magnum opus, The Image of the Jews in Greek Literature (University of California Press), probes the attitudes of Greek writers in the Hellenistic period to the Jewish people. Sarra Copia Sulam, apparently the first Jewish woman to leave a mark as a writer and intellectual, is the focus of Don Harran's Jewish Poet and Intellectual in Seventeenth Century Venice (University of Chicago Press).

Peter Longerich's The Holocaust: The Nazi Persecution and Murder of the Jews (Oxford University Press), which originally appeared in German, is a commanding work. Concentration Camps in Nazi Germany (Routledge), a collection of essays edited by Jane Caplan and Nikolaus Wachsmann, is a cogent analysis of a brutal camp system.

In Historians of the Jews and the Holocaust (Stanford University Press), David Engel argues that the Shoah cannot be artificially separated from Jewish history and that it illuminates major problems in the Jewish past. Francine Prose delves deeply into an iconic diary in Anne Frank (HarperCollins). Hubert Wolf, in his important book, Pope and the Devil: The Vatican Archives and the Third Reich (Harvard University Press), examines the Vatican's relationship with Germany in the 1920s and 1930s.

Frederic Tubach, a German Christian, and Bernat Rosner, a Hungarian Jew, were both teenagers during World War II. As may be expected, their respective experiences were extremely different. While Tubach joined a Nazi youth movement, Rosner was transported to Auschwitz, where his whole family perished. After the war, they met in California and became unlikely friends. They tell their unusual story in An Uncommon Friendship (University of California Press).

Left-wingers in Germany's postwar generation rebelled against their parents and grandparents' complicity in Nazi crimes. Hans Kundnani's Utopia or Auschwitz: Germany's 1968 Generation and the Holocaust (Columbia University Press) subjects this issue to close and intelligent scrutiny.

The Jewish Graphic Novel (Rutgers University Press), edited by Samantha Baskind and Ranan Omer-Sherman, addresses a sub-genre in Jewish literary culture through the works of such figures as Art Spiegelman, Will Eisener and Ruto Modan. The avant garde fashion photographer/writer/painter/filmmaker Emmanuel Radnitzky, known as Man Ray, is explored at length in Alias Man Ray (Yale University Press), a handsome coffee-table book by Mason Klein and contributors.

In general: Travellers will love Unforgettable Places, a beautiful compendium of formidable sights around the world: Unforgettable Canada showcases spectacular Canadian scenery and World Heritage Sights highlights 878 UNESCO heritage sites. Both are published by Firefly Books.

Jane Burbank's and Frederick Cooper's Empires in World History (Princeton University Press) is a very useful and impressive reference book. Thomas Barfield's timely and informative Afghanistan: A Cultural and Political History (Princeton University Press) serves a reader exceedingly well.

My brother turned me on to this unheard of mortgage investment company almost 20 years ago. Being cautious, I put in small amounts of money to test the waters. The waters have been flowing ever since. My investments in the Romspen Fund are as good as the 30 year business investment I have with my partners, who of course have become Romspen investors as well. It makes me feel good to share and recommend this to my friends and to my kids. After all, why shouldn't they be in on a good thing?

Toronto delivers strong message to Pride

Future funding to be delivered following parade

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The City of Toronto is watching you.

That's the message councillor and former mayoral candidate Giorgio Mammoliti and others sent to the organizers of the Toronto Pride festival last week after city council voted 36-1 to adopt his motion to deny Pride city funding until after its parade next year, to ensure it complies with the city's non-discrimination policy.

Giorgio Mammoliti

The move came after Pride Toronto, responding to political pressure, allowed the group Queers Against Israel Apartheid (QuAIA) to march in this year's parade, reversing an earlier decision to ban the group on the grounds its participation under that name violated city policy.

Mammoliti had initially intended to table a motion at the July 7 city council meeting asking that city funds be "returned retroactively... because Pride did not invoke the City of Toronto's anti-discriminating policies by allowing QuAIA to participate in this year's Pride Parade."

It also asked the city to reject "any and all future applications from Pride for funding and support."

The city gave Pride a $123,807 grant and $170,000 worth of city services for its July 4 parade.

However, a group of councillors – including David Shiner, Cliff Jenkins, Kyle Rae and Mike Feldman – brokered a rewording of the motion, softening it while still carrying consequences for Pride.

The motion was seconded by councillor and mayoral candidate Rob Ford.

In addition to asking the city to withhold funding from Pride until after next year's event, the amended motion also carries the stipulations that the city advise Pride Toronto "on what is required of them to meet the policy; [and that] city council request the city manager to advise Pride Toronto whether the participation of QuAIA and the signs or banners they carry contravenes the city's anti-discrimination policy."

All recipients of municipal funding are required to sign and abide by Toronto's Declaration of Non-Discrimination. Pride signed the policy, which requires it to declare that it "adopts and upholds" Toronto's policies prohibiting harassment and guarantees that the annual Pride parade be free of "hate activity based on age, ancestry, citizenship, religion, ethnic origin, disability, family status, gender identity, place of origin, race and political affiliation," among other criteria.

In May, Pride's board decided to ban the term "Israeli apartheid" to comply with city policy. But in late June, it reversed its decision, opting instead to have all parade participants sign their own individual declarations that they comply with city policy.

At the time, Pride said it couldn't determine whether the term "Israeli apartheid" violated the city's non-discrimination policy and asked the city to make that determination itself.

Queries to Pride last week were not answered by The CJN's deadline.

But in a July 8 Toronto Star report, Tracey Sandilands, executive director of Pride Toronto, said after the council vote that her organization still doesn't believe it violated the policy by allowing QuAIA to participate.

"If the city has any issues with any of the participants, then that is for them to take up with the participants," she said.

In the same report, Shiner said Pride would be taking a "big risk" if it failed to ban QuAIA from the parade next year.

In response to queries from The CJN, the city's diversity office – which administers the non-discrimination policy – clarified that the city had made "no determination" on the term "Israeli apartheid" and that it could not enforce its own non-discrimination policy unless violations occurred at a city-run event or were committed by municipal employees working on city time.

The city said anyone who wants to complain about non-compliance with its policy outside of those parameters would need to go through the Ontario Human Rights Tribunal.

When asked about the city's stance on enforcing its own policy and whether he thought the city would abide by the council's vote last week, Mammoliti said that "city staff will need to follow council's directive. If they choose not to and suggest to us that this go to the human right's tribunal, you can guarantee that I will be leading the charge with the backing of my fellow councillors, and we won't lose."

Noah Gurza

Ford said he viewed the policy as "toothless" and intends to "look into it to strengthen it."

Noah Gurza, 35, a Toronto-based consultant with the Ontario provincial government who is also Jewish and gay, attended the city council meetings last week bearing a petition he drafted with more than 2,000 signatures – including Jenkins' – from irate "gay and gay-friendly" Torontonians who want the city to ensure that QuAIA and similar groups don't appear at future Pride parades.

While he doesn't consider himself an activist – "This is the first time I've done something like this," Gurza said – he felt compelled to become involved in the issue as a concerned citizen.

His petition, addressed to Pride, asked the organization to consider that "the affairs of the State of Israel and the Israel/Palestinian conflict are so far removed from a parade on sexuality and gay rights that one wonders if the parade will become a vehicle for all human rights issues to be voiced. Why are we not seeing Gays for a Free Tibet? Gays for a Free Pays Basque? Or Gays for a Free Corsica march alongside drag queens and hot cops?"

It adds: "Let us remind the [Pride] executive as to where gays in the Middle East are tortured and murdered for daring to express their sexual preference. The reality is that in the Middle East, Israel is to be admired for its gay rights and equality, amidst being surrounded by countries which condone violent and murderous homophobia."

Gurza said he he was thrilled with the result of last week's council vote, adding that he believed his real-time updates – via posts to his Facebook petition page – from council chambers urging petition signatories to call councillors and demand they vote for the motion helped put public pressure on the city to vote to "keep Pride accountable" for its actions.

He said he's now committed to pursuing ways to "beef up" the city's non-discrimination policy "so that groups like QuAIA not be allowed to march" in future parades.

Correction

The story "500 march with Kulanu at Pride" (July 8) included some incorrect information. Toronto city councillor Rob Ford did not march in Toronto's Pride Parade. We apologize for the error.

Air Canada modifies flight schedule to Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

With the peak travel season upon us, Air Canada has added three non-stop flights to Israel for a total of seven per week, while El Al now flies four times a week to Ben-Gurion International Airport. At the same time, Air Canada shifted its times for departure from Tel Aviv to mid-day from after midnight, leading one keen observer of the tourism business to suggest that travel to Israel might suffer as a result.

Oded Grofman

Instead of departing Israel at night, as had been the case until the schedule changed in June, and arriving around 6 a.m. in Toronto, travellers will now leave Israel in early afternoon. That will mean missions and families who would have enjoyed a last day touring (and leaving for the airport late at night) will now have to arrive at the airport in the morning. That results in a loss of one day of travel at the end of a visit or it may force travellers to book an extra night in a hotel.

"People are leaving Israel at noon and arriving at 6 p.m. on the same day. So, it's a day flight, and [with] a day flight, if you have all the time in the world, it doesn't matter. But for some people, it's not the most convenient thing in the world," said the industry insider, who didn't want to be identified, adding that those making connections often arrive at other destinations quite late at night.

"If you're a businessman, you leave in the evening [under the old schedule] and arrive [in Toronto] in the morning. You have the whole day to do business. A lot of Israeli business people also don't like to lose a day of work in Israel [on the departure day]."

Peter Fitzpatrick, a spokesperson for Air Canada, said "the change was due to aircraft availability. It fit better with our schedule in terms of optimizing the aircraft."

Under the previous schedule, the jet would sit idle in Ben-Gurion for seven hours between flights. Now, it's turned around in two.

Noting that Air Canada now offers daily return flights to Israel, Fitzpatrick said the current schedule is similar to flights from Europe to Canada, many of which are daytime flights. "A lot of our customers like that."

"You've got to pick a time. There won't be one time that would be ideal for everybody," he said.

Dinah Kutner, general manager for El Al's Canadian operations, said two of the Israeli air carrier's weekly flights depart at 9:20 a.m., while the other two depart Ben Gurion at 12:50 a.m.

"People aren't thrilled about flying through the day. People prefer night flights. That gives us an advantage [over Air Canada]. People love it. You get in, you go to sleep, you wake up, you're in Toronto," she said.

Kutner said El Al offers two day flights "due to [aircraft] rotation, where the aircraft has to be at certain times."

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, which sponsors a number of missions to Israel each year, said it could see no downside to the changes.

"We believe Air Canada's decision to change flight times is aimed at strengthening its ability to maintain and grow the Tel Aviv route and is not expected to have a detrimental effect on our missions or diminish our community's passion for Israel travel," said Aviva Malka, federation's director of missions operations and senior fund developer, special projects for Israel and overseas.

"It is a testament to our community's strong relationship with Israel that there are so many direct flights to choose from between Toronto and Israel and we continue to applaud Air Canada in helping make that possible."

Oded Grofman, head of the Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO), said "we are working closely with the trade and Air Canada. It's a commercial issue.

"We expect to have a record number of travellers to Israel this year – 80,000, a new record."

Ancient bones found on construction site

Shortly afterward, he received a local call claiming Canadian Friends of the IAA had given $2.5 million to the hospital in Ashkelon.

"First, we don't have that kind of money," Vered said, "and secondly, we didn't have anything to do with Ashkelon."

Vered said he tried to reason with the demonstrators, but he doesn't believe they were interested in hearing what IAA experts found when they were called in to the Ashkelon site.

On confronting the protesters, he saw a variety of signs equating Zionism with "thuggery," condemning Israel, saying "Dissolve the State of Israel," and the "Bones are not yours."

Some of the signs directed onlookers to the website www.nkcanada.ca. On the home page is a Neturei Karta rabbi visiting a wounded blockade-running "humanitarian." The website includes a photo of a handful of demonstrators, apparently outside Vered's apartment.

The caption under the photo reads: "Orthodox Jews protest outside of the office of the Canadian Friends of the Israeli Antiquity Authorities [sic] against the desecration of ancient graves by archeologists in the 'state' of Israel. Prayer vigils and demonstrations were held in the towns of Jaffa, Ashkelon, Zippori, and Nazareth."

Efforts by The CJN to reach Neturei Karta for comment on the protests were unsuccessful.

Vered said that while the "hotheads" were oblivious to his explanation, some of the protesters seemed to be listening to his side of the story.

In essence, his points were that the bodies were not found as part of an archeological dig, but during construction of a hardened underground emergency wing for the hospital in Ashkelon, to replace one that is exposed to rocket attack from Gaza.

Construction was halted and plans were being explored to redesign the wing to avoid the potentially Jewish cemetery, he said, but experts examining the bones concluded they're not Jewish, but rather Philistine (a Greek people) and Roman, dating from the first century BCE to the third and fourth centuries CE.

The graves, which have been reburied, bore the characteristics of pagan rituals, not Jewish ones, he said. They were plastered with paintings and contained artifacts that were pagan in nature. They were oriented to Dagan, the Philistine sea god, not toward Jerusalem. And a pagan altar donated by a Roman family was found at the site.

There is also some irony in the situation, Vered, continued. "Neturei Karta in the past had a better relationship with the IAA, and the IAA was accused by many secular Israelis of collaborating with the Atra Kadisha, which deals with preserving Jewish burial sites, who keep an eye on all we do and to see if we're harming any graves."

Haredim demonstrated last month at the construction site for a special underground emergency room for Ashkelon's Barzilai Medical Center. The protesters were objecting to the planned removal of ancient bones that were found on the site. [Flash90 photo]

New Jewish cemetery consecrated in Vaughan

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Pardes Chaim, the largest Jewish community cemetery in the Toronto area, was consecrated recently at a service held at the cemetery, at 11818 Bathurst St. in Vaughan.

Run by Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park (THMP), which also runs Pardes Shalom Cemetery, the cemetery had its first interment on July 2 and will be formally opened with a community-wide event in early October.

The June 6 service to consecrate Pardes Chaim included prayers and talks by Rabbi Ron Weiss, the chaplain of Jewish Family & Child, and Rabbi Norman Berlat, director of pastoral care at Baycrest.

Also as part of the service, participants got into their cars and drove around the cemetery seven times to formally delineate the burial areas. While in their cars, passengers read appropriate psalms.

William Draimin, a lawyer, and president of THMP for the past 20 years, is also secretary of the Jewish Cemetery Association of North America and honorary legal council to the Ontario Association of Cemetery and Funeral Professionals.

He said that a new cemetery became necessary because Pardes Shalom Cemetery, which had its first interment in 1976, is fully allocated – it sits on 89 acres – by 75 organizational members, including synagogues, landsmenshaft and mutual benefit societies. (It also has a community section for the unaffiliated.)

In 1994, Draimin said, Sidney Freedman and Lou Greenbaum, who led THMP's development committee, saw that Pardes Shalom was going to run out of space. "They realized that we had to make cemetery services available, so in 1995 they made a purchase of sale."

The new 200-acre cemetery abuts Bathurst Street and Dufferin Street – the entrance is off Bathurst – and is located one mile north of Pardes Shalom Cemetery.

Rabbi Norman Berlat blows the shofar at the consecration service marking the opening of Pardes Chaim Cemetery.

Draimin, who was chair of cemetery trustees at Holy Blossom Temple for 20 years, said that traditionally, cemeteries preceded synagogues as important services to the community. "When the Pape Avenue Cemetery – the first Jewish cemetery in the city – opened in 1849, there was no synagogue. The original Holy Blossom Temple opened in 1856 and assumed the cemetery. It took seven years for synagogue involvement."

He said that Jews are always concerned about remembering their history, "and there is no better place to remember than at a cemetery."

He said that with about 185,000 to 200,000 Jews in the GTA, THMP isn't finished with cemetery expansion. "We have approximately 100,000 unused graves in the GTA. We have to account for the balance of the community, so continued expansion is necessary. It's important for the community to know that we look forward to servicing future generations."

Ireland – a fairy tale

By MASADA SIEGEL
Special to The CJN

Ireland, a mystical place, is the land of fairies, folklore, flower-filled fields, white sandy beaches and haunted castles. Influential writers and poets including W.B. Yeats and James Joyce have found their inspiration in the country, from the streets of Dublin to the craggy cliffs of Slieve.

I landed in Dublin, an emerald green city bathed in summer sunlight. History touched me from the moment I arrived, as my hotel, the Merrion, elegant in every way possible, from the rooms to the tea service, was also the place where Arthur Wellesley, the first Duke of Wellington was born.

Brushing jet lag aside (after a three-hour nap), I headed out to explore Dublin Castle. The city gets its name from the Dubh Linn or Black Pool (Dubh means black), which is on the site of the present castle gardens.

Originally built as a defensive fortification for the Norman city of Dublin, the castle later evolved into a royal residence. In 1938, the first president of Ireland, Douglas Hyde, was inaugurated in the castle, and now it continues to host to this ceremony, as well as many other government affairs.

Irish history is rich, complicated and dramatic. While the Jewish population is not large, never more than 6,000 people, influential figures, including a former Israeli president, Chaim Herzog, were born in Ireland and have made an impact in international as well as Irish politics.

The earliest reference to a Jewish presence in Ireland was in 1079, when scholars believe merchants arrived for a short visit. However, the first Irish Jewish politician was William Annyas, elected mayor of Youghal, County Cork in 1555.

The tradition continued, albeit a few hundred years later, when Gerald Goldberg became lord mayor of Cork in 1977. Not to be outdone, Dublin also boasts two Jewish mayors, a father and son, Robert Bristoe, twice lord mayor of Dublin (1956-1957 and 1961-1962) and his son, Ben Briscoe, also lord mayor of Dublin in 1988.

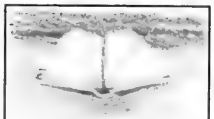
Jewish Life

Galut is a state of mind

By ELIEZER BREITOWITZ

One of the most fundamental concepts in Jewish historical analysis is that of galut, usually translated as exile. Translated as such, its centrality is not surprising, since for much – if not most – of Jewish history, we have been exiled from the Land of Israel.



Rabbinic Reflections

Yet galut seems to have a broader meaning. There were periods of Jewish history referred to as galut – such as the "Greek Galut" – although at the time the Jews were firmly rooted within the borders of the Holy Land.

The 16th-century philosopher and mystic Rabbi Judah Loew ben Bezalel, known as Maharal of Prague, identifies three conditions associated with galut. The first condition is our detachment from the Land of Israel. The second is the disunity of the Jewish People. The third is the Jewish nation being subject to foreign dominion. The word "exile" relates only to the first. A historical period can be properly classified as galut if it's characterized by any one of the three.

I would suggest that the term "galut," aside from its social/political context, can be properly applied to a certain mental state – a way of thinking, if you will – applying the Maharal's three categories.

Every Jewish life can be immeasurably enriched by connection to sources of spiritual nourishment. Aside from the rich experience of living in the land of Israel, such practices as Torah study, communal prayer, ritual observance and community service can provide such sustenance. A Jew who cuts himself off from these sources, seeing them as anachronistic and irrelevant, lives in a self-imposed galut.

Our identification with our Jewish brothers and sisters provides us with the blessings of friendship, community and mutual support. This fundamental identification is greatly challenged today. To some, it appears chauvinistic, to others, overly narrow-minded. Assimilation and intermarriage are no longer seen as problems, but rather as signs of openness to the benefits of membership in the broader world community. Is this not a form of self-imposed galut as well?

Finally, we must all ask ourselves a basic question: from where do we derive our opinions, values, goals and aspirations? Are they authentically Jewish, deriving their validity from our traditions and sacred heritage, or are they merely to be fads displayed in and borrowed from the popular media. If CNN or the editorial page of the New York Times shape our thinking, is there any greater form of foreign domination?

In the Jewish calendar, between the 17th of Tammuz and the ninth of Av, there's a three-week period in which we mourn the loss of the Holy Temple in Jerusalem and lament the Galut.

While we pray for the full restoration of Jewish sovereignty with the coming of the Messiah, we realize at the same time that not every prayer can be immediately answered. However, at the very least, we must try to save ourselves – and those we can inspire and influence – from the self-imposed mental galut described above.

Rabbi Eliezer Breitowitz is rosh yeshiva of Yeshiva Darchei Torah of Toronto.

It's time to share

Bill Gates and Warren Buffet recently announced the launch of the "Giving Pledge" campaign asking that all billionaires in America donate at least 50 per cent of their wealth to charity – and to publicly outline their intentions in a written letter – during their lifetimes or upon their deaths. On June 16, four families took up the challenge publicly announcing their intent to do exactly that. Eli Broad, pledging to give away 75 per cent of his wealth, noted that "We agree with Andrew Carnegie's wisdom that 'The man who dies rich, dies disgraced.'" Gates himself noted that he "couldn't be happier" with his 2006 decision to give away 99 per cent of his wealth.

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

Gates, the founder of Microsoft, has revolutionized the world and affected the daily activities of millions. Yet his tremendous technological impact is likely the smallest measure of his success. Together with Buffet, they have created jobs for thousands and wealth for millions, fulfilling the highest form of tzedakah of creating opportunities for others to be self-sufficient.

Their attempt to revolutionize the field of philanthropy is one that would, in my mind, make them no less worthy of the talmudic comment regarding the successful effort of Yeshoshua ben Gamla, the first century high priest who instituted a publicly funded system for Torah education: "Remember this man for good for if not for him Torah would be forgotten from the people of Israel." He is to be remembered for posterity, despite the fact that within a few short years the destruction of Jerusalem ended his efforts. It's our efforts that count, but ultimately God determines the results.

I look forward to the day when Microsoft and Berkshire Hathaway will be long forgotten, but when people will say, "Remember Warren and Bill for good, for because of them trillions of dollars were raised to help the needy."

Our community should be the most receptive to the "giving pledge" initiative. Tzdedakah, Maimonides notes, is the most important positive mitzvah a Jew can perform. The institutions we have created, generally without government assistance, both today and throughout our history, are testament to how seriously we took the requirement to give from 10 to 20 per cent of one's income to charity. Despite the poverty that was often our lot, we maintained a flourishing Jewish life.

Yet despite the unprecedented wealth of our community – a quick perusal of the 100 wealthiest Canadians contains the names of many well-known Jewish philanthropists whose cumulative net worth is listed at more than $20 billion – never before have Jewish communities been as incapable as they are today of meeting communal needs. Declining enrolments in almost every day school in Toronto attest to this sad reality, a reality that we're capable of changing almost overnight.

We're now in the days leading up to Tisha b'Av, the saddest and most tragic day of the Jewish calendar. The Talmud famously declares that the exile was caused by "free [senseless] hatred." As we all know, money-related issues are the leading causes of fighting among people, and within families. The Jerusalem Talmud thus notes that the cause of the destruction was due to excessive "love of money." True love is demonstrated by what we share with others.

The Jewish community – starting right here in Canada – must demonstrate the leadership we're often noted for. We need our own Jewish billionaires (and multi-millionaires) to publicly declare that they, too, will be donating at least 50 per cent of their wealth to tzedakah. If we succeed, we'll be blessed with literally billions upon billions of dollars. This money will be able to fund every conceivable communal need until the coming of the messianic era, one that will be greatly hastened by our philanthropic efforts.

Are independant minyanim the future?

By MARTIN LOCKSHIN

With all the doom and gloom stories of assimilation of young Jews in North America, one good news story is the rise of vibrant independent minyanim (prayer groups) throughout the continent, but particularly on the east coast of the United States. Rabbi Elie Kaunfer, one of the founders of Kehilat Hadar in Manhattan, perhaps the most successful independent minyan in North America, has just published Empowered Judaism: What Independent Minyanim Can Teach Us about Building Vibrant Jewish Communities, an enthusiastic panegyric and how-to guide for setting up an independent minyan.

Martin Lockshin

Independent minyanim pride themselves on creating meaningful prayer experiences in a grassroots, non-establishment atmosphere. Of course, meaningful Jewish prayer also takes place in some establishment synagogues in North America. In fact, in a recent blog posting, Rabbi Kaunfer described his reluctant move, for family reasons, away from the Upper West Side of Manhattan and his surprisingly positive experience becoming a member of a real synagogue with a paid rabbi.

So what precisely makes an independent minyan different? While there's no universally agreed-upon definition, I will use the one suggested by Rabbi Kaunfer in this book: a minyan that meets at least once a month, was founded in the last 10 years, is organized and led by volunteers, has no paid clergy and has no affiliation with any movement denomination of Judaism. Several of these elements seem arbitrary. For example, the last element of Rabbi Kaunfer's definition excludes a number of minyanim – including most partnership minyanim, such as the Toronto Partnership Minyan – that think of themselves as independent and yet profess an Orthodox denominational allegiance.

In fact, there are quite a few minyanim in North America that have much in common with "independent minyanim" but are not part of the liberal/egalitarian/gay-friendly world that Rabbi Kaunfer writes about and advocates. Even in haredi (a.k.a. "fervently Orthodox") circles, there are many groups of young people who have empowered themselves and set up minyanim that they themselves run in order to create a prayer service that is more meaningful for them. In a thoughtful scholarly introduction to Rabbi Kaunfer's book, Prof. Jonathan Sarna points out that independent minyanim are not such a new phenomenon. Their history in the United States goes back almost 200 years, beginning with a group called Hebra Hinuch Nearim (the Society for Educating the Youth) in 1825 and continuing through groups such as the Young Israel movement and, a few decades ago, the chavurah movement, where young people gathered together to pray in a way that "transformed their prayer service." Each of these movements "aimed… to empower Jews and transform Judaism."

What's new and different about independent minyanim such as Kehilat Hadar is that they're based on three sets of values that don't always go together: rejection of denominational labels, commitment to liberal values, including egalitarianism, and a strong allegiance to the traditional prayerbook.

Rabbi Kaunfer explains in this book some of the secrets involved in creating a new minyan where people feel empowered and are eager to volunteer to do the work. Since independent minyanim have no employees, happy and committed volunteers are crucial. A number of times in the book, Rabbi Kaunfer refers to independent minyanim as "democratic." I would quibble with that word.

While we might not think of them that way, establishment synagogues actually have the trappings of democracy: constitutions, members, elected officers, and paid employees who are hired and fired by (and thus responsible to) the elected laypeople. (Admittedly, rarely do synagogue members exercise their democratic rights, but they do have them.) As Rabbi Kaunfer writes, though, Hadar (and so also many other independent minyanim) don't have dues-paying members who vote for their leadership. Control of the minyan is in the hands of a group of knowledgeable Jews who try to ensure that anyone who leads services or reads Torah has a tuneful voice and solid Hebrew language skills. (In the establishment synagogues that I know where laypeople lead the services, it's rare to see the level of quality control exercised at Hadar and at Shira Hadashah in Jerusalem, for instance.)

One of the lessons of independent minyanim, then, is that, with proper management, people can feel much happier in a benevolent meritocracy than they do in a democracy.

Rabbi Kaunfer only touches on the interdependence between independent minyanim and establishment synagogues. Most independent minyanim have not yet reached the stage that they can fulfil all the Jewish needs of their traditional attendees, as a synagogue does. Few or no independent minyanim have the ability to provide the counselling services that paid rabbis provide. A traditional Jew who prays at an independent minyan will probably want to say Kaddish on weekdays when his or her parent dies, but very few independent minyanim have a weekday daily minyan. Accordingly, many of those involved in independent minyanim have a synagogue affiliation, too. Certainly most members of the ones that meet monthly do.

A recent scholarly survey co-sponsored by Mechon Hadar: An Institute for Prayer, Personal Growth and Jewish Study, which is affiliated with Kehilat Hadar, found that independent minyanim attract people who are, on average, younger, more Jewishly educated, more knowledgeable about Hebrew, more committed to Jewish values, and more likely to have had frequent and lengthy Israel experiences than members of establishment synagogues.

The survey also found that almost half of the people in these minyanim grew up in Conservative Jewish homes, and more than one-third of them still identify as Conservative Jews, even if they pray in a minyan that is avowedly non-denominational. To the outside observer, services at Hadar and many other independent minyanim look just like an American Conservative service. Kehilat Hadar has set up a very impressive sister institution – Yeshivat Hadar – where women and men study classical Jewish texts at a high level in the original Hebrew and Aramaic. Much of the leadership of Yeshivat Hadar consists of avowedly "non-denominational" rabbis who are all the sons of Conservative rabbis. Conservative Jews should probably be proud that so many of their finest young people have created new vibrant grassroots institutions, even if they may be sad that these institutions reject Conservative affiliation.

What some people hope will be the next great idea of North American Judaism is for these independent minyanim to move into synagogues – as alternative forms of prayer within those institutions – bringing their energy and commitment into established communities, while reaping the benefits of the full-service synagogue. I'm referring to large and medium-size synagogues offering a variety of options for services that not only have different styles ("the family service" and "the 'singy' service" and the "fast service") but also different ideologies. It would require courage for an establishment Orthodox synagogue to have a "partnership minyan" option (an Orthodox service with expanded roles for women) meet in its basement, or for a Toronto Conservative synagogue to have an egalitarian option among the services offered, or for an American egalitarian Conservative synagogue to have a non-egalitarian option available. Some wags have suggested that this new model be called a "synaplex," (a play on the word "Cineplex"), a synagogue where religious services with different styles and ideologies are available, while all the synagogue members can work together on other common Jewish causes: Torah study, Holocaust commemoration, Israel advocacy, a joint kiddush for all the minaynim, etc.

Until that day comes, though, we should be happy that so many committed young Jews such as Rabbi Kaunfer have found models to make traditional Jewish praying more meaningful for them and for their contemporaries.

Her Majesty has captured everyone's hearts

As we were announced, my wife, Leah, and I were warmly greeted by the prime minister, and then proceeded to Her Majesty, after which we were welcomed by the Duke of Edinburgh and Laureen Harper.

Now, back to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II. I thanked her for gracing our country, and then told her that according to Jewish tradition, when meeting royalty, we recite a blessing. I recited that blessing for the Queen to hear, which concludes with the words, "She'natan m'kevodo l'vasar va'dam." Translated, that means we acknowledge God for having given Godly glory to human beings, in this case the Queen. There is nothing more elegant to say to royalty than that their majesty is a reflection of Divine glory.

Her Majesty responded by saying, "Thank you very much." I understood this to be the Queen's way of saying "amen." Having squeezed so many words into 3-1/2 seconds, I did not have time to respond then and there. So, I respond here by saying, "You are most welcome."

Her Majesty is welcome for all she has done in her sparkling life to inspire so many, for galvanizing Canada, for capturing the hearts of young and old alike, for aging with such dignity and steadfastness, for her great gift of unprecedented longevity and concomitant stability in a turbulent world.

A word about the dinner itself. It was clear from the outset that the dinner organizers, no doubt reflecting the hosts, aimed to please. The invitation clearly stated that dietary requirements would be honoured. Our table, which included Frank Dimant and Michael Mostyn of B'nai Brith Canada, had four kosher meals, all served with class. We were all delighted to be in the presence of majesty, and would have willingly gone hungry. For us, the meal was an extra.

That the request for kosher meals was so eagerly and happily carried out reflects what Canada is all about – profound respect for all authentic traditions. We dare not take this for granted. Those whom we thanked for this were most gracious in their response, saying it was nothing. But it was not nothing. It was, and remains, a very significant something of immense importance. So, to the prime minster and his wife, and through them to all Canadians, we say, for this and so many other blessings – "Thank you very much."

Former York student charged

Of course, by calling for their extermination and genocide, I did the right thing."

Saying he is no longer a Canadian citizen, Hossain stated: "At the end of the day, should I get extradited from where I am allegedly located, perhaps maybe assassinated, arrested, locked up or kept in custody, it will make very little difference to the cause. I am inciting Muslims and other anti-western forces who are reading this that should I in any chance get taken down, you will have to push forward the mission of bringing in foreign troops to exterminate the Jews and their allies."

Hawkes said Hossain is facing three counts of promoting hatred against Jews and two counts of advocating genocide. He said Hossain was responsible for "violent, harmful information" on the website and worried it might influence "impressionable young people." He told The CJN there was no indication Hossain was operating in conjunction with any group or organization.

Responding to a reporter's suggestion that Hossain appears to be contemptuous of the charges, Fantino said, "it may be true that the individual is laughing at these charges, but at some point, he'll have to face the music. We will pursue him."

Fantino said that while there may be no extradition treaty with the country where Hossain currently resides – it is believed to be Bangladesh – "there is the opportunity for nations to have sidebar agreements."

Speaking at the news conference, Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber applauded the OPP and the attorney general for proceeding with the case.

"We do not lightly abridge free expression here in Canada, but if any limitation on expression rights can unequivocally be demonstrably justifiable in our society, it must be to prevent the promotion of genocide. History, including that of my community, shows that ethnic cleansing and genocide are built on a foundation of dehumanization, a campaign of visceral hate and propaganda to prepare the ground for the killing field... As such, we must take the threats of Salman Hossain very seriously."

Anita Bromberg, legal counsel for B'nai Brith Canada, said Hossain's website cannot be dismissed as the musings of a single man. His conspiracy mindset is found among Islamic extremists and there was evidence of it at the trial of the Toronto 18, a trial involving 18 people alleged to be members of an Islamist terrorist cell.

Latin America terror links go unreported

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Last week, while most media were focused on the Obama-Netanyahu White House meeting, an interesting item appeared in several Israeli newspapers that deserves greater attention from North American journalists.

The report, first carried in the Kuwaiti newspaper Al-Seyassah on July 6, stated that Mexican officials had thwarted efforts by Hezbollah cells, operating among drug cartels along the U.S.-Mexican border, to establish a logistics infrastructure there.

Citing that same story, Ha'aretz reporter Jack Khouri wrote (July 6) that "Hezbollah operatives employed Mexican nationals with family ties to Lebanon to set up [a] network, designed to target Israel and the West." He also noted that the group's leader, Jameel Nasr, reportedly spent months in Venezuela, whose president Hugo Chavez maintains close ties with Iran, Hezbollah's sponsor.

This is not the first account, however, of Hezbollah activity in North America. As the Jerusalem Post noted (July 6), Anthony Placido, assistant administrator for intelligence at the Drug Enforcement Administration, testified at a U.S. Congressional sub-committee in March "that some drug smugglers in the U.S.-Mexico region have had relationships with Hezbollah [since] the 1980s and 1990s" and that lucrative proceeds from the cocaine trade have been used by Hezbollah and Hamas to fund their terrorist activities.

Imad Mugniyah, killed in a car bombing in Damascus in 2008. He was suspected of directing Hezbollah's South American operations.

U.S. Republican Congresswoman Sue Myrick recently asked U.S. Homeland Security Secretary Janet Napolitano to set up a special team to investigate these allegations and threats. The Post noted a 2006 Homeland Security report that provided details about the arrests of Hezbollah agents trying to infiltrate the United States from Mexico.

Khouri wrote that last year, U.S. Admiral James Stavridis told the Senate armed services committee that Hezbollah had links to drug trafficking in Colombia. Stavridis warned that there has been "an increase in a wide level of activity by the Iranian government in this region."

All of these reports call to mind a riveting, detailed account of Iran and Hezbollah's nefarious activities in South America – the second part of a 15,000-word exposé – that Jeffrey Goldberg wrote for the New Yorker in 2002.

At that time, Imad Mugniyah, head of Hezbollah's "military" wing and a senior officer in Iran's Revolutionary Guard, was considered by many to be the most dangerous terrorist in the world. (He was behind numerous terror attacks, including the 1983 Beirut simultaneous suicide attacks that killed 241 U.S. Marines and 58 French paratroopers. He was killed in a car bombing in Damascus in 2008 in an operation Hezbollah blamed on Israel.)

Indeed, "[i]t is commonly believed," Goldberg wrote, "that Mugniyah [has been] behind nearly every major act of terrorism that has been staged by Hezbollah during the last two decades; he is thought to have agents not only in South America but in Europe, Southeast Asia, West Africa, and even the United States."

Among other things, Mugniyah directed Hezbollah's South American operations.

Goldberg described a region in South America where Hezbollah was most active called the Triple Frontier, a lawless, porous zone where Paraguay, Brazil, and Argentina meet, and which is "the centre of Middle Eastern terrorism in [the continent]." At the heart of this zone, in the region of the Paraguayan city of Ciudad del Este, is "a substantial minority of Arab Muslims" numbering around 30,000, among whom, according to intelligence experts, is "a hard core of terrorists, many of them associated with Hezbollah… some with Hamas… and some with Al Qaeda."

Mugniyah reportedly visited the Triple Frontier in 1994 when Hezbollah, acting for Iran, allegedly planned the suicide bombing of the Jewish community centre in Buenos Aires, "the deadliest anti-Semitic attack since the end of the Second World War," Goldberg observed, in which 85 people were murdered. (Two years before that Hezbollah, Argentine police believe, bombed the Israeli embassy, killing 29.)

Perhaps this is coincidental, but especially since the appearance of Goldberg's article, a number of U.S. defence officials have raised concerns about Iranian influence in South and Central America, where, as Reuters reported in March, last year "the left-wing governments in Venezuela, Cuba, Ecuador, Nicaragua and Bolivia have all become allies of Iran in recent years."

London's Temple Israel welcomes new rabbi

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Like her predecessor, Rabbi Debra Dressler is a second-career rabbi.

Last month, she began to lead services at Temple Israel in London, Ont., and on July 1, she officially succeeded Rabbi Joël Wittstein, who died in January at age 74 of cancer, as the 140-family congregation's spiritual leader.

Rabbi Debra Dressler

A graduate of the Wharton School of the University of Pennsylvania, the 42-year-old rabbi used her business background for nine years working in circulation and direct marketing for non-profit magazines in Washington, D.C.

Her Jewish journey is "kind of an interesting story," she said in a recent phone interview. An adopted child who grew up in a non-Jewish family in Lansing, Mich., she found out in her early 20s that her birth mother was Jewish, which means she's Jewish according to Jewish law.

"A lot of things clicked for me," said Rabbi Dressler, whose first close contact with Judaism was through Jewish friends in college. Her birth mother's Jewish background was all the excuse she needed to learn more, she said.

Five years after enrolling in an introduction to Judaism class at a Reform temple, she took part in an affirmation service – "basically a conversion without the converting part," she said.

In Washington, she served as assistant executive director at Adas Israel Congregation, a large Conservative synagogue. "I learned all sorts of things," she said. "It was absolutely invaluable."

Last year, Rabbi Dressler was ordained by Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati. The mother of three daughters spent five years as a rabbinic intern at Cincinnati's Isaac M. Wise Temple while she was a student, and also taught at Reform supplementary schools before she moved to London in June.

In her new role, her priorities are "to come in and fill the void that the death of Rabbi Wittstein left."

Rabbi Michal Shekel of Toronto served as the temple's interim rabbi, and congregants "did a fantastic job" of keeping the synagogue going, Rabbi Dressler said. "It's a strong community… [but] they're ready to have a rabbi take it back."

Rabbi Dressler, who has an interest and background in young families and education, will serve as principal of the temple's religious school, as did Rabbi Wittstein.

Being a rabbi means, among other duties, leading services, teaching adults and children, celebrating life cycle events, and participating in community events, Rabbi Dressler said. "It's a lot of hats, and that's what I love about it."

As well, she said, she admires her new congregation's commitment to education and community involvement. In a broader context, she added, "London is a wonderful town, and a great place for my family." She has already met with Conservative and Orthodox colleagues to discuss joint educational programming.

Aside from family trips to Manitoulin Island when she was growing up, Rabbi Dressler had no previous Canadian connection.

Between Canada Day and a recent celebration for the synagogue's 25th anniversary, she said, "It was quite a whirlwind introduction."

Pregnant wife, cheating husband

Family Matters

John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.

Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator

Question: I am pregnant with my first child and I have been separated from my husband for a month. We have been married for under two years. Back in June I found out he had an affair. I am trying to understand what my rights are legally for custody. I want primary care of this child. I do not want to share custody 50/50 at this point because I don't think that would be good for a new child. I want my soon-to-be ex-husband to have access to the child. I am so confused and frightened that I am going to lose custody of my unborn child.

Answer: Won't happen. If you give birth, stay home with the child, especially if you nurse the child and don't run back to work, you will likely be considered the primary caregiver, if not the parent with sole custody (the next best thing). I get so many letters like yours. It's almost an epidemic. The moment husbands leave their wives or partners, especially for another woman (or man), certain pregnant women feel so abandoned and emotionally abused that they automatically feel their self-respect has been totally taken away. Accordingly, it is only natural for them to feel this same person is going to take away their baby too.

However, despite the Divorce Act's emphasis on the need for children to have maximum contact with both parents, the courts tend to favour mothers having primary care and control of infants, if not sole custody. Now, if a mother happens to be drug or alcohol dependent, suffering from an extreme case of post-partum depression or some other severe emotional disorder, then there are going to be exceptions where dads will get primary control of infants. Moreover, there are career-oriented mothers, such as certain professionals or business types, who flee back to work shortly after giving birth and whose ex-husbands share residential care of infants without problems. But you don't appear to fit into these categories, so stop worrying because it could affect your health and the health of your fetus.

Question: I let my misbehaved 16 year-old daughter, who's flunking school, stay with her angry pot-smoking dad and his la-lah wife. Now the summer is over. She won't come home to my more disciplined environment. They're thrilled because, for a change, I'll be paying child support to them. What can I do and what's in store?

Answer: You'll pay. But they'll be begging to have you take her back.

Seven MPs tour Israel

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Seven MPs took their first trips to Israel last week.

Conservative MPs John Duncan, Jeff Watson, Edward Fast and Brent Rathgeber, along with Liberal MPs Scott Simms and Anthony Rota and NDP MP Glenn Thibeault, all toured the country courtesy of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC).

They were scheduled to return to Canada on July 12.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the CIC said the trip, like most offered by his organization, aims to bring both new and relatively new parliamentarians to Israel.

Duncan, the elder statesman on the trip, has been an MP for 15 years.

The trips focus primarily on those MPs who "show promise of exceptionally successful political careers. Namely, that they will advance within their particular party and play influential roles in the overall development of party policy," Fogel said.

He added that the trips expose all participants to "a myriad" of perspectives on issues of the day, including political and religious views from the right, left and centre, as well as from Jews, Christians, Muslims, Israelis and Palestinians.

Shimon Fogel

"They spend time in Jerusalem and Ramallah meeting with political leadership. They are briefed by academics, journalists, NGOs and security analysts They receive a military briefing and get a sense of the non-conflict related sides of Israel," such as business, culture, social issues and tourism, Fogel said.

"Over the years, the CIC missions have developed a reputation as the most outstanding travel experience parliamentarians have the opportunity to join, and the trip that is most balanced in the information and range of perspectives they get to encounter."

Mormons violate their church policy

MONTREAL — The "handful" of Mormons who continue to baptize Jews posthumously are violating church policy, says a senior member of the Utah-based religious movement. Mark Paredes, who sits on the Mormons' High Council in Santa Monica, Calif., and speaks for the church on Mormon-Jewish relations, was guest speaker along with Rabbi Schachar Orenstein of the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue at what is described as the first ever formal dialogue between Quebec Jewish Congress (QJC) and the Mormon church in this province.

Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto

A Great School

The President, Board of Directors and Board of Governors of Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto mourn the loss of our dearest friend

Loving mother, grandmother and great-grandmother

As part of a lifetime of involvement with Associated, Dr. Dessen was a student at the Brunswick Talmud Torah, served the school as a teacher, as chair of the Va'ad HaChinuch (Education Committee), as a member of various committees and as a generous supporter. In recognition of her tremendous efforts, Eva was made a life member of Associated's Board of Directors. Her dedication to Associated reflected the commitment of her family including her late parents and her late husband, Harold Dessen ז"ל, who served as the School's President. Their children and grandchildren have continued the legacy as educators and lay leaders at Associated.

Her passion for learning and her support of Jewish education and the children of Associated Hebrew Schools were inspirational. She will be sorely missed.

We extend our sincere sympathy and condolences to the Dessen, Pearl and Friedberg families.

Educator facilitated exchanges with Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Eva Dessen, Jewish educator and former executive director of Canadian Professors for Peace in the Middle East (CPPME), died of lymphoma July 2 at St. Michael's Hospital in Toronto, following a five-month illness. She was 87.

A native of Lodz, Poland who arrived in Toronto at age four, she attended Central High School of Commerce and became a bookkeeper, but "her hunger for knowledge would not let go," said Dessen's brother Rabbi Benjamin Friedberg in a eulogy.

Eva Dessen

As a high school student, Dessen worked to contribute to the household income, putting money aside only to buy a few classical records, he said. She was the oldest of five children whose father worked as a milkman before opening a store on Queen Street.

It wasn't until Dessen was in her mid-30s, with children of her own, that she enrolled in a course at the University of Toronto to begin studying for her BA. More than a decade later, she completed her PhD in medieval Jewish commentaries.

As a lecturer at York University, she taught biblical Hebrew.

Dessen loved to teach, her brother said, recalling that Dessen spent hours preparing lectures for the informal study group Chug Tanach (Bible Circle) that she was involved in.

Rabbi Friedberg said his sister lived "a life of vigour, activity, intelligence and achievement... She was larger than life."

He recalled the discipline that underscored her physical fitness routines – walking, tennis and aquafitness – as well as her academic pursuits.

As well, he spoke of his sister's warmth and hospitality. "What a heart," he said. "Her home was everyone's home... Whoever she met became part of her extended family."

Dessen's daughter Serena told The CJN that her mother made friends wherever she went. "She truly loved most people, and hated any kind of conflict."

As executive director of CPPME – a multifaith organization of university professors who studied the place of Israel in the Middle East – from its early days in the mid-1970s, Dessen raised funds, published and edited the organization's magazine, The Focus; and led tours to Israel, Jordan and Egypt.

She also facilitated "the most wonderful cultural events – dinner parties in her house, social events – and she would serve wonderful meals, with Beethoven playing in the background," said political scientist David Goldberg, who took over from from Dessen as CPPME's executive director in 1987.

Goldberg remembers his predecessor as a friend and adviser who was "very young in spirit and very young in body. She kept herself in superb condition, and her mind was extraordinarily sharp."

Dessen built CPPME, which was disbanded after the 1991 Madrid peace conference, "from virtually nothing," Goldberg said. If it were still functioning, he added, "I would suggest to you, without exaggeration, that the level and intensity of anti-Israel activism would not be as high."

SIDS and cancer opened doors, TV doctor says

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

In adversity, there's also opportunity, says Dr. Marla Shapiro, a physician, author, columnist and television personality.

Speaking last month at the Canadian Friends of Laniado Hospital Ontario region's 16th annual Dr. Joseph Weil memorial lecture, sponsored by Steeles Memorial Chapel, Shapiro said she learned that lesson after her 5-1/2-month-old son died of sudden infant death syndrome (SIDS) in 1993.

"When my son died, I was totally unprepared [for the grief], but as time went on, I knew I had to do something positive with Jason's death."

She said that a year later, Back to Sleep, a campaign that began in 1994 as a way to educate parents, caregivers, and health-care providers about ways to reduce the risk of SIDS, asked her to tell her story and be the face of the campaign.

"[Jason's] death created the opportunity for me to educate thousands of parents. When one door closed, another was waiting to be opened. I recognized that we could do something as a result of his death."

Dr. Marla Shapiro

When she was diagnosed with breast cancer in 1994, she said, she had her battle documented by camera crews and wrote the bestseller Life in Balance.

"The crew moved in for 12 months, and we told our story in the form of a documentary. I did not hear what my daughter said until the final cut, but she said that breast cancer changed our relationship. In this moment of adversity, breast cancer kept me in the house, and it changed the nature of our relationship."

Shapiro said that throughout her surgeries and chemotherapy, she knew it was important to keep laughing. "Don't allow yourself to suspend life, waiting to get back to normal. This is your new normal."

Breast cancer gave her the opportunity to re-examine life, she said. "I learned that you cannot lose your voice, and you cannot give your power away. The only power you have is self-knowledge and self control.

"When you make a decision, make sure it is a priority. Every time you say 'no' to something, you're saying 'yes' to something else."

As a physician, she said, she recognized that she had never asked her patients how they really felt. "This too was a door that opened."

Shapiro said that no matter what your challenges, "you get to pick how you respond, and what you do with it. Self-knowledge is empowerment, and whatever adversity you face, you have the power to keep well the road."

Support for pro-Israel programming on campus grows

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

Jewish student groups should find themselves with more support next fall with the opening of the Canadian Network for Israel Affairs (CNIA), said the group's managing director, Sammy Katz.

The network, which launched last month, came out of a need for a shift toward more pro-Israel programming on Canadian campuses with a focus on the relationship between Canada and Israel, he said.

"The reason to go forward with it now is that there's a void on Canadian university campuses... where Israel programming consists of a couple of programs per semester," he said.

He admitted there are pro-Israel groups on campuses already, but one hurdle often hinders their efforts: a lack of funding.

"Students shouldn't have to feel like money is an issue when they want to promote Israel on campus," he said. "You should be building the connections rather than having to worry about pinching every penny."

The Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CFJS) is one of the student groups currently active on campus. Paige MacPherson, vice-president, external, for CFJS, said she has never seen a proposal turned down due to lack of funding.

She also said the CFJS has created alliances with many Jewish and non-Jewish campus initiatives. But she said it's great to see even more pro-Israel groups on campus.

"Anytime a new group comes on to the scene, it's a good thing because tackling the issues that Jewish and pro-Israel students face on campus is a big task to take on," she said, adding that CFJS is completely in favour of "any group that responsively and positively contributes."

CNIA is made up of a professional advisory board, a professional staff team, and students who sit on the advisory board, said Tyler Golden, development co-ordinator for CNIA. They will also work with existing student groups on campus.

They're based in Toronto and are working with all of the major campuses in the Toronto area he said, but "the goal of the organization is to grow across the country."

Katz said donations to CNIA come from private donors whose only requirement is that the money be spent on Israel programming, he said, explaining that the students can use it however they like.

Golden declined to provide more information on who the donors are.

CNIA's first campaign took place on Twitter, in which the network encouraged users to urge the Red Cross to meet with Gilad Schalit, who Hamas has held in captivity for the past four years, to ensure his human rights are upheld.

The Twitter users would tweet, or post on their account, #MeetWithShalit @RedCross. The hash tag refers to the topic (meaning people can search for #MeetWithShalit) and the @ sign means the message is directed at the Red Cross.

Katz said the June 25 campaign exceeded his expectations, with more than 1,000 people posting the message.

"The whole idea is to utilize new media when it comes to Israel activism in ways that haven't been used before," he said.

Although the Red Cross has asked Hamas several times to allow a visit to Schalit, its requests have been denied, including a recent request around the time of the Twitter campaign, said Tyler Golden, development co-ordinator for CNIA.

The group wants to put pressure on the Red Cross not to take no for an answer from a "terrorist organization," Katz said.

CNIA's first campaign took place on Twitter, in which the network encouraged users to urge the Red Cross to meet with Schalit

Golden said there are many more programs in the works, but the group is not ready to share details as the programs haven't been finalized.

However, he added the next confirmed event is the Pitch for Israel, a late-August Toronto charity fundraiser for the One Family Fund, which helps families and children in Israel whose lives have been affected by terrorism. CNIA will act as an organizational sponsor.

The Pacific Torah Institute and Toronto mayoral candidate Rocco Rossi endorsed the network through a letter of support.

"We're looking forward to an incredible year of pro-Israel programming on campus that reflects Canadian students," Katz said.

And there's nothing wrong with more Israel advocacy groups on campus, said Jay Solomon, manager of campus advocacy for the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy.

"There's lots of work to be done," he said. "Anyone who wants to counter a lot of the anti-Israel sentiments that we see on campus is certainly free to do so."

Dessen taught at Associated

CPPME and Canadian Academic Friends for Peace in the Middle East (also now defunct), facilitated exchange programs for Canadian academics to go to Israel, and provided a presence of Israeli academics on campus, Goldberg said.

"Eva recognized that these academics were being underutilized... CPPME effectively adopted these academics."

Dessen and her husband Harold – who died in 2002 after 59 years of marriage – were supporters of Associated Hebrew Schools, where Dessen taught kindergarten before returning to university. An alumna of the school's cheder before it became a Jewish day school, Dessen was a life member of the school's board of directors. AHS honoured the couple at its 2001 annual meeting with a lifetime achievement award.

Dessen leaves her daughters Serena Dessen and Susan Pearl, two grandchildren, four great-grandchildren, siblings Lillian Lerman, Rabbi Benjamin Friedberg, Sally Zerker and Pearl Hermant, and friend Wilf Rovan.

Yummy muffins hit the 'sweet spot'

By DOROTHY LIPOVENKO
Special to the CJN

Muffins are the "gitte neshamahs" (good souls) of baking. Tolerant to a fault, they can take a little more or less of an ingredient, overzealous whisking or even a few extra minutes in the oven and still come out just fine.

That's why these simple treats are the stars of my baking repertoire. Relying on feel and intuition in the kitchen, I lack the discipline necessary for more ambitious projects; in other words, I'm too lazy to measure and sift, cream and fold, or heaven forbid, dirty more than one mixing bowl.

Muffins suit my culinary style, with bonus points for quick assembly, fast cleanup and being equally delicious in a lunch bag or on the dessert table. What's more, they adapt particularly well to pareve substitutions, easily swapping milk for orange juice and peanut butter (or oil) for dairy butter.

And while not cheap in calories, muffins hit the "sweet spot" without copious amounts of sugar, and can be relied on to bake up moist without too much fat.

The recipe I turn to week in and week out (excluding Pesach) are cranberry chip muffins, whose 'aha!' moment came when peanut butter stepped in as the understudy for regular butter. At the height of cranberry season in fall, I buy two dozen bags to stash in the freezer for a ready supply year-round.

Cranberry and chocolate are a great couple. To elevate these muffins to a Shabbat treat, toss in some whole almonds for crunch.

CRANBERRY CHIP MUFFINS

To 4 tablespoons of light sour cream in a mixing bowl, stir in 1/4 teaspoon of baking soda. When the mixture foams, add 1 teaspoon pure vanilla (or 2 teaspoons imitation vanilla extract), 4 tablespoons sugar, one large egg and 3 tablespoons smooth or chunky peanut butter (I use chunky). Blend well with a wire whisk, then gently whisk in 1/3 cup low-fat milk.

To this batter stir in 2/3 cup white flour, 1/2 cup Robin Hood Nutriflour, and 1-1/2 teaspoons baking powder until blended. Sprinkle in 3-4 tablespoons of good quality dark or milk chocolate chips.

Wash about 1-1/4 cups frozen whole cranberries; drain and place on two sheets of paper towels and blot dry very well. (Damp berries gum up the works.) Toss cranberries into the dough, dusting them with a teaspoon of flour to absorb excess moisture. Work berries and chips into the dough with several strokes of a wooden spoon. (If the mixture feels too thick, blend in a teaspoon of milk.)

Lightly spray six medium foil baking cups with non-stick coating. Scoop batter into muffin cups, filling each about two-thirds full. (You can stretch the batter to yield one or two more muffins if the muffins are smaller.) Bake in a pre-heated oven at 350 until nicely browned, about 30 minutes.

When cool, store muffins in the fridge wrapped in plastic or foil. (I use a wax paper bag from breakfast cereal.) If using fresh cranberries, freeze them first because like frozen blueberries, they "burst" while baking, intensifying their flavour. These muffins taste even better the next day and also freeze well. Thaw at room temperature.

When cartoons go bad

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Benjamin Israel calls it the "best cartoon you've never seen." He would, seeing as he's the creator of The Dark Comedy, a clever twist on the rote superhero cartoons we've all come to know throughout the years.

In his cartoon world, heroes such as Batman and Robin don't dust up the criminals with ingenious detective work. Superman doesn't swoop in all red-caped and earnest to save the day. No, Israel's idea is something different. His cartoon showcases the super-criminals, depicting them excelling in all their nefarious endeavours, at least in between incarcerations.

"It's more a parody than anything else," Israel said in May, all smiles after coming off a preview screening of his series idea at the annual Anime North convention in Toronto.

As his cartoon's website attests: "Finally, a good old-fashioned superhero cartoon – without all that pesky truth and justice."

The series is set in the fictional metropolis of Diversis City. A seemingly lawful town that's really just one huge criminal playground.

Anyone halfway familiar with the world of superhero comics will recognize some familiar riffs on classic characters when looking through Israel's animated cast.

First there's Jeff Jesterman, a.k.a. Deadpan, the series' main antagonist. A deranged, psycho-genius who's impossible to predict.

Then there's his partner and wife, Mary-Anne Treiksy, or Mary-Anne Tricksy, who had to make a choice the day a vat of chemicals left her husband criminally insane: either ditch him or stay slavishly, obliviously loyal. She chose the latter.

Then we meet Thomas William Niskin, known as The Con, a man who can charm anyone out of their valuables and feel the warm fuzzies while doing it. The character's feel and look was based on Wesley from the movie The Princess Bride, Israel noted.

Benjamin Israel, a voice actor, grimaces as he performs his craft.

Lastly, there's Samantha Seter, a.k.a. Quizzy Qal, a lone gunwoman type, conspiracy theorist and the series' main kosher ingredient.

Israel said it was important for him to establish a Jewish character from the outset to allow some of his upbringing into his story arcs.

It was the first character he wrote for the series.

"She's paranoid and she's right," Israel said. "Her father calls her Shoshanna in one episode, and throughout the series, we drop little hints about her Jewishness, like the fact she won't eat pork when the other criminals go out to dine and order pig products. I would have made Deadpan Jewish, but he needed to be Italian and part of the Mafia for his story to work."

And of course, what would a city full of supervillains be without the requisite superhero to foil their diabolical plans? Turns out, in Israel's world, not much.

Enter The Silver Hammer, vigilante do-gooder and bumbling idiot who couldn't apprehend a shoplifter if it meant saving his life.

A Toronto voice actor himself – he voices Deadpan, among others – Israel, 25, said he first developed the series idea while brainstorming with fellow acting students and friends while he studied at Humber College acting school in 2007.

He said he was thrust into the world of voice acting in 2003 after a chance meeting with an industry legend at that year's Anime North convention.

There, he met Scott McNeil, a Vancouver-based voice actor who's voiced thousands of cartoon characters. Israel's natural talent managed to make an impression.

"Something clicked between us," Israel said. "He told me, 'You have to do what I do.' As a little kid, I always did voices. So when a voice actor like McNeil told me I could make a living at it, I thought, 'Cool!'"

Following McNeil's advice, in 2005 Israel entered the Vancouver Film School to voice train. He's been hooked ever since.

Now that he's written and developed a series where he can indulge in his passion, all Israel needs is some exposure and someone with deep pockets willing to take a chance on his idea, he said.

Over the last three years, he's been told by veteran cartoon industry executives that his idea is solid, but that as an unknown, he has no caché in their circles.

One studio did say they'd pick up his series, but only if he dumbed it down.

"They said it was too highbrow for their audience," Israel lamented. He refused the offer.

Not that he's unwilling to modify or completely rescript his story, if that's what it takes to get the series made, Israel admitted.

"I've designed The Dark Comedy in a way that it could be made into as many products as possible. If it doesn't work out as a TV show, it could be a comic book," he said. "If only I can get some investors, then the networks can pick what they'd like. My only criteria is that I just need to [remain] the head writer."

In the meantime, Israel is funding his project out of his own pocket, paying his cast from money earned doing voice-overs for and acting in commercials and other gigs.

While he loves his work, he cautioned aspiring voice actors to be prepared to tough out an industry that isn't always kind to newcomers.

"It's not as easy as one thinks. You can go to a thousand auditions and not get the role. But it's that one role you do get that makes you forget the other 999," Israel said. "Also, don't do it because you want to become famous. You won't. Do it because you love it. Most importantly, do not become jaded. You'll be told you're not good enough, but don't let that hurt you. Hold on to your ideas."

Netanyahu meets with the Schalits

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

Immediately after their return from Washington last week Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his wife Sara met with Gilad Schalit's parents, Noam and Aviva in the prime minister's residence in Jerusalem. [Israel Sun photo]

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu met with the family of abducted Israel Defence Forces soldier Gilad Schalit upon the prime minister's return to Israel from a visit to the United States, Israeli Army Radio reported last Friday.

Schalit was captured by Gaza militants in a 2006 cross-border raid and has been held by Hamas, the rulers of Gaza, for the last four years. Hamas has demanded the release of hundreds of Palestinian prisoners held in Israel in exchange for his release.

According to Army Radio, Netanyahu phoned the Schalit family from his plane en route to Israel and invited them to meet him at his official residence in Jerusalem on Friday afternoon. The family accepted.

The family had spent the last two weeks marching from their home in the Galilee to Netanyahu's official residence in Jerusalem, where they set up a protest tent where they plan to live until Gilad is released in a prisoner swap with Hamas.

Thousands of Israelis joined the Schalits along the way, and 15,000 attended the rally last Thursday evening that marked the end of the march in Jerusalem.

A senior member of the campaign to free Schalit denied that the family agreed to meet with Netanyahu only if he would offer new ideas for their son's release, calling reports to that effect inaccurate "to say the least."

After 12 days of what turned out to be the largest protest march in Israel, organizers of the campaign said that while they were satisfied with the public response, it was dwarfed by the knowledge that Schalit is not yet home.

The organizers admitted they had worried that the turnout for the march would be smaller, and said the response proved that the Israeli public overwhelmingly supports their cause.

A turning point for the campaign was the speech last week in which Netanyahu said that he supported a prisoner exchange deal, but not at any price. Noam Schalit, Gilad's father, accused Netanyahu of presenting nightmare scenarios to the public. The next day, 17,000 people joined the march in what its organizers called an unequivocal response to the prime minister.

Thousands of Israelis joined the Schalits along the way, and 15,000 attended the rally in Jerusalem

The number of marchers changed daily. Only Gilad's parents and brother, respectively, walked the entire 220-kilometre route from the family's home in the north to Jerusalem. Organizers said 15,000 people marched on the first day, 17,000 marchers entered Tel Aviv and 25,000 people joined the last day of the march in Jerusalem. Rough estimates spoke of more than 200,000 people who attended various parts of the march, including associated rallies and concerts.

At the closing rally on Thursday night, Aviva Schalit, Gilad's mother, implored Netanyahu: "Don't abandon my son. Act courageously to free him," adding, "After four years there are no more excuses – 1,474 days of hardship and pain my son has endured in Hamas captivity. The time has come to say 'Stop! Enough!'"

Addressing her remarks to Netanyahu she added: "The people have spoken. Bibi, don't ignore us."

She referred to the unwritten pact between the state and parents who send their children to the army that the government will do everything in its power to bring its soldiers home.

Interior Minister Eli Yishai of the Shas party joined the march outside Jerusalem.

Meanwhile, British Zionist youth movements have gathered thousands of signatures calling for Schalit's release. British citizens have been signing the petition this week in front of the British prime minister's official residence at 10 Downing St. in London. A different youth group has gathered signatures each day.

Some British lawmakers have signed the petition, according to Zak Jeffay, B'nei Akiva's U.K. director.

Rabbi Yehuda Amital dies at 86

By YAIR ETTINGER

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Rabbi Yehuda Amital, a former Israeli cabinet minister and founder of the Meimad movement, died last Thursday night at his home in Jerusalem after battling an illness. He was 86.

The funeral was held Friday at Jerusalem's Har Hamenuchot cemetery.

Rabbi Amital, who headed the Har Etzion joint army-yeshiva program, was considered a moderate among religious Zionists and was known for his support of a land swap with the Palestinians in return for a peace agreement.

Rabbi Yehuda Amital

Rabbi Amital was born in 1924 in Hungary and immigrated to Israel at the age of 16, just before the outbreak of World War II.

During the War of Independence in 1948, he enlisted in the Israel Defence Forces and was a fighter in brigade 7.

In 1988, he was a founding member of the Meimad movement – an acronym for Medina Yehudit, Medina Demokratit, (Jewish and Democratic State), and in 1995, he was appointed minister without portfolio in then-prime minister Shimon Peres' government.

Former ambassador aims to fire up Israel-Canada trade

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

When Benjamin Netanyahu visited Stephen Harper last May, he was the first Israeli prime minister to visit a Canadian prime minister since Yitzhak Rabin visited Jean Chrétien in 1994.

Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty brought a high-level delegation of life-science professionals to Israel last May.

Canada and Israel issued a joint postage stamp last April, and last February, the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange (TASE) signed a memorandum of understanding with the Toronto Stock Exchange (TSE).

A memorandum of understanding is a formal alternative to a "gentlemen's agreement," which relies on the honour of the parties for its fulfilment.

The Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement celebrated its 10th anniversary in 2007. That year, the Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation celebrated its 13th anniversary; the Canada-Israel Space memorandum of understanding was signed, and the Canada-Israeli Industrial Co-operation Agreement, for the defence sector, was made. Currently, bilateral trade between the two countries stands at well above $1.4 billion.

By all counts, it looks like relations with Canada-Israel are warmer than ever. So why does Alan Baker, the former Israeli ambassador to Canada and current president of the Tel Aviv-based Israel-Canada Chamber of Commerce (ICCC), which aims to encourage commercial relations between the two countries, say they're not nearly warm enough? Baker's reply is that the current state of Canadian-Israeli affairs is just the tip of the iceberg.

Israel has so much to offer Canada: water and military and medical technology, he said. And Canada has so much to offer Israel: heavy industry, oil, diamonds, water and textiles. Not to mention the incredible mutual potential of importing and exporting to each other's markets, he said.

"With all of the frameworks that we have in place, the relationship is underutilized," said Baker, a partner of the law firm Moshe, Bloomfield, Kobo, Baker & Co. in Tel Aviv. "In my opinion, the potential should be 200 per cent of what there is right now."

What accounts for this underutilization? According to Baker, many things. For starters, there are problems on a diplomatic level.

"The Israeli government doesn't treat Canada as a serious country," said Baker. Prime Minister Netanyahu's recent visit aside, when Baker was ambassador, Baker says he used to beg the prime minister – first Ariel Sharon, and then Ehud Olmert – to pop by Ottawa en route to one of their monthly visits to Washington, D.C. "I told them, 'It will cost you half a day, and you will be expressing gratitude and seriousness to Canada, one of Israel's best friends and greatest supporters in the UN.' But it never happened."

Israel's military attaché to Canada sits in Washington, yet visits Ottawa only once or twice a year. This is a big problem, Baker said, since Canada's chief of staff is rejuvenating the army and opening up security contract bids to non-U.S. players. "There is no ongoing Israeli [military] presence in Canada at a time when Canada is ready to absorb Israeli technology like a sponge."

Baker said the "Israeli government treats Canada like a second-rate country after the U.S. and the countries of Europe… It's one of the richest and one of the largest. I don't understand why Israel doesn't get this."

On the Canadian government side, there are problems, as well. "The Canadian diplomatic service could do more advertising for Canada," said Baker. He said the service hasn't managed to get the Canadian government and Foreign Ministry to exert sufficient influence in Israel. "Israelis have got huge potential, but they need encouragement from the Canadian side. It's a two-way thing."

However, that was a bigger issue a year and a half ago, before the Israeli economy started to pick up and Canada started to perk up its ears to Israel's potential. Around that time, Baker began to work on re-establishing the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce (CICC), the ICCC's sister chamber, located in Toronto. Now headed by attorney David Rubin, the CICC has developed into a thriving, 1,000 member organization of Canadian businesspeople interested in doing business with Israel.

Alan Baker heads the Israel-Canada Chamber of Commerce.

Re-establishing the ICCC, which Baker started to do about a year ago, has been a greater challenge. The 15-year-old organization had been dormant since 2004. Membership had dwindled, and for the last year, Baker has tried to breathe new life into it.

"It is much more difficult to do here [in Israel] than it was to do in Canada. It's easy in Canada to find enthusiasm for investing in and doing business in Israel. There's an element of Zionism. But it's also not primarily a Zionist enterprise. Canadians know that Israel is a powerhouse in terms of technology, medicine and science," said Baker.

"The reverse isn't true. There is no 'opposite direction Zionism.' And an Israeli company won't look to do business in Canada because they believe in Canada. They will do business in Canada because there's a good market, or good financing, and on that level, it's very difficult for Canada to compete with China, India and the U.S."

He added that Israelis simply aren't aware of the potential that Canada offers. That's where the chamber comes in. "We want to encourage Israelis to look in the direction of Canada rather than the Far East or the U.S."

The Israeli economy improved during the Second Lebanon War, proving that the economy could thrive during a period of political and military instability, but that was not always evident to Canadians.

The Canadian media doesn't help, said Baker, "The average Canadian… tune into the CBC or CTV, or open the Globe and Mail and see negative stuff about Israel."

Baker doesn't hold Canadian media bias solely responsible for that. He said it has to do with Israel's entire public relations approach, as well. "The whole concept of 'hasbara' [literally 'to explain'] is apologetics. New Zealand doesn't have to explain anything, France doesn't explain itself, Russia doesn't explain itself. Why do we always have to explain what we're doing?" asked Baker. "Why doesn't Israel project itself as an economic powerhouse?"

If Canadians knew that cherry tomatoes were developed by Israeli scientists; or that the chip inside their BlackBerry came from Israel; or that when they went for a blood test or an X-ray, Israeli technology is used; or that the metal disks inside the engines of jets were produced by an Israeli company, it would change the way Canadians see Israel, he said.

Added to the mutual problems of perception is a clash of business cultures. While Israelis are innovative and full of good ideas, their lack of formality and impatience is often construed as brash and disturbing by their Canadian counterparts. On the other hand, polite, conservative, more bureaucratic Canadian business culture can be seen as dispassionate, heavy, and square by Israelis.

Baker has dedicated significant chamber resources to educating Israelis about how to do business in Canada.

This past February, he organized an event, co-sponsored by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the Canadian Embassy, at the Dan Hotel in Tel Aviv, which was attended by representatives of some 100 Israeli businesses. "It showed me there is interest out there," says Baker.

The chamber co-hosted an event at the Leon Recanati Graduate School of Business Administration at Tel Aviv University in February, to orient Israelis about the specifics pertaining to listing on the TSE.

Baker would like to conduct similar educational events that host Canadian experts in Be'er Sheva, Haifa and Jerusalem.

He wants to boost the number of business missions the chamber sends to Canada from various sectors, including medicine, agriculture, computers, space, security, water, and even wine-making.

Israel Briefs

Gadhafi tests blockade

The son of Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi has organized a humanitarian boat to sail from Greece to Gaza in an effort to break Israel's naval blockade of the coastal territory, AFP reported July 9. The Gadhafi International Charity and Development Association, headed by Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi, said its Hope cargo ship was expected to set set sail July 9, organizers said. The ship was to carry "about 2,000 tons of humanitarian aid" and "a number of supporters who are keen on expressing solidarity with the Palestinian people in the plight amidst the siege imposed on Gaza," organizers said. Israel eased its three-year land blockade of Gaza last month, after international pressure following the violence May 31 in the interdiction of the six-ship "freedom flotilla," in which nine Turkish citizens were killed.

Guns missing

Israel's Shin Bet confirmed that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's security detail lost four handguns during a flight from New York to Washington. The Glock 9 mm pistols were packed in a suitcase of a security official for Netanyahu that was lost at John F. Kennedy Airport in New York, WNBC-TV first reported July 6. The Shin Bet, Israel's domestic security agency, confirmed the missing weapons the next day. The luggage was discovered July 6 in Los Angeles, minus the handguns. Police at Kennedy Airport are investigating whether the guns were stolen in New York or after the suitcase arrived in Los Angeles. Israeli security also is investigating. Travellers must pack handguns in checked luggage, according to U.S. Transportation Security Administration protocol. Netanyahu met U.S. President Barack Obama last week at the White House.

Munich planner dies

The Palestinian terror group leader who said he planned the kidnapping of Israeli athletes at the 1972 Munich Olympics has died. Mohammed Daoud Odeh, also known as Abu Daoud, former leader of the Palestinian Black September group, died July 3 in Damascus of kidney failure at 73. He was eulogized by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. "He is missed," Abbas said. "He was one of the leading figures of Fatah and spent his life in resistance and sincere work, as well as physical sacrifice for his people's just causes." Eleven Israeli athletes, including U.S. citizen David Berger, were kidnapped and later killed during the abduction. Five Palestinians and a German police officer also died. Odeh oversaw the plans of the raid, which he disclosed in a 1999 book titled Palestine: From Jerusalem to Munich. But he said he didn't order the killing of Israeli athletes. He was the object of an assassination attempt in 1981, reportedly by Israel's Mossad intelligence agency, but survived. After the Munich Olympics, he fled to eastern Europe, and also would live in Lebanon and Jordan. He moved to Ramallah in 1993 following the Oslo accords, but was banned from returning following the publication of his book. He and his family resettled in Syria, the only country that would take him.

Soldiers face punishment

A YouTube video of Israeli soldiers dancing on a deserted street in Hebron has gone viral and may result in disciplinary action. The clip shows six soldiers from the Nahal Brigade in full battle gear walking down an empty street with the sound of a muezzin calling Muslims to prayer in the background. The soldiers then begin a one-minute choreographed dance to the Kesha song Tik Tok. The clip was removed July 5 by its original poster, who titled it "Israeli soldiers rock the Casbah in Hebron," but it has reappeared on YouTube and other websites. The soldiers are expected to be punished for inappropriate conduct, Ha'aretz reported.

Israel exposes intelligence

By AVI ISSACHAROFF and AMOS HAREL
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Four years after the end of the Second Lebanon War, the Northern Command of the Israel Defence Forces did something unusual last week: a great deal of valuable intelligence information about the Lebanese town of al-Hiyam, presumably gathered over a long period of time, was sacrificed for a much greater purpose. The command revealed to the media, in great detail, Hezbollah military preparations in the southeast Lebanon town, including accurate maps, photographs and information about Hezbollah military installations situated near civilian buildings, such as schools and hospitals.

The move wasn't solely in the service of Israel's public relations. The head of the strategic division of the IDF Planning Branch, Brig.-Gen. Yossi Hayman, presented it in June at United Nations headquarters. This is a battle for political legitimacy and credibility. Israel is planning for the next round of fighting in the north and assumes that it will involve hard combat with Hezbollah, which has moved most of its bunkers, command centres and rocket stores in southern Lebanon out of fields and into the 160 Shiite Muslim villages and towns in the area. In doing so, the organization is implementing lessons that came out of combat in Lebanon in 2006 and Gaza in 2008.

Analysis

The publication of detailed information about Hezbollah's intentions sends the organization a clear warning of what it can expect to face if it starts a war, while preparing the international community for the measures the IDF is likely to take.

The optimists believe Hezbollah will think twice before starting a provocation (in part because it is now aware of the extent of Israeli intelligence penetration of its ranks).The pessimists assume that, at the very least, the international community will have a head's-up about what Israel is confronting and its need to act forcefully against an enemy that operates from within civilian population centres while targeting Israel's own civilian population.

The disclosures could expose Israeli intelligence-gathering techniques. They will also cause Hezbollah to change its preparations, at least in al-Hiyam. The IDF apparently concluded that in view of what's at stake, the price was one worth paying. The issue is directly linked to statements during a recent lecture by GOC Northern Command Maj.-Gen. Gadi Eizenkot. He said Israel's enemies have come to believe that Israel's rear bases and civilian population are the weak points that balances out its military superiority.

One could draw an indirect connection with the recent report of the Military Advocate General of investigations into alleged violations of the laws of war during Operation Cast Lead. The IDF is investigating itself and trying individual soldiers and officers for violating combat doctrine, insisting all the while that its combat methods are legitimate.

At that same lecture, Eizenkot presented the IDF's program for countering the Hezbollah threat: warning civilian populations in accordance with international law and giving them time to leave the war zone, followed by a broad, massive attack on Hezbollah targets together with precision targeting of the organization's rocket and missile launch sites.

The various declarations do not necessarily mean that war will erupt in the north this summer. Military intelligence assessments, too, suggest that Syria and Hezbollah are not interested in a confrontation at this time. The Northern Command, however, must prepare as if war will break out any minute, and it must consider that it may not get a head's-up from military intelligence.

Anti-Israel vandals acquitted for 'lawful excuse'

JTA

LONDON — Seven British activists were acquitted of damaging a weapons factory after testifying that they did it to prevent alleged Israeli war crimes.

The men broke into an EDO MBM Technology building in January 2009, damaging the building, computer equipment and precision machinery, the BBC reported. They caused about $275,000 in damage and were charged with causing criminal damage.

The defendants admitted to their crime, but said they were acting with "lawful excuse," committing an offence to prevent what they say was a more serious crime by acting to prevent further alleged war crimes being committed by Israel against Gaza.

They believed that the company was manufacturing and selling military equipment to Israel for use in the West Bank and Gaza, in violation of British export laws. But EDO managing director Paul Hills denied in court that the company supplied parts to Israel, while admitting that it did make parts for F-16 fighter planes.

Judge George Bathurst-Norman reportedly told the jury, "You may well think that hell on earth would not be an understatement of what the Gazans suffered in that time," referring to the war in Gaza in the winter of 2008-09.

The verdict "sends a clear indication that sometimes direct action is the only option when all other avenues have failed," the defence attorney said.

RABBI ERWIN SCHILD'S LATEST BOOK RANGES FROM THEOLOGY TO MEMOIR

As a young man, Erwin Schild bore witness to the German Kristallnacht in 1938, was incarcerated briefly in Dachau concentration camp, and lost his parents and most of his childhood friends in the Holocaust. After the war he settled in Toronto and served as senior rabbi at Adath Israel Congregation for 42 years. He's now rabbi emeritus at Adath Israel.

Schild's 2001 autobiography, The Very Narrow Bridge, garnered a Canadian Jewish Book Award for Memoir. He is also the author of World Through My Window, a collection of sermons published in 1992. For his lifetime of accomplishments, he was inducted into the Order of Canada.

His most recent book, And Miles to Go Before I Sleep (published in 2009), presents further sermons, tributes, essays and broadcasts. The text is fashioned as a series of six "walks," with a pause for the Sabbath. The subject matter includes discussions of Jewish values and contemporary culture, theology, Jewish history, reflections on aging and self-renewal, and on reasserting one's Jewish responsibilities to ensure the survival of the broader Jewish community.

"The title of my book, borrowed from a poem by Robert Frost, is meant to say that hopefully I will not stop walking," Schild writes. "There are new lands to be yet explored and times to be yet experienced. The stars still beckon…"

At 334 pages in softcover, And Miles to Go Before I Sleep is available from Adath Israel and Jewish bookstores.

Triumvirate of Poets: Guernica Editions of Toronto has sent me a trio of new and noteworthy books of poetry – or more precisely, two books of poetry and a book of essays about poetry.

The He We Knew is the third volume of poems from Toronto poet Merle Nudelman, whose first collection, Borrowed Light, won the Canadian Jewish Book Award for poetry in 2004. Nudelman's latest poems explore the themes of loss and estrangement within a family.

In Implicate Me: Short Essays on Reading Contemporary Poems, Elana Wolff parses poems by Ruth Panofsky, John Oughton, Adam Sol, Nudelman, Malca Litovitz, Ron Charach and many other poets. The book evolved from Wolff's regular column, "How to Approach a Poem," in an arts newspaper.

"The title of the column suggests that a poem is not a static, inanimate object, not just words on a page, but a living thing inhabiting a living space; that we can approach a poem as if it were a wary, wild creature in the woods, and it will lead us into surprising places," Ellen S. Jaffe writes in the introduction.

Oughton's Time Slip offers a wide range of forms, from sonnets and haiku to free-form experimentation, and includes pieces on his journeys to the Middle East, Japan and many parts of North America.

Two Short Story Collections: The short story is alive and well, as evidenced by the numerous new collections that continue to appear. Two noteworthy examples were recently published by Syracuse University Press.

The Day My Mother Cried, by William D. Kaufman, presents tales from his parents' homeland in Ukraine, his own childhood reminiscences and his adult travels.

Syracuse Press has also issued Feeding Mrs. Moskowitz and The Caretaker, two novella-length stories by sisters Barbara Pokras and Fran Pokras Yariv. The stories "explore the world of the elderly with deft humour and heart-wrenching detail." The sisters live in New York and California respectively.

Golda Meir is coming to Richmond Hill

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Jewish community, meet the Chinese community. Chinese community, meet Golda Meir.

This is partly the goal of of the 2010- 2011 theatre season at the Richmond Hill Centre for the Arts.

"Many of our shows address the multicultural makeup of our community," said Eli Lukawitz, head of marketing, development and education at the centre, adding that Richmond Hill and the surrounding area has a high Chinese and Jewish population.

"What we're trying to do is to expose the cultures to other people," Lukawitz said. "It's educating the neighbour about their neighbour."

The new season includes plays like Golda's Balcony, which explores Golda Meir's journey from a school teacher to prime minister of Israel, as well as Chinese New Year Celebration: East Meets West, a concert with music from Huang An Lun, a Chinese composer.

Lukawitz thinks that both performances will appeal to the Jewish community.

"I think the Jewish community is a type of community that will embrace a lot of different things," he said.

The season's theme is debuts and divas, mainly because most actors are either performing at the centre for the first time or, like Jackie Richardson who will sing on New Year's Eve, are divas.

Other shows include Seinfeld actor Jerry Stiller, who stars in his one-man-show in November; a production of Hamlet in October; and Cherry Docs, a play by David Gow about a liberal Jewish lawyer who is assigned to defend a neo-Nazi skinhead. Cherry Docs will run in November.

The process of creating a theatrical season is a lengthy one, Lukawitz said, explaining that the theatre manager usually sits down with the centre's staff and goes through all the shows being pitched by booking agents.

"We take a good look at what's being pitched to us and what's relevant to the community in York Region," he said.

Keeping with the theatre's aim of educating different cultures, Lukawitz believes Golda's Balcony, which will run in April, is an important piece.

Tovah Feldshuh in Golda's Balcony.

"Obviously, with my background, I know quite a bit about Golda Meir. But when I talked to [people in the community] about a fairly substantial historical figure, they don't know much about her," he said.

"She had an effect on not just Israeli politics, but world politics. The story of Golda Meir is the story of survival and perseverance," he said, "because it's told in a theatrical way, it brings to life this person who, for most people, is just a name in a book."

For Lukawitz, nothing can replace a live performance.

"I love going to see a movie, but there's just an energy that happens when you watch live performance, whether it be theatre or music or dance. We share the experience with the artist," he said. "You see a movie and every night's the same. But if you see a piece of performance, every given night you're seeing something different. A line is delivered in a different way, there's a different movement from the night before. You can't replace that energy."

The centre's new season also has an emphasis on children's programming with shows like Caillou in February, Splash 'N Boots, a musical sing-a-long, in December and Junie B. Jones, a musical based on the book series by Barbara Park that will run in November.

"I love watching children experience live theatre. They can't contain the awe and the joy they have when they're sitting in the audience and out walks Caillou," Lukawitz said. "This is the next generation of theatre goers. If we want theatre and live performance in general to be sustainable, we need to build our audience from young ages."

Dustin Hoffman cancels Israel appearance

JTA

JERUSALEM — In an apparent reaction to the Gaza flotilla incident, actors Meg Ryan and Dustin Hoffman reportedly have backed out of attending the Jerusalem Film Festival.

Ryan cancelled her appearance June 1, the day after the Gaza flotilla incident, the Jerusalem Post reported, quoting Cinematheque associate director Yigal Molad Hayo.

Molad Hayo said Hoffman broke off negotiations, which had reached an "advanced" stage, the day after the incident in which Israeli Navy commandos boarded a Gaza-bound vessel attempting to break a maritime blockade, resulting in the death of nine passengers.

While neither actor said explicitly that the flotilla incident was the reason, "it became quite clear that this was the reason," Hayo told the Post.

In addition to the actors, Prince Albert of Monaco cancelled his participation in the event, which opened on July 8 and runs until July 17. The film festival is scheduled to have a tribute to actor Grace Kelly, the prince's mother.

Ornate Florence shul soars 50 metres high

By RON CSILLAG
Special to The CJN

FLORENCE, Italy — It's little wonder Florence is one of three cities that can induce temporary psychological disorders (Jerusalem and Paris being the others). The overwhelming density of art and beauty has been known to trigger in tourists rapid heartbeat, wooziness, fainting, confusion and even hallucinations.

At the Via Farini Great Synagogue, as it is unofficially known, at the very least you will go weak at the knees trying to absorb this much Venetian mosaic, filigree, ironwork and wood carving. Executed in a mishmash of Byzantine, Sephardic-Moorish and Romanesque styles, there's barely a square inch of the shul's cavernous interior that is not covered in something.

The effect is dizzying, a sensation that's not atypical in this city.

Known also as the Tempio Maggiore, its story begins in 1872 when local merchant David Levi started fundraising to build a synagogue "worthy of Florence." It was constructed between 1874 and 1882, and has lived up to its billing.

Greeting the visitor is a green onion-shaped dome that soars 50 metres high, a facade of white and pink limestone, and three great Moorish arches flanked by two towers, themselves topped by smaller domes. In a city with no shortage of heart-stopping buildings, the synagogue stands out as one of the most beautiful examples of 19th-century architecture.

To say the highly symmetrical interior is ornate would be an understatement. Arabesque patterns snake up walls to combine with intricate wood carvings. Geometric mosaics adorn the floor. Completing the effect of a classic European synagogue are dark wood pews, brass lamps and chandeliers, and a good old-fashioned musty aroma.

The Aron Kodesh is a magnificent gold-bedecked affair that is supported by columns and rises 10 metres, while the bimah (here called a tevah) is situated roughly in the middle of the sanctuary and is enclosed by lace-like wrought iron.

The sole concessions to modernity are an organ in the loft, and a side pulpit, the latter more commonly found in Catholic churches. Upstairs, set on two floors, the Jewish Museum of Florence exhibits an impressive array of ritual artifacts and stunning fabrics, and tells the community's story.

Built to hold 1,500 worshippers in the Orthodox style (the gallery for woman is upstairs, which offers a great view), the building was officially opened by the king and queen of Italy. It was the first synagogue completed after the 1871 reunification of Italy.

As elsewhere in Italy, the Jewish community of Florence is believed to date back to Roman times but written records began only in 1396, when Jews were permitted to practice banking in the city. The community's fortunes were inexorably tied to the powerful Medici family, and in 1437, the clan permitted Jews to lend money but limited the interest they could charge to 25 per cent.

Florence took in many Jews who fled Spain and Portugal in the late 1400s. But once Cosimo Medici became Grand Duke of Tuscany, the situation worsened. In 1570, Jews were banned from banking and confined to a ghetto in the centre of the city, a tangle of narrow alleys that contained kosher butchers, bakers, mikvahs and schools. Two synagogues were built, an Italian one in 1571 and a Spanish/Levantine one at the end of the 16th century. Banned from the guilds, too, Jews went into the shmatte business, and prospered.

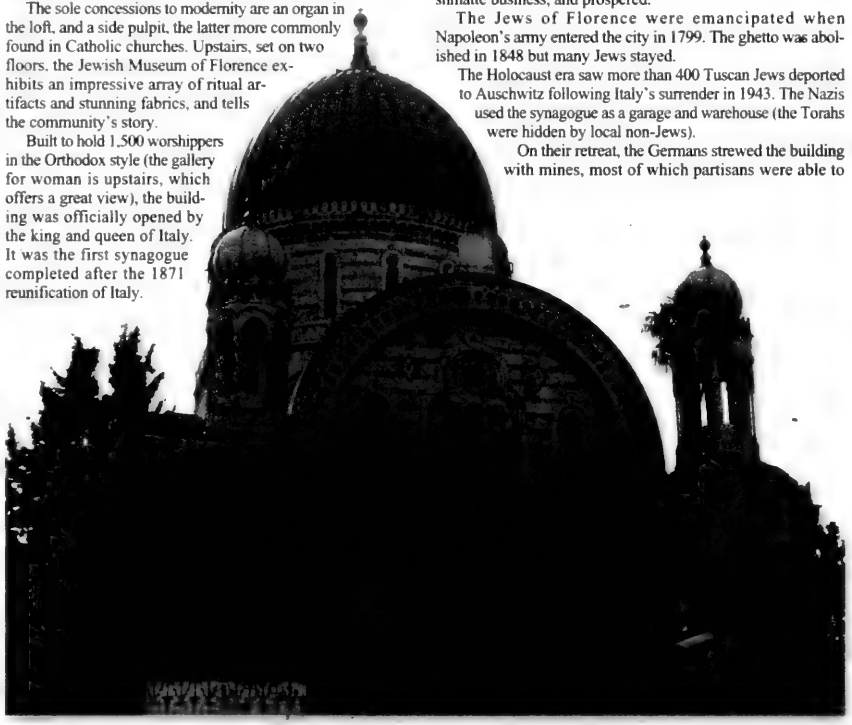
The Jews of Florence were emancipated when Napoleon's army entered the city in 1799. The ghetto was abolished in 1848 but many Jews stayed.

The Holocaust era saw more than 400 Tuscan Jews deported to Auschwitz following Italy's surrender in 1943. The Nazis used the synagogue as a garage and warehouse (the Torahs were hidden by local non-Jews).

On their retreat, the Germans strewed the building with mines, most of which partisans were able to defuse. Only one exploded in the upper gallery, and the remnants are displayed in the outer courtyard, near two Holocaust monuments etched with the names of those who perished.

Today, the community numbers about 900 individuals. There's a full-time rabbi, kindergarten, a youth group, WIZO chapter and senior citizens residence. Common surnames include Coen, Vitta and Ventura, which our knowledgeable guide Giovanna claims derives from "Ben Torah."

A Jewish cemetery was used from 1777 to 1870, and holds pyramid-shaped funerary vaults. Protected by high walls and touted as "a hidden corner," most Florentines are said to be unaware of its existence.



'Your Majesty, my first book'

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Eli Stutz is a Torontonian now living in Israel who has written a children's book called Pickle Impossible. Last week, we published an article about the book, which evolved from a bedtime story Stutz told his children.

Now, there's an update to that story. In Toronto for a book tour, Stutz managed to give a copy of Pickle Impossible to Queen Elizabeth, who was mingling with the public outside Queen's Park in Toronto on July 6.

"Thousands of people were there, and everyone was jockeying for position," Stutz said. "After manoeuvring to several different spots, I found myself standing just over the barricade, behind a nice old lady, whose grandson is also an author. She told me, 'When she comes by, just reach over and give it to her.'"

The police on the other side of the fence told him that wasn't going to happen, but Stutz was determined.

"When the Queen did come by two minutes later, I reached over and said, 'Your Majesty, here is my first book – I hope it makes you laugh. You can read it during your flight.'"

Stutz said the Queen smiled, took it from his hands and kept on walking.

"The book has my signature, and a note, written on the inside page wishing her well, and hoping that the story amuses her."

No word on whether the Queen was amused.

Queen Elizabeth examines a copy of Pickle Impossible, which author Eli Stutz had just handed to her.

A Canadian's secret life in the Mossad

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Nearly 30 years ago, Michael Ross, a Canadian from Victoria, went on a backpacking tour to Europe and decided to spend the winter on an Israeli kibbutz, a decision that changed his life. In Israel, he fell in love with both the land and a woman. He got married, converted to Judaism, became a citizen, learned Hebrew, served in the army, and ultimately was recruited into the Mossad, the Israeli Secret Service.

The Volunteer: A Canadian's Secret Life in the Mossad (McClelland & Stewart) is Ross' remarkable story of his years in the Mossad from roughly 1988 to 2001.

After his Israel Defence Forces service, Ross received "a discreet letter from an obscure department of the Israeli government inviting me for an interview." At first no one ever mentioned the Mossad: "Instead, we always used the expression hamisrad, which means 'office,' even later when I was a veteran working in HQ."

His training was rigorous. At one stage, he was arrested by two Shin Bet agents who accused him of drug smuggling and threatened him with electroshock torture. Ross stuck to his counter-story and divulged nothing about his Mossad affiliation; only afterward was he told it had been a training exercise "like something you'd see in Mission Impossible." After the gruelling episode, his trainers insisted on helping him "decompress," correctly understanding that he would have quit if they had let him go home right away.

Ross realistically describes many exciting and often dangerous undercover intrigues, always providing the geopolitical context behind each one. On the mission that he considered his most daring and successful, he boarded a car ferry in Ankara, Turkey, and attached an explosive charge to the underside of a high-level terrorist's Mercedes. Several days later, the target detonated "somewhere on a lonely stretch of highway in Kurdish bandit country near the Syrian border."

In several cases, Ross and his partners successfully concluded their parts of missions that were later aborted. For example, in a dazzling episode of high-risk espionage, he and a fellow operative attached a homing device to a ship in a Casablanca port that was about to bring a shipment of Scud missiles to Syria. Israel decided not to sink the ship out of concerns about the killing of innocents and possible retaliation and political fallout. Similarly, Israel scuttled a plan involving targeted killings of Iranian Hezbollah agents in Sudan. Such caution, Ross writes, "is the price Israelis must pay for the humanitarian ethos that informs their society and government."

Ross writes with apparent candour about one dark episode in Johannesburg, when he and a partner posed as South African policemen to apprehend some Iranian agents purchasing advanced weapons. Descending on their hotel room at dawn, they "arrested" them, took them to a warehouse for a beating, then to the airport for the next flight home. This is the ugliest moment in the book, but Ross admits he now wishes he had gone further and shot the Iranians. "Perhaps that doesn't sit well with our sensibilities and indulgent western value system, but as far as I was concerned all I did was administer a few well-deserved welts and bruises," he writes. "If only Ron Arad, Zahra Kazemi and the thousands of other victims of Iranian brutality had been so lucky."

Worn out after seven years as a street-level operative, Ross opted for a "desk job" in Tevel, the Mossad division that shares and trades intelligence with the CIA and other intelligence-gathering organizations around the world. Because of his Canadian background and English-language fluency, he was given a plum position as co-ordinator of the liaison between the Mossad and the CIA. A close observer of the American-Israeli relationship during the Clinton years, Ross provides telling glimpses of president Bill Clinton, Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat and American diplomat Dennis Ross.

As the liaison to the CIA, Ross (the author) professed to take enjoyment "in surprising my U.S. colleagues with stunning revelations about an enemy operative working clandestinely in their own backyard. The combination of gratitude, respect and humility that my counterparts exhibited on those occasions was one of the things that made the job worthwhile."

Too often, however, much good intel was wasted because of mistakes, ineptitude, weaknesses of the legal system, and the frustrating tendency of various partnering agencies to compete and be secretive with each other. In one high-level case, Tevel tipped off the FBI about Ramez, a man who worked by day at the Ford plant in Dearborn, Mich., and by night procuring export-restricted technology for Hezbollah.

Surveillance on Ramez reaped much valuable intel, but the flow stopped soon after he was arrested under the "material support" provisions of a U.S. anti-terrorist law. Ignoring pleas from all levels of law enforcement, an American magistrate granted Ramez bail on condition that he wear an electronic tether. "Once released, Ramez promptly cut the tether, grabbed his brother's passport, crossed into Canada and fled to Lebanon." The only happy note is that six years later, he stupidly returned to the United States and is now in jail.

The Volunteer offers enough authenticating details about the Mossad that one wonders whether important operations and secrets are being compromised. Only in the book's final pages does Ross admit that he did not receive the Mossad's approval and that the agency would certainly not have been pleased with its publication.

Yet it is clear that his loyalty for the organization and for Israel remains intact, and in various instances he refrained from divulging information he considered too sensitive to publish. Thankfully, he is no disgruntled and cynical ex-operative keen on spilling dirt, and many of us know his co-author, National Post managing editor Jonathan Kay, as one of Israel's greatest defenders in the Canadian media.

The Volunteer was published three years ago, but I was saving it for a good occasion. I read it amidst the rising cacophony of international condemnation of Israel after the Gaza flotilla episode. While also acknowledging some of Israel's flaws, the book presents many illustrations of Israel's uncanny strength, superlative intelligence and high moral values. In short, it gives we supporters and defenders of Israel plenty of reason to cheer.

Mideast peace may be blowing in the wind

By KARIN KLOOSTERMAN
Israel 21c

The team from two companies – Israel Wind Power and Brothers Engineering Group – will build wind turbines in the West Bank.

RAMAT GAN — Peace may be blowing in the wind if a new wind energy project between a Palestinian company and an Israeli company succeeds.

The two companies, Israel Wind Power based in Ramat Gan and Brothers Engineering Group, from Bethlehem in the West Bank, have announced their intention to co-operate in the building and selling of wind turbines in the West Bank and beyond.

And they are undeterred by the latest tensions between Israel, the Palestinian Authority and world powers in the wake of the recent Turkish-led flotilla incident that occurred near Gaza.

Brothers Engineering Group was founded by Mohammed Salem, a pharmacist, businessman and social entrepreneur with Engineers without Borders. Salem, the company's CEO, has been in the wind business since 2006 and employs 15 people in Bethlehem. His company supplies wind turbines and solar solutions to the West Bank region.

"Business collaboration in the area of wind energy is something which will be for the benefit of everyone. It will serve as a bridge of peace for the Israeli-Palestinian conflict," Salem said.

The two companies plan to co-operate in marketing, manufacturing and installing wind turbines to generate electricity for factories, offices and private homes.

A year ago, the Brothers Group made e-mail contact, in English, with Israel Wind Energy, a year-old company that provides wind turbine solutions and has developed its own wind turbine.

Yanir Avital, the Israeli company's founder, said they visited the company in Bethlehem and "felt they could be a good partner. We could use [Salem's] connections, and with our connections, we could help their company go one or two steps ahead."

The two sides intend to co-operate on the integration of the wind turbines in the PA and later branch out beyond the region. "We'd like to develop and install wind turbines in the territories, as in Israel we have very few places that can use this kind of energy," said Avital.

Building their own wind turbines in the Bethlehem region for about five years, the Brothers Group supplies off-grid wind energy in the West Bank based on orders from non-profit organizations that direct the energy to those who need it most. They also supply turbines to private clients who buy them to offset electricity costs.

While the PA says it plans to offer feed-in tariffs from the Palestinian energy and utilities companies to people who invest in renewable energy, as is currently the case in Israel and the United States, at the moment no working network exists, Salem said.

The Brothers Group offers university students in the West Bank courses in building wind turbines, some of which are used for treating waste water. The company also has experience with solar energy.

Salem believes that the partnership with Israel Wind Energy will be mutually beneficial."We will be good partners for designing and building big turbines, with our technology and their technology," he said.

In the West Bank, the Brothers Group doesn't import any parts, but builds everything from scratch with the help of 10 engineers and five labourers. "Our turbines are built from parts from Palestine. We are the first and only wind company in Lebanon, Jordan and Palestine that's building turbines," Salem said.

He says he'd like to work in the Gaza Strip as well, but it's impossible to bring in the parts, since the Israeli government highly regulates such materials, which could also be used to build missiles.

Meanwhile, the Palestinian company builds about one wind turbine a day, which can generate from 200 to 2,000 watts of power an hour.

Israel Wind Energy, which has six employees, is already building wind turbines slated for imminent export to Europe and Russia. These are mostly turbines that can convert wind energy for heating water. Founded to coincide with attractive feed-in tariffs offered in Israel, the company has also developed its own wind turbine, which works well on household roofs.

"The turbines we make are light, quiet and esthetic," Avital said, pointing to one designed with an Israeli flag. A single-kilowatt unit costs about $5,000, he said, and would provide about one-quarter of the energy used in a mid-sized home.

However, according to Avital, there is only one location in the Golan Heights that is ideal for wind, and the next suitable place is in the West Bank. He believes that co-operating with the Brothers Group could help the Israeli company to expand into regions where there is more wind.

Yoram Suissa, the business development manager of Israel Wind Power, said that through the collaboration, his Palestinian partners will be able to display their technology in the international arena. "We will be a pipeline for our Palestinian friends and colleagues for their products to be marketed both in Israel and abroad," he added.

Salem said that "we see this joint business venture as a business enterprise which connects these two communities in a blessed way, setting aside the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"We believe that this is an example of the ability of ordinary people to bridge gaps between our communities, especially during these stormy days."

The two companies hope to have projects up and running within the next year.

Mubarak said to be ailing

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak arrived in Paris July 5, ostensibly for a meeting with his French counterpart Nicolas Sarkozy, but the real reason behind the trip could be new fears for the 82-year -old leader's health.

According to Al-Quds Al-Arabi, a London-based Arabic newspaper, Mubarak underwent a series of medical checks shortly after arriving in the French capital for his last-minute visit.

Reports of the treatment could spark new speculation over the political future of the president, who has not yet declared his candidacy in upcoming presidential elections. His son, Gamal, is widely believed to have been groomed to succeed him, but has also not announced plans to run.

The president's absence has thrust Gamal to the forefront of Egyptian politics, Al-Quds reported. In his role as general secretary of the policy committee, he took part in a series of high-profile meetings in which he called on the government to tackle corruption and present a clear agenda ahead of the planned vote.

Hosni Mubarak

Observers say Mubarak's departure could throw Egypt into turmoil, possibly handing power to the Muslim Brotherhood, an Islamist group that, although banned from official representation in parliament, functions as the country's main opposition.

Another challenge to Mubarak, who with the aid of Egypt's draconian emergency laws has ruled almost unopposed since 1981, surfaced earlier this year in the form of the United Nations' former nuclear chief, Mohammed El-Baradei.

El-Baradei emerged as an opposition leader after returning to Egypt in February and has won popular support by urging the government to respond to peaceful demands for change.

CHAT grad drafted by Florida Panthers in fifth round

By PAMELA CHELIN
Special to The CJN

Over the phone, Zach Hyman sounds like any other Canadian teenage male.

He loves hockey, he grew up admiring legendary Canadian hockey greats such as Gordie Howe and Steve Yzerman, he likes to hang out with his friends and he lives at home with his parents.

However, as the Florida Panthers' fifth-round draft pick in the recent NHL draft in Los Angeles, Hyman, 18, the oldest of four hockey-playing brothers, is far from average.

"I feel great. It's just amazing," Hyman gushed about being chosen by the Panthers.

"Zach's dream has always been to play in the NHL," said Zach's father, Stuart, in a separate phone call later the same afternoon.

"He's excited to be drafted by Florida. Dale Tallon, who just took over the Florida Panthers as general manager, has a long track record of finding the diamonds, the kids who have potential to make the NHL, so it's a real honour.

"We [Stuart and Zach's mom Vicky] are very proud of Zach and his accomplishments, and we support him in his future endeavours as he continues to build on his dream of making the NHL and playing for the Florida Panthers. And Zach's a great role model for kids, in that he's proof that if you work hard and believe in your dreams, anything can happen."

Zach Hyman

Having put on his first pair of ice skates as a mere toddler, Hyman developed a passion for hockey at an early age. "I've been on the ice since I was four years old," he said. "I grew up wanting to play hockey. I just love it. I grew up loving hockey and watching all the NHL games. I've always loved the game."

Hamilton Red Wings' Zach Hyman scored 35 goals last season. [Brendan Fifield photos]

Actually, recalled his father, Zach was on the ice even earlier than four years old.

"Zach's too young to remember," Stuart said, "but he learned to skate before he could walk. It hurt my back, but I took him to arenas and held him up on little skates and helped him to skate. He started playing hockey at four, but he had already started skating much earlier than that."

After his early head start, Zach eventually played Triple A hockey for the Toronto Red Wings before moving, two years ago, to the Hamilton Red Wings where he is both forward and captain of the team. Currently in his last year with the Red Wings, he plans on taking next year off from school to train full time and "get bigger and stronger." He expects to be at the Panthers' main camp this fall.

Hyman, who stands 6-2 and weighs 200 pounds, is a tough competitor, having scored 35 goals and 40 assists for the Red Wings last season. In fact, competition and challenge are what Hyman loves most.

"Hockey is very competitive. I love scoring goals. And hockey's a lot different from every other sport because you're skating. Most other sports, you're running and you're not on skates."

Hyman, who attended United Synagogue Day School and graduated with top marks from the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (TanenbaumCHAT), will join Princeton University's hockey team in September 2011.

Despite the upcoming demanding and rigorous schedule of both attending a top university and playing on its hockey team, Hyman maintains a laid back disposition. "There's always pressure, but I'm used to the pressure. I balance my schedule out well. It's really not that bad. When I was at CHAT, I was on the ice almost every day after school. I had a really long day. I didn't get home until 10 or 11 at night. I did a lot of my schoolwork in school when I had free time."

Math, politics and sciences were his favourite subjects in high school, but he hasn't decided what his major will be in university. He laughs and quickly says, "No" when asked if he has a back-up career plan in mind. He's simply focused on hockey.

"It's up to Zach," says Stuart. "If he continues to work hard and continues to want it badly enough, he'll have every opportunity to make the [Panthers] team. How much better could it be to attend one of the finest schools in the world and to be drafted into one of the greatest NHL organizations?"

And, as the past is more often than not a successful indicator of the future, Hyman, with his incredible discipline, should do just fine, keeping a committed and focused eye on the, er, goal.

The power of dance

By MICHAEL GORDON

I did something unusual awhile ago: I took a few afternoon hours off to join my wife at a screening of the 2009 Israeli film Ida's Dance Club, which was playing at Toronto's Jewish Film Festival.The film is a warm, funny, sad and poignant tale of Ida (the director of a Tel Aviv Golden Age Club) and her innovative quest to bring music and dance to the members of her organization. Ida is a creative musical program director and a caring social worker.

The Senior Side of Life

It's time for the second annual ballroom dancing competition. Through the eyes, feet, smiles and intimate personal details of the club's members and potential competitors' lives, the viewers experience the solace, relief, emotional support, humour and companionship shared at the club. The upcoming competition provides the members with some motivation and respite from the difficult emotional and physical challenges that many face themselves and with their families.

The viewer becomes privy to the personal lives of the members, sharing their sorrows, joys, memories, anguish and aspirations. The audience can laugh and cry along with the dancers as they come alive to the music and share themselves with their partners, while gradually revealing glimpses of their present and past life experiences. The dancing is compelling, and Ida often sings as the dancers go through their routines.

One dancer, a significant focus of the film, was clearly a "star" during her past in the former Soviet Union. The film's first scenes reveal her swinging and turning and gliding with a partner in a remarkable series of engaging dances as she takes joy in her own rhythmic and graceful mastery of ballroom dancing. As her story evolves, she is revealed as a person experiencing great personal anguish, which later gets translated into physical frailty. However, this does not keep her from exhibiting her intrinsic determination, strong ego, talent and grace.

For many reasons, the film resonated with me. My late mother was a wonderful dancer. In her later years, she attended our neighbourhood seniors centre, where she participated in dance programs and taught dance to the less well-inclined or experienced. She danced in performances all over New York with a group from the centre. She loved family simchahs because if there was a band, she could ballroom dance with my father. She was clearly the lead, but he was a very good partner. People would stop and watch them. When the music was suitable, she would do a solo or two, gracefully responding to almost any kind of music.

When I was a child, she taught me ballet and modern interpretative jazz steps and exercises. Those were her specialities from her adolescent and young adult years of dance training. She would also schlep me to dance performances all over New York. It formed the basis of my own love of dance.

She had a stroke that left her paralyzed and ultimately led to her death. But when she made some minimal recovery, I provided her with a tape player and earphones. She started rhythmically moving her non-paralyzed leg to the ballet music I played. I recall vividly how she pointed her toes in ballet style, despite her terrible disability.

Ida's Dance Club brings joy and inspirational movement to her members and the film does the same for its viewers. Dance is a universal language of expression, joy and rhythmic movement that we can share with each other throughout a lifetime.

100-calorie packs are brilliant

About Nutrition
By LISA WEINBERG

These days, every type of snack imaginable comes in a 100-calorie pack and can be found on store shelves. How do these measure up? And can they fit into a healthy diet?

I think these 100-calorie packs of portion-controlled snacks are brilliant. As long as you eat just one, these mini snack packs solve one of our biggest problems: portion control.

By packaging food in portion controlled, single servings, we can have our cake and eat it too.

The wide range of food packaged this way offers something for everyone. Whether you crave salty snacks, sweet treats, frozen desserts or candy, most people can afford the 100 calories and satisfy their snack cravings at the same time.

These are also a good way to put a quick and convenient treat in your children's lunch box. They will feel that they've enjoyed something fun, and you get to relax knowing the portion size was reasonable. Even mini-sized chocolate bars, the kind that are available at Halloween, can be used for an occasional treat.

Keep in mind, however, that 100 calories doesn't mean you can get away without reading nutrition labels. Always watch especially for trans fats and high salt content.

Nowadays you can even find 100-calorie packs or smaller portions in the refrigerator section. Cheese, nuts, yogurt and drinks (including wine) are just a few examples of what you can buy in diet-friendly sizes. Some food companies trying to get a leg up even offer 90- or 80-calorie packs.

So evaluate your diet and decide if there is room for one of these in your daily life, and if so, which would be best for you. But remember to always read the ingredients and nutrition labels first.

Lisa Weinberg is a registered dietitian/nutritionist in Toronto, in private practice and at the Genesis Professional Group. You can also follow Weinberg at http://twitter.com/lisaweinbergrd If you have any nutrition questions, please send them to The CJN.

The land of milk and honey

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

I just flew 6,000 miles to Israel in a metal cylinder. I peered out the window and one moment I saw the snow-dotted ranges of Labrador and the next, the mountains of Turkey.

How will we arrive in Israel in 2025?

URBAN WRITER

I was in another world, one I hadn't visited since 1994. Agoraphobia stood in my way, but I am now conquering this terrible condition. While in the Holy Land, I discovered it does still flow with milk and honey, albeit sometimes curdled, and has a glorious flow of contradictions and seemingly irrational spiritual, political and day-to-day configurations.

Israel, the Middle East, is hospitable. Biblical Avraham and Sarah showed that. While I suffered from heatstroke in my three-star hotel without room service, the man at the front desk brought me tea, as my mother would. This was not their policy.

Israel is a land of trust. Egged – the bus company – does not charge for a bus ride after Shabbat from the Kotel, requesting that passengers pay during the week. During the week of parshat Chayei Sarah, the Torah portion dealing with the life and death of Sarah, the company rearranges their schedule so as to bring people to the Ma'arat HaMachpela, her burial place.

Israel is a land of distrust. The Israeli houses are often triple bolted to defend against Arab threats. The reinforced security often prevents fireman from gaining access.

Israel is a land of brotherhood. I took a taxi with my colleague, Kirill Zaretzky, a fine travel companion, and my Israeli sister, Etti, an energetic Zionist. While we were in the cab, the driver unabashedly made calls to two doctors, his wife and a social worker, to determine the next phase of treatment for his son – a six-year-old boy who is one of 70 worldwide suffering from a medical condition having to do with a lack of sugar to the brain. He spoke on speaker phone. He brought us into his life, as did the many strangers I met who invited me to their d'ira (apartment) for coffee.

Israel is a country that cries out for coexistence with Palestinians and surrounding Arab nations. While on a walking tour of Katimon, my sister read me a memorial of a battle in 1948 near a monastery. The plaque referred to "the enemy" rather than the Arabs. This riled her greatly.

In this tiny strip of land, entrepreneurs are everywhere. Profit is a must. Advertisements are plastered to bags, walls, buses, cars, sweaters and coats.

It costs one shekel to use the bathrooms on a Tel Aviv beach.

Israel is a land of Third World poverty. The makeshift halls used for Ethiopian, Sudanese and other refugees stink of urine. There is one counsellor for more than 150 children. Babies never leave their cribs. Refugees walk into Israel and are picked up by border guards and delivered to a park in Tel Aviv. That's it. Nobody takes responsibility for them. It is truly a shanda (shame).

The parents who accepted Ve'ahavta 3000 Kinder Kits (packs with educational material) did so with great humility. They are poor, and the Torah says, "Ani k'mais – that a poor person is like a dead person. While these people displayed Mediterranean zest, they live in a much different country than those paying that one shekel.

I was in Israel for one week. While there, I saw dozens of worlds aligned, contradictions, deep character creases carved into the faces of our people and a country that exudes holiness and quite frankly everything else.

Am Yisrael chai. The nation of Israel lives.

New Iran sanctions

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Canada is stepping up the pressure on Iran.

In a statement released Monday morning, Minister of Foreign Affairs Lawrence Cannon said that, effective immediately, the government has issued a new set of sanctions aimed at curbing Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's quest to obtain a nuclear weapon.

The new sanctions are designed to prohibit dealings with Iran by individuals "involved in nuclear, chemical, biological and missile proliferation" and ban the export of proliferation-sensitive goods, items for refining oil and gas, other weapons, and technology related to these goods.

They also "prohibit any new investment in Iran's oil and gas sector. These measures bar Iranian financial institutions from establishing a presence in Canada, and vice versa, while banning correspondent banking relationships with Iranian financial institutions and the purchase of Iranian government debt. They are effective immediately," Cannon said.

Exemptions to the sanctions include provisions that safeguard human life, provide disaster relief and food or medicine.

"Nuclear proliferation is the gravest threat to humankind. Iran continues to keep that threat alive. Iran's actions and aggressive statements are an affront to the efforts of Canada and like-minded countries to ensure peace and security worldwide," Cannon said.

Ahmadinejad has called for the destruction of Israel on numerous occasions, referring to the Jewish state as "doomed" and calling for it to be "wiped off the map." He has also called the Holocaust "a myth."

Cannon said the government is using powers granted under Canada's Special Economic Measures Act to impose the sanctions, but he said that they were "in no way meant to harm or punish the Iranian people."

Jewish groups decry census plan

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Jewish and other faith communities have denounced it, the head of Statistics Canada resigned over it, and hundreds of national charities, businesses, think-tanks and social service agencies are fuming because of the federal government's recent decision to scrap the 2011 mandatory long-form census.

They all contend that abandoning the 61-question census – historically delivered to one in five Canadian households every five years, as opposed to the eight-question short-form delivered to all other households – will lead to a dearth of demographic and cultural data that will severely hamper their ability to plan and budget for their communities' needs.

Tony Clement

Earlier this month, Industry Minister Tony Clement announced that the questionnaire would no longer be mandatory, but would still be mailed out to one-third of Canadian households to be filled out voluntarily, without the threat of fines or imprisonment.

The move prompted immediate reaction from groups across the country, including a rebuke from the Jewish community. A July 14 letter from Canadian Jewish Congress to Prime Minister Stephen Harper – which was also copied to Clement – exhorted him to reverse the new policy on the long-form census.

The letter was signed by leaders of major Canadian Jewish federations, including UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Federation CJA in Montreal, UIA Federations Canada, the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver and the Atlantic Jewish Council.

"Jewish federations and service agencies across Canada have long regarded responses to the census' ethnic and religious identity questions, especially from the more-detailed long form, as a critical source of information for planning, fundraising and implementing programs and services that support… the cultural, social, health care, educational, housing, recreational and spiritual needs of our communities," Congress wrote.

The News in Brief

Canada

Blankstein Inducted

WINNIPEG — Marjorie Blankstein, former president of the National Council of Jewish Women and secretary of Canadian Jewish Congress, was honoured July 15 as one of 12 people formally inducted into the Order of Manitoba. Blankstein was honoured for outstanding community service in a ceremony at the provincial legislature. Among the other honorees were former Manitoba premier and current Canadian ambassador to the United States Gary Doer and former MP and native leader Elijah Harper.

Websites Removed

TORONTO — The Arizona-based web-hosting firm Go Daddy has removed the websites of a Canadian charged with promoting hate against Jews after receiving a complaint from Justice Minister Rob Nicholson. One of the sites removed last week was used by former York University student Salman Hossain, 25, to promote hate, while the other was a new one that had yet to go online, the National Post reported. Hossain, who is believed to have left Canada and is at large, was charged this month with three counts of promoting hatred and two counts of promoting genocide. Canadian Jewish Congress also asked Go Daddy to remove the sites, the Post reported.

World

Museum Keeps Art

VIENNA — A museum in Austria will pay $19 million (US) to keep a painting looted during the Holocaust. The Leopold Museum in Vienna settled a decade-long legal battle by agreeing to pay the estate of an Austrian Jewish woman, Bondi Jaray, for the painting that a Nazi reportedly stole from her in 1939. Jaray died in 1969, insisting the painting belonged to her. U.S. officials seized the work, Portrait of Wally by Egon Schiele, in 1999, two years after it arrived on loan to New York's Museum of Modern Art. It reportedly was returned to the Austrian government after World War II.

Editor Twersky Dies

NEW YORK — David Twersky, a veteran journalist and former kibbutznik died July 16 at his home in West Orange, N.J., at age 60 after a long battle with cancer. Twersky opened the Washington, D.C., bureau of the Forward in 1990. He was later editor of the New Jersey Jewish News from 1993 to 2002. He then joined the New York Sun as foreign editor and columnist. Twersky lived in Israel on Kibbutz Gezer from 1974 to 1986, where he edited Shdemot, the English journal of Israel's kibbutz movement.

Threat Leads To Jail

CHICAGO — A dual Jordanian-American citizen was convicted July 20 of mailing a bomb threat to a Chicago Jewish day school. Mohammad Alkaramla, 26, of Chicago's North Side, was ordered jailed until his Sept. 29 sentencing. He faces up to 10 years in jail and a $250,000 fine. Arrested in March 2009, he was convicted of mailing a letter to the Ida Crown Jewish Academy that threatened to blow up 22 Jewish schools and injure or kill Jewish individuals in the city. The letter, which was received Dec. 31, 2008, and referred to Israel's then-current war in Gaza, was addressed to rabbis and Jewish leaders. A draft of it was found on his laptop computer.

Comic Writer Wrote American Splendor

CLEVELAND — Jewish comic book writer Harvey Pekar, who chronicled his life in the autobiographical American Splendor series, died July 12 at age 70.

Pekar had prostate cancer, asthma, high blood pressure and clinical depression, according to reports.

The American Splendor series, which began in 1976 and had its most recent issue in 2008, was made into a movie of the same name in 2003.

Pekar's writing about his everyday life, which a Cleveland Plain Dealer tribute called "the working-class, everyman heroics of simply making it through another day, with soul – if not dignity – intact," was widely admired.

Pekar collaborated on American Splendor with acclaimed comic artist R. Crumb. They met in 1962 when Crumb worked for American Greetings in Cleveland.

Pekar was born in Cleveland to Jewish immigrants from Poland and graduated from Shaker Heights High School. He served in the U.S. Navy and then worked as a file clerk at the Veteran's Administration Hospital in Cleveland until his retirement in 2001.

Activist decries haredi control of Kotel

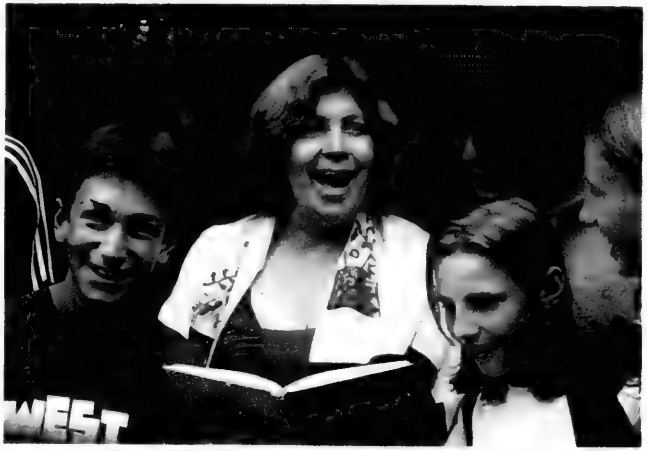
By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Anat Hoffman's voice was upbeat when she called The CJN from Camp George last Thursday for a pre-arranged interview, less than two weeks after being arrested at the Western Wall for carrying a Torah at a monthly women's Rosh Chodesh service.

She was banned from the Wall for 30 days for the July 12 incident and fined 5,000 shekels ($1,350).

A fourth-year faculty member at the Reform Jewish overnight camp on Maple Lake, Hoffman – who is executive director of the Israel Religious Action Center (the legal and advocacy arm of the Reform movement in Israel) and chair of Women of the Wall – spent much of the past week at camp leading discussions with campers and staff. Prior to the week-long stint, she spoke at Temple Sinai in Toronto.

Just before her interview, Hoffman "had a shmooze on holy places" with 12-to-14-year-old campers. She asked them what the rules of conduct would be if they ran holy places, she told The CJN. "I wish they did run the Wall. They had some rules of respect, but they were very strong on pluralism."



Anat Hoffman leads an informal "shmooze" learning session at Camp George last week.

Hoffman, a Jerusalem native who grew up as a secular Jew, was introduced to Reform Judaism in the 1970s as a psychology student at the University of California, Los Angeles. Even today, she said, most Israelis don't know there is an alternative to Orthodoxy. "I would like more than anything to introduce Israelis to the revolutionary notion that there is more than one way to be Jewish."

A national champion swimmer in Israel, Hoffman was recruited by UCLA for its swim team. She became an activist on her return to Israel five years later, when she took on Bezeq, Israel's telecommunications company, and successfully led a group of dissatisfied customers who demanded itemized bills. Hoffman herself had received a high phone bill, and when she refused to pay it, her phone service was cut off.

Senator honours Rabbi Schild and other wartime detainees

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Seventy years ago, the last of Britain's Jewish wartime interns were shipped to Canada as prisoners of war and suspected Nazi collaborators.

Among them was Rabbi Erwin Schild, rabbi emeritus of Adath Israel Congregation in Toronto.

On June 29, Rabbi Schild was recognized in the Senate on the eve of this anniversary.

Rabbi Schild arrived in Canada on July 15, 1940, aboard the S.S. Sobiesky, a former Polish cruise ship turned British troop transport. On that day, more than 2,200 refugees, most of them Jewish, debarked the vessel as prisoners who were being transferred from wartime Britain.

During a June 29 Senate session, Senator Consiglio Di Nino rose to praise Rabbi Schild, celebrate his rich life in Canada and remember the anniversary of the less-than-friendly way he was welcomed to his adopted country 70 years ago.

"[I]n the summer of 1940, three ships brought Axis prisoners of war to Canada along with some 2,300 refugees, most of them Jewish. All, including the refugees, were interned as enemies of the nation. A young boy, Erwin Schild, was among them," Di Nino said in the Senate.

Quoting from Rabbi Schild's autobiography, The Very Narrow Bridge , Di Nino read the following: "To intern Jews as Germans and as suspected collaborators with Nazis was an absurdity. No Jew could possibly have any loyalty to the German cause or hope for a German victory. For Jews, a German victory meant certain death. Kafka could not have dreamt up a more grotesque absurdity.

Rabbi Erwin Schild

"Canada has more than compensated me for the initial rejection and the hostile indifference to my overtures. The opportunities she eventually offered me have engendered in me a 'true patriots' love' for her. I sing our national anthem always with deep feeling and often with tears welling up in my eyes: to keep Canada glorious, free and united, I gladly continue to stand on guard!"

Di Nino, moved by the lines, said he was unaware of any of the Jewish interns ever asking for an apology or compensation "of any kind" from Canada.

"To my friend, Rabbi Schild, I say it will always be an honour to stand beside you on guard for a great country, Canada. And to all of us, I say, lest we forget."

In an e-mail to The CJN last week, Rabbi Schild called Di Nino's statement "very gratifying and very gracious," and he urged more Canadians to remember the anniversary.

"The majority of Canadians are totally unaware of it, perhaps because in contrast to other communities, such as Italian or Japanese-born Canadians, [the Jewish community] has never demanded an apology or compensation from the Canadian government, nor should we have done so," Rabbi Schild wrote.

He added: "Since I arrived as one of nearly 3,000 prisoners who eventually became immigrants and made an incredible contribution to Canada and to the Canadian Jewish community in particular, I deem this anniversary to be significant to this community and beyond. The drama of this group's arrival, the psychological ordeal of their confinement in Canada over almost three years as interned enemy aliens – they were imprisoned as Germans or Austrians, a grotesque misunderstanding – should be remembered as a Canadian footnote to the Holocaust.

"It is a valuable and fascinating piece of Canadiana, and ought to be become part of Canadian Jewish history. The 70th anniversary of this drama is an opportunity to spread the knowledge of these events and to tell the story which fortunately has a very happy ending."

Food bank does more than fill bellies

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Leket Israel works with more than 250 non-profit organizations (NPOs). They make 22,000 sandwiches a week for disadvantaged schoolchildren, harvest more than 400 tons of fruit and vegetables a month, and manage 4,000 volunteers per month throughout Israel.

But it's not enough.

"In the state of Israel, [about] 25 per cent of Israelis are living below the poverty line," said Joseph Gitler, founder of Table to Table, an organization that recently merged with Leket: The Israel Food Bank, to form Leket Israel.

"We could triple what we're doing. And we will... The problem is this issue is very well hidden to most of the Israeli public and the Diaspora," said Gitler, who was in Toronto recently to visit family and meet with potential donors.

Leket Israel, which is funded by philanthropists and charitable organizations, is a national food bank that works with soup kitchens and NPOs throughout Israel.

It is involved in food rescue, which includes collecting leftover meals from banquet halls, bar and bat mitzvahs and weddings, as well as harvesting fruit and vegetables that are slightly damaged and would otherwise go unpicked. The food is then delivered to NPOs throughout Israel.

"The issue of food waste is a rich-country issue," Gitler said.

"Western countries can afford to waste food... Food is something that needs to be dealt with quickly and effectively."

This is why Gitler started Table to Table about seven years ago in Ra'anana, Israel, after learning some poverty statistics.

"I was a total layperson. Laypeople, when they hear the word poverty, our first reaction is food," he said.

Gitler took a few months off work at his family's software business to explore the issue. What he found was that within the many non-profit organizations dealing with food, few were focused on food rescue.

"What do we do with excess food? With damaged food? No one was thinking about it," he said.

At first, the organization was just Gitler and a refrigerated truck. Then things took off.

"I didn't expect to do anything national, just local in Ra'anana, and it took off so quickly," he said.

As Gitler began to work with organizations throughout Israel, he realized that food rescue isn't enough. This is why Table to Table merged with Leket, which was founded in 2007 to deal with food insecurity.

"Organizations wanted to see more from us. Our most important stakeholders are the agencies we work with," Gitler said.

Now, along with food rescue, Leket Israel also runs a centralized buying program through which it orders food in bulk, thus bringing down prices, and then distributes it to food banks and soup kitchens. Leket also helps educate NPOs in food handling, safety and nutritional content.

"Nutrition is a big issue. It's not just about filling bellies. Just like in Toronto, healthy food costs more," Gitler said. "[Leket] brought in nutritionists who work with organizations [and] try to make sure they're getting their caloric bang for their buck."

For more information about Leket Israel, visit www.leket.org, e-mail info@leket.org or call the Canadian line at 519-753-0603.

Waiting for Abbas

No one can spoil a good mood like Palestinian Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas can. The visit to Washington by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on July 6 created the most robust and hopeful atmosphere toward Israeli-Palestinian peace-making that we have seen in the last two years. U.S. President Barack Obama expressed an upbeat, fervent hope of soon seeing face-to-face discussions between the PA and Israel.

Obama's special Middle East envoy, George Mitchell, personally reiterated that very same message to Abbas directly one week later in Ramallah.

During talks last week in Jerusalem with the European Union's foreign policy head, Catherine Ashton, Netanyahu emphasized what he had made clear to the president in Washington: that he wishes to make quick progress once direct negotiations with the Palestinians begin. According to Ha'aretz, Netanyahu believes it would be possible to reach an agreement with the Palestinians within a year that would be implemented gradually over a number of years.

The key, of course, in the positive messages being conveyed about the possibility of peace is the need for direct, face-to-face discussions. The parties must speak to – not at or toward – each other. That is the only way to find and establish common ground. That is the only way to hammer out the fine detail of any agreement.

Abbas, however, seems not to agree that direct negotiations are desirable. Who knows? He may not even consider them necessary.

He told 128 delegates of his Fatah party's Revolutionary Council last week that he would not return to direct negotiations with Israel unless he had prior guarantees from the Americans (i.e., from the Israelis) regarding the issues of Israeli settlement construction and the final borders of a future Palestinian state. American guarantees, to date, he complained, have been too "vague."

The Americans seem to be a little bit irked at Abbas' reluctance to get down to serious negotiations with Israel. In response to the PA leader's public whine over America's unwillingness to guarantee the outcome of the negotiations with Israel, U.S. State Department spokesperson Philip J. Crowley said: "Let's get to direct negotiations as quickly as possible. Once direct talks commence, parties can address the fundamental issues in the process, including borders. Ultimately, in order to address the concerns that we know that both parties have – refugees, security, Jerusalem, borders – those can only be resolved in direct negotiations themselves."

It is thought that Abbas may only have been delaying his final acquiescence to direct negotiations with the Israelis until after the meeting of the Arab League on July 29, when, presumably, he would receive the league's blessing to do so.

With or without the league's blessing, however, one conclusion is very certain: it is the PA leader and it has always been the PA leader who keeps the possibility of peace further and further away.

Whistleblowers attacked

The article "Mideast was at heart of Rights & Democracy crisis: report" (July 1), gives readers of The CJN little sense of the nature of the controversy at the organization. It was not the view of either side involved in the crisis that the Mideast was at its heart. The parliamentary committee wrote only that the Mideast was a significant factor underlying the dispute within the organization, not quite the same as saying that the heart of the dispute was differing views on the Mideast.

Rights & Democracy (an organization created by Parliament in 1988) had wandered far from its statutory mandate of training and funding developing world NGOs, so that these NGOs could advance democracy through promotion of human rights. The grants to organizations critical of Israel, a democratic country in the developed world, were the most flagrant, but far from the only indication of this wandering. This is so even if we put to one side the fact that two of the grants were made to Al Haq and Al Mezan, justifiably criticized as terror-linked organizations dedicated to delegitimizing, dehumanizing and demonizing Israel.

Attack against Israel deterred by nukes

A few words about the idea of a nuclear-free Middle East. (That is a cover for requesting a nuclear-free Israel). Israel is surrounded by hostile Arab states. Their total wealth and their united land armies are a serious, deadly challenge to the Jewish state. If there is any deterrent against an attack to annihilate Israel, it is the assumption that Israel has nuclear arms and would use them if its existence was in danger. As long as Israel has nuclear weapons, peace will not be guaranteed, but war will be avoided.

The article "Rubashkin appeals," (July 15), about the recent fraud conviction of kosher meat-packing executive Shalom Rubashkin includes a note that his plant was the site of a "federal immigration raid in May 2008 in which 389 illegal immigrants, including 31 children, were arrested," without mentioning that he was cleared of all charges connected to that raid.

Neturei Karta not 'haredi'

In "Neturei Karta bring protest to Toronto" (July 15), members of Neturei Karta are referred to as "haredim." Any true haredi Jew holds by the principle of "ahavat Yisroel" – love of fellow Jews – and would never make common cause with anti-Semites such as Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad or former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat, or any others who seek the genocide of all Jews in the Middle East. No matter what the Neturei Karta may claim, they are most certainly not haredi.

Acquired rights of peoples is irrevocable

Regarding the letter "God's law not basis for borders" by Dan Gurfinkiel (June 24), first, I fully agree with his statement that "in the case of God's law, as not everyone subscribes to the same religion, this is obviously not a basis for determining borders."

As for the matter of international law: the acquired rights of peoples is irrevocable according to international law, as per the Vienna Convention on Treaties of 1969, regardless of whether the treaty has expired or not. Imagine a world in which the acquired rights are subject to the whims of any political leader. It would be a recipe for total chaos!

In the case of the so-called "Palestinians," for a people to be entitled to a national home, they must prove a historical connection to the land for several centuries or a long enough period of time. This is beyond any doubt the case for the Jewish people, but it is a stretch of the imagination to believe that the newly forged Palestinian people meet this requirement.

One of the last great Yiddish writers

Time has come for a reappraisal of Chaim Grade

By JAN SCHWARZ

The centennial of the Yiddish writer Chaim Grade (1910-1982), which coincided with the death of his widow, Inna Hecker Grade on May 2, has not received much attention. The passing of Grade's wife might turn out to be the most significant event in the afterlife of his artistic career that spanned pre-Holocaust Vilna and his late blossoming after arriving in New York in 1948, where he became perhaps the greatest Yiddish fiction writer of the post-Holocaust generation. In the United States, he published a number of first-rate novels and short stories that depicted the yeshiva world and the poor workers, rabbis and scholars of Vilna, the Jerusalem of Lithuania.

For nearly 30 years after Grade's death, his widow didn't allow access to the writer's archive and unpublished manuscripts. Although Inna Hecker Grade translated Rabbis and Wives, a book of short stories published in 1982, she repeatedly voiced her skepticism about the feasibility of translating Grade into English. Because she didn't leave a will, the fate of Grade's unpublished work and personal documents will be decided by the Bronx public administrator charged with overseeing the estate. Posthumously published works, including a huge novel titled The Rabbi House, said to be among the unpublished manuscripts, will likely further enshrine Grade's already stellar credentials in Yiddish literature. It's highly unlikely, however, that this will alter Grade's obscurity outside the Yiddish world.

Like Yiddish poet Avrom Sutzkever, who recently died at the age of 96, Grade's work is deeply embedded in the Yiddish language, which he suffused with the characteristic litvak mentality of moral purpose, intellectualism and a dry sense of humour.

A litvak was a Lithuanian Jew who spoke a distinct Yiddish dialect and who resided in the northern and eastern area of the Pale of Settlement, including the Baltic States, White Russia and northeastern Poland. According to Uriel Weinreich's dictionary, a litvak is, "(proverbially) an incredulous, rationalistic, learned, strictly observant person." In a tribute to Sholom Aleichem, the great humourist of Yiddish literature and the opposite of a litvak, Grade characterized his great achievement as giving voice to ordinary people. Similarly, Grade's work is animated by voices of men and women arguing endlessly about how to live according to the Jewish moral and religious code in a time of social and political upheaval.

In the Yiddish world, Vilna remains the capital of a virtual Yiddishland in the scholarly, literary and popular imagination, although it is occasionally challenged by Warsaw. The most prominent Yiddish Vilna writers are Sutzkever, Grade and linguist Max Weinreich, a founder of YIVO, the Jewish Scientific Institute in Vilna in 1925. Outside the shrinking Yiddish world, these cultural heroes are unknown, or obscure, exotic remnants of a lost civilization.

In the world at large, the Yiddish writers of chassidic provenance have become the public face of their culture. Isaac Bashevis Singer, the son of a chassidic rabbi in Warsaw, has done more for the visibility of Yiddish culture on the world stage than any other. Like survivor writer Elie Wiesel and religious philosopher Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel, both scions of chassidic families, Singer made English translations of his work the stepping stone toward reaching a worldwide English readership. These writers' neo-chassidic worldview have successfully shaped English speaking Jews concept about eastern European Jewry, thus effectively sidelining Grade's, Weinreich's and Sutzkever's recreation of the religious, cultural and ethical predicaments of the litvaks.

In 1936, Grade published his first poetry collection, Yo (Yes). Its two opening poems gave an endearing portrait of his mother, who peddled apples in the Vilna market. The mother figure became a central theme in his work, depicted in a distinctly anti-Freudian manner as the embodiment of the decent, hardworking ordinary people such as in the autobiographical novel Der Mames Shabosim (My Mother's Sabbath Days, 1956). In 1939, Grade published his second book, Musernikes, an autobiographical poem about his experiences as a yeshiva student in Naveredok, one of the elite yeshivas of the Mussar movement. The Lithuanian Mussar movement, founded by Israel Salanter in the late 19th century, stressed correct ethical behaviour and self-criticism. In its extreme modes, these were achieved through means of cult-like group pressure and self flagellation. Grade's work from beginning to end is an attempt to express in poetry and prose the moral quandaries and inner world of the mussarniks.

In his short story Mayn Krig Mit Hersh Raseyner (My Quarrel With Hersh Rasseyner, 1953) a secular Yiddish writer, Chaim Vilner, Grade's autobiographical alter ego, and his friend from the Mussar yeshiva, Hersh Rasseyner, engage in a day-long argument about the questions confronting Jews in the aftermath of the Holocaust. Their opposite views clash in a powerful exposition of discursive prose coloured by talmudic reasoning and pilpul (argumentative hair-splitting). In a 1975 interview, Grade explained the origin of this story-essay, his first venture as prose writer, published in Commentary in 1953 shortly after its appearance in the journal Yidisher kemfer. Like other Yiddish émigré writers, after coming to the United States, Grade made a living on the Yiddish lecture circuit and by contributing to the Yiddish press. There was a demand for well-informed lectures about Judaism, and Jewish culture in the still-sizeable Yiddish-speaking communities in America and the rest of the world. It was at such an event, lecturing about Vilna and his life there, that Grade conceived of his story-essay.

His rival, Singer, had a similar career as a sought-after lecturer and contributor to the Yiddish press. Grade stayed within the Yiddish-speaking world, almost never venturing outside it to address an English-speaking audience. Singer, on the other hand, straddled both the Yiddish- and English-speaking worlds, and later, except for his regular installments in the Forverts, made the translation of his work into English his artistic priority. Unlike Singer, Grade never wrote about Jews in America. Except for nature lyrics, America does not figure in his literary world.

Grade talked about himself as a dikhter, a word that means more than a writer (shrayber). It is a man of letters with obligations to his people as prophetic guide and exponent of their collective destiny. Just as the Russian writers Tolstoy and Dostoyevsky, whom Grade worshipped, used their novelistic art to give expression to the Russian soul, Grade expressed the inner conflicts of the litvak body politic as it existed prior to its almost complete eradication. This literary credo did not play well in postwar America, where existentialism and modernism were all the rage in the 1950s and 1960s. Grade was a throwback to the social realism of the age of extremes in the interwar period. From the perspective of the postwar's Jewish renaissance represented by Singer, Philip Roth, Saul Bellow and Bernard Malamud, Grade's work was too burdened with outdated morality and social realism. Its fictional Jewish Vilna seemed like a cultural historical relic light years removed from the postwar miracle of Jewish American prosperity, security and a turn toward Israel and Zionism. With the exception of Singer, Grade's poor reception outside the Yiddish world has been similar to that of other Yiddish writers in the post-Holocaust period.

Grade's last novel, Fun Unter Der Erd (From Under the Earth) was serialized in the Forverts between 1979 and 1982, but it was left unfinished with his sudden death. In the war's aftermath, Jewish survivors attempted to rescue cultural treasures from the hands of the newly established Soviet power in Vilna. Grade depicts the destroyed Jewish Vilna from the perspective of the partisan-poet Sheyke Tshemerinski (a stand-in for the Yiddish poet and partisan, Shmerke Katcherginski, 1908-1954). Grade's work has come full circle from his lamentations upon returning to the ruined Vilna ghetto in 1944 in his autobiographical account Di zibn geselekh (The Seven Little Lanes, 1955). The excruciating futility of Tshemerinski's endeavour is expressed by a Jewish doctor who returns to the "liberated" Vilna in the novel's first chapter:

"And if it were a palace instead of this ghetto-prison that was officially designated as a museum; and even if the Soviet state should employ a whole staff to sort out and catalogue the books, the Torah scrolls and other holy texts, the overflowing bags and boxes with cards by scholarly nudniks [bores], who for decades prepared to write important works – would the slaughtered Vilna be resurrected? Can mountains of mouldy books replace a city of living and breathing Jews?" (Der forverts, March 25, 1979).

The time has come for a reappraisal of Grade's work. Simply as a cultural historical document, it remains second to none. Artistically, Grade developed the social realism of the writer known as the "grandfather" of Yiddish literature, Sholem Yankev Abramovitsh. Grade's work was thus first to illuminate the inner sanctum of Judaism – the shul and the yeshiva – in an authentic fashion, without any attempt to beautify, satirize and mythologize. This was an almost radical invention in Yiddish literature, in which klekoydesh (rabbis, cantors and other religious functionaries) have typically been depicted as either super-human, buffoons or corrupt (respectively, in Sh. Ansky's The Dybbuk, Sholom Aleichem's monologues and I.J. Singer's Yoshe Kalb).

The opening of Grade's archive will hopefully result in new publications and a renewed interest in the work and life of one of the last great Yiddish writers.

An obsolete office

One of the many good things about Canadian Jewry is that it doesn't have a chief rabbi. Though the one in Britain is often styled as having responsibilities for the Commonwealth, and although Canada is part of the Commonwealth, our Orthodox Jewish community would have nothing to do with this kind of undemocratic authoritarian representation. The rest of us are grateful.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Meir Persoff, formerly of the London Jewish Chronicle, has just published a book about the present chief rabbi, titled Another Way, Another Time. It's a devastating indictment of Rabbi Jonathan Sacks' 20-year tenure. It illustrates in embarrassing detail the yawning gap between learning and erudition, which the incumbent has in spades, and wisdom and maturity, which he seems to be lacking to an even higher degree.

But perhaps nobody could have done better, because the office itself has become obsolete. The book is replete with examples. On the one hand, the chief rabbi is trying to present Judaism as an open and inclusive faith calculated to make a good impression on the gentiles. On the other, he sees himself as an advocate of an Orthodoxy, the right-wing of which is determined to "out-frum" him. The radicalism that has come to dominate the Orthodox world has no room for alternatives in Judaism and no respect for other faiths.

As a result, Rabbi Sacks' Orthodox detractors suspect him of trying to ingratiate himself with non-Jews (the fact that he, like his predecessor, is now a peer of the realm gives substance to the allegations), while many non-Orthodox British Jews accuse him of being two-faced when he preaches what he calls "inclusivism" and practises the opposite.

Both seem to have a case.

Rabbi Sacks often adopts a cavalier way of dealing with non-Orthodox exponents while claiming to represent them. For example, he didn't attend the funeral of a nationally beloved Reform rabbi and refused to refer to him by his title. He also colluded with a congregation under his "jurisdiction" that wouldn't give an aliyah to the late Rabbi Louis Jacobs, Anglo-Jewry's most prominent and learned rabbi, because he had challenged the Orthodox establishment. The humiliation of this great scholar further diminished Rabbi Sacks' standing in the country.

By now, many of those who once supported him seem to realize that his office has become irrelevant. Some may even wish that he'd retire now as a first step towards abolishing the Victorian institution (which the British mandate bequeathed to the yishuv and from which Israel is now suffering). This may even help revitalize Anglo-Jewry, which the dwindling community badly needs and richly deserves.

It's tfillah, not prayer

With all this talk about God lately, I got to thinking about the traditional Jewish link to God, which is tfillah – not prayer, but tfillah, one of those Hebrew words that has no English equivalent. Words such as mitzvah, kedushah, tzedakah, and tfillah can, of course, be translated as commandment, holiness, charity, and prayer respectively, but they mean so much more, and their Hebrew roots connote complex values that can't be successfully communicated by one word of a foreign language, rooted as it is in an alien culture.

Seymour Epstein in Toronto

Take "prayer" for example. Its root is the French word "prier," to beg or request. If all of Jewish prayer were one big request from God, prayer might work as an equivalent of tfillah. But for two very good reasons, tfillah can't be so easily translated. Tfillah itself is a noun whose verb form and root is le-hitpalel, a reflexive verb that could mean a variety of things, but is usually understood as "to judge oneself." What an interesting way of thinking of prayer.

The other reason we can't speak of Jewish prayer as merely asking for stuff is that it's not that at all. Of course, we ask God for peace, health, good crops, a decent living, etc. But the siddur is filled with so much more that occupies the three daily services of the weekday, and the many additions for Shabbat, feasts, and fasts. There's praise, thanks, study, history, poetry and quiet meditation, all of it part of what we call tfillah.

Let's juxtapose two verses from the siddur as an example of the way we talk to God. At the end of the full Kaddish, we say, "May He who makes peace on high, make peace for us and all Israel." At the beginning of the Kedushah, basing itself on a vision in Isaiah 6, the Ashkenazi version of the siddur reads, "We will sanctify your name on earth as they [the angels of Isaiah's vision] sanctify it in heaven." This is serious God talk, as metaphoric as all of our sacred conversation, but both poetic and strongly assertive.

In the former tfillah, we're actually informing God of our utmost wish – shalom, another word that doesn't translate easily. In Hebrew, it means both peace and fullness or completion. This tfillah refers first to a complete inner peace and second to a national peace. In some liberal movement siddurim, a request for universal peace has been recently added. But more importantly, with reference to the unique nature of Jewish liturgy, this verse "reminds" God, as it were, that He is capable of making such peace, since it exists in the heavenly spheres, perhaps a reference to the apparent order of the rest of the universe, as compared to the mess we've made of the earth.

In the second verse taken from the Kedushah of the Amidah, we have, once again, a comparison of heaven and earth, but with an opposite notion. This verse speaks of our desire to sanctify God here on earth in the same way that Isaiah tells us that He is sanctified on high by the angels. (Don't let the metaphoric mode turn you off?)

Here we are talking to God, yet always speaking of our own rights and obligations. Are we not entitled to a peace that God is quite capable of maintaining in the rest of the universe? Do we not have an obligation to imitate the angels, as it were, and sanctify God in this world by honouring His values and conducting ourselves in a manner that would lead to more peace. And are these two assertions about the sacred life and peace not the very same thing?

This dialogue between our complex selves and the mysterious transcendent One is what we call tfillah, not prayer. We will never know if God needs it, but we do know that for 2,000 years, in every corner of the globe, Jews have judged themselves and tempered their behaviour by means of the daily ritual of reading themselves into the siddur and reading the siddur into their lives.

Charged, with praying

More than any of the details, I remember the woman's indignation when she recollected her son's suspension from school. He was young, not yet a bar mitzvah, and something of a goody-goody, so she was more surprised than alarmed to be summoned to the principal's office.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

His offence? Not hitting another child, not damaging school property, not talking back to his teachers, not falling behind in his work. He prayed. And not alone, but with most of the other boys in his class. It seems that the teacher was tardy one morning, and the boys were a bit disoriented by his absence. It was a Jewish day school, and they usually began the school day with Shacharit (morning services). After a bit of time had passed, some of the boys decided to commence Shacharit without the teacher.

When the teacher opened the door to his classroom, he was perturbed by what he saw as lack of proper respect. They should have waited. The principal explained this to the boys, then asked for a show of hands – who had participated in this unregulated Shacharit? Out of all the boys, only her son raised his hand. He was suspended, his parents called in for a conference.

"I didn't say anything at home," she recollected, "because I always felt you had to support the teachers and the school in front of the children." But when she met with the principal, she spoke her mind. That her son was the only one to tell the truth, and that he was punished severely, struck her as unfair and wrong-headed. Even decades later, remembering the episode, she was indignant. "And for what? For davening! He was suspended for davening."

I hadn't thought of that story for years. But it came to mind recently when I learned of the arrest (yet again) of Anat Hoffman, charged with – yes – davening – praying at the Kotel while holding a sefer Torah.

Beyond all sense, the Kotel has become the locale of a pitched battle for territoriality, which has come to a head around the issue of women's prayer. Sure, it's fine for women to pour their hearts at the Kotel in individual prayer. But to constitute a prayer group – to pray together, as men do at the Kotel, to read or even carry a sefer Torah – has evolved into a punishable offence. In a struggle that has gone on for more than two decades, involving multiple arrests, restraining orders and Supreme Court decisions, the humanly ordained parameters for women's worship of God has grown narrower and narrower.

The secular instruments of government adjudicate and enforce the religious edicts asserted by haredim regarding women, Torah and prayer. The halachic views of liberal Judaism and of modern Orthodoxy carry no weight at all in this matter, effectively ceding the Kotel to haredim. And Jewish women are arrested at the Kotel for davening.

So much of our community and its leadership has expressed deep concern about matters with the potential to "tear apart the Jewish people" – to use the language of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in explaining his opposition to the proposed conversion bill, which would delegitimate conversions performed outside Israel by liberal rabbis (and some modern Orthodox rabbis) not only for determining religious status but the right to make aliyah. Especially in the wake of reports of a growing gap between Israel and Diaspora Jewry, and demographic studies indicating a drift of young Jews from Jewish neighbourhoods and Jewish affiliations, there's a danger in actions that increase factionalism or push Jews outside the pale.

Meanwhile, at the Kotel, Jewish women who want nothing more than to come together to recite Jewish prayers and read Torah at a Jewish holy site face prosecution.

The boy suspended those many years ago was my brother. The memory rankled my mother long after he had children of his own. "Can you imagine?" she would say. "Suspended for davening?"

Can you imagine? Arrested for davening? Those women, our sisters.

The Kirshner File

Turkey's reclusive and secretive donme sect

Shabatai Tzvi, the charismatic rabbi and mystic revered as the messiah by his starry-eyed acolytes, converted to Islam in 1666 before the Ottoman sultan, Mehmet IV. Alienated by his apostasy, some of his followers lost faith and returned to normative Judaism. Still others, the Shabateans, remained true to Judaism but continued to regard Tzvi as a prophet. A third group, consisting of 200 to 300 devoted families, followed him blindly into Islam and called themselves donmeler or donme ("converts" in Turkish).

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Concentrated in the mainly Greek city of Salonika, and known as enlightened secularists and Turkish nationalists, the donme were widely accepted as Muslims, although they maintained a distinct ethno-religious identity, hewed to endogamous marriage practices and built separate schools and cemeteries.

Astute businessmen, they were instrumental in transforming Salonika into a cosmopolitan centre of commerce and trade. They also played a leading role in the formation of the Committee of Union and Progress (CUP), the secret society of Young Turks that deposed a powerful sultan, Abdulhamid II, in the wake of the 1908 revolution.

With the fall of the Ottoman Empire and the rise of the Republic of Turkey after World War I, the Muslims of Salonika, including the donme, were driven out of Greece and resettled in the Turkish homeland, where they were completely integrated into Muslim society.

To obscurantist Muslims, however, the donme were crypto-Jews who had been engaged in a satanic plot to dissolve the empire and replace it with a secular republic.

Until recently, the donme were not studied closely by academics because members of this closed sect were outwardly indistinguishable from other Muslims and practised a culture of secrecy that kept outsiders at bay.

Marc David Baer, a professor of history at the University of California, has written a first-rate book that sheds new light on them. The Donme: Jewish Converts, Muslim Revolutionaries and Secular Turks (Stanford University Press) traces their journey from conversion in the 17th century to complete assimilation in the mid-20th century.

Baer, in his preface, says he could not have written it without much labour, imagination, chance encounter, good fortune and, of course, interviews with their descendants in Turkey, the United States and western Europe.

Although the donme were usually seen as a homogenous mass, they splintered into three sects after the death of Tzvi: the Yakubi, the Karakas and the Kapanci.

The Yakubis scrupulously observed Sunni Muslim religious obligations. The Karakas adhered more closely to Tzvi's principles and attracted followers in Poland, including Jacob Frank, who converted to Islam and then to Christianity. The Kapanci represented the pietistic or revivalist streak among the donme. All three groups avoided relations with Jews.

Rabbis branded them as deviants. A circular published by the chief rabbi in Istanbul in 1914 accused them of immorality, sexual perversity, infidelity, dishonesty, lack of honour, religious blasphemy and trickery.

Incorporating elements of Kabbalah and Sufi Islam, and reciting prayers in Hebrew and Ladino, the donme effectively merged Judaism with Islam.

Though they were traditional and conservative, they were intellectually open to the world, establishing centres all over Europe.

Numbering perhaps 5,000 in the 19th century, the donme had a membership of 10,000 to 15,0000 by the turn of the 20th century, when they possessed their own lay and religious leaders and a network of communal courts, jails and mosques.

Not surprisingly, they lived together in the same neighbourhoods.

Since they were so clannish, they aroused suspicion in insular Muslim circles. In the late 19th century, Ottoman officials recognized that they were not quite like other Muslims.

But as Baer points out, more and more donme during this period abandoned the precepts of their founder and internalized Islamic values. Indeed, some donme became sincere and upstanding Muslims, advancing to exalted positions in Sufi orders, the civil service and the army, jobs that were generally off-limits to Jews and Christians.

None were faithful Jews, like conversos in Spain or Portugal. Yet this was a moot point, given that Jewish leaders did not even consider them Jews.

After Salonika fell to the Greeks, many donme headed to Istanbul. In a massive population transfer, upwards of 500,000 Muslims went to Turkey, while up to 1.2 million Christians in Turkey ended up in Greece.

Baer speculates that the donme, had they remained in Salonika, would probably have been categorized as Jews by Nazi Germany during its occupation of Greece and transported to Auschwitz.

"The population exchange saved the donme from certain murder at the hands of the Nazis," he writes. "Over 95 per cent of Salonikan Jews were deported to Auschwitz and most gassed within hours of arrival."

In Istanbul neighbourhoods such as Nisantasi and Bakirkoy, the donme tried to recreate their former lives, observing time-worn feasts, festivals and fasts and burying their dead in the Bulbuldere cemetery in the Uskudar district. As well, they attempted to maintain their textile, timber and tobacco businesses. Their clannishness and adherence to tradition had a lasting impact. As Baer puts it, "Muslims began to look more closely at [their] identity."

A donme family in the early 20th century

He adds, "The uncertainty surrounding the donme was due to the fact that they appeared to hide their true identity, although there was little if anything that would outwardly distinguish them from other Muslims."

Under the government's Turkification policy, donme were intentionally dispersed throughout Turkey. Apart from Istanbul, they were resettled in Izmir, Ankara and Bursa.

During the 1920s, the identity of the donmes was debated in the Turkish press and parliament as prominent Turks denounced them. Many who had been CUP members were dismissed from their jobs, imprisoned and banned from journalism.

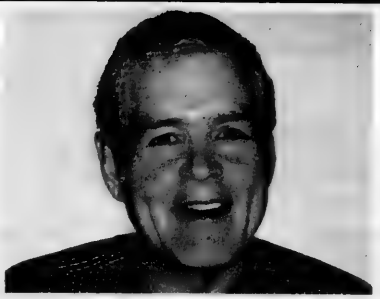
But some donme, such as Tevfik Rustu Aras, blended in perfectly. One of the republic's first foreign ministers and a crony of its founder, Mustafa Kemal Ataturk, he was a descendant of the Karakas clan and served from 1925 to 1938.

By Baer's reckoning, the donme ultimately came under attack due to the nature of their genes: "In the end, they were attacked, not for acting like Jews, but for being Jews, for their racial identity, which allegedly caused them to spread bad morals."

When the Turkish government imposed its infamous wealth tax (varlik vergisi) on minorities in 1942, the donme had to shell out, too. Baer says that the tax, ostensibly described as a measure against war profiteers whatever their religious and ethnic backgrounds, should be viewed as "the culmination of efforts" to liberate the economy from non-Muslims and thereby create a Turkish Muslim bourgeoisie. Baer compares the tax to the poll tax (jizya) that Christians and Jews had to pay during the Ottoman era. In any case, the tax hastened the departure of Jews from Turkey in the aftermath of World War II.

Unlike Jews, the donme did not emigrate. Having reached the conclusion that they were suspect in the eyes of some Turks, they found a path to complete acceptance through intermarriage with Muslims. Says Baer, "Facing strong prejudice, many donme decided to abandon their separate ethno-religious identity to defend themselves (and their descendants) from hatred and violence."

Romspen is the best financial decision I have ever made.



I am wary of investment tips. Most are a recipe for losing money. But investing with Romspen is absolutely the best investment decision I ever made. In fact, I have reinvested many times over the years.

Don't confuse Romspen with the scammers. Romspen is not too good to be true. It is a fund of first mortgages in Canada that is managed by experienced and fine people. It works because they know what they are doing. Their excellent reputation with both investors and borrowers is well deserved.

Check Point is an Israeli high tech leader

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel's status as a leader in high tech can in part be attributed to such Israeli companies as Check Point Software Technologies Ltd.

Founded in 1993 by three computer geeks fresh out of the army, Check Point makes systems that are considered the industry standard in Internet security.

"The company has grown from scratch into a billion dollar enterprise with more than 1,000 employees," said Check Point's vice-president of global field operations, Amnon Bar-Lev, who was in Toronto last week.

Sales last year were $924 million and are expected to top $1 billion this year, he said.

Check Point, a world leader in network security software, sells 40 per cent of its products in North America, 40 per cent in Europe and 20 per cent in Asia and Oceania.

Its firewall software has been bought by almost every Fortune 500 company, as well as by the Israel Defence Forces.

Check Point hasn't been affected by the boycott campaign against Israel, he noted in an interview, after a presentation in which he introduced two new products.

"We're a global company with a global community of customers," he said

Amnon Bar-Lev

A public company with headquarters in Israel, Check Point has 80 offices around the globe and trades on the NASDAQ exchange.

The Canadian branch, established in the late 1990s, is headed by Paul Comessotti.

Check Point was founded by Gil Shwed and two army buddies, Shlomo Kramer and Marius Nacht, who worked in a top-secret computer unit.

At the time, the Internet was used mainly by academics and the military.

After leaving the army, they used their knowledge and experience to build a security system that allowed users to tap into confidential information while denying access to others.

Check Point's Firewall-1 and VPN-1 software took the computer world by storm.

"We created a total security solution," said Bar-Lev, 47, a Tel Aviv University graduate in computer science and management who has been a Check Point employee for the past five years.

In his presentation, Bar-Lev unveiled two security systems: Abra, a plug-and-play device that lets users gain access to corporate data from any PC, while DLP (Data Loss Prevention) ensures that e-mails aren't accidentally sent to unintended recipients.

Bar-Lev described both products as easy to install, simple and straightforward to use and reasonably priced.

Observing that the high-tech sector has been a major driver of Israel's economy, Bar-Lev said it continues to attract investors from both inside and outside the country.

"Mistake," she said tersely of Bezeq's decision.

Hoffman said swimming has given her the discipline not to give up. "And I will not give up."

For the past 21 years, Hoffman has been at the Kotel for the Women of the Wall Rosh Chodesh service marking the new month.

"We are allowed to carry the Torah," she said. "If you don't assert rights, you will lose them."

For at least the past eight months, Hoffman said, police have been confiscating the group's Torah before they entered the Kotel area and keeping it in the trunk of the car of the chief of police. Before that, the women carried the sefer Torah in a duffel bag.

"We felt it is not kuvedik to carry a Torah in a bag... We felt it is not mechubad," she said, using both Yiddish and Hebrew terms to convey honour that is due.

"The idea of checking people's bags at the entrance to the Kotel is to take from them contraband – bombs, knives."

Women are not allowed to use the Torah at the main part of the Wall. When Hoffman was arrested, she was leading about 150 women from the women's section of the Wall to Robinson's Arch, where they may use the Torah.

Hoffman spoke of the "tradition of violence" at the Wall, and noted that a video on YouTube shows chairs being thrown from the men's section into the women's section before a Rosh Chodesh service.

She believes there will not be a resolution to the issues unless there is "pressure on our side.

"It's going to get worse unless we fight against it."

Hoffman urges Jews in Canada to write to the Israeli ambassador, prime minister and president to "make it uncomfortable for Israelis that they have sold out the Wall."

Last Thursday in Washington, D.C., a multi-denominational rally was held outside the Israeli Embassy to denounce Hoffman's arrest.

"The Wall has become an ultra-Orthodox synagogue where violence plays a role in enforcing the rules," Hoffman said, adding that "of course there should be a synagogue with a mechitzah there that would cater to the needs of the minority Orthodox."

Some national ceremonies are no longer held at the Kotel because of increased stringencies, Hoffman said. "They used to hand out identity cards for new olim at the Kotel. This was stopped by Natan Sharansky six months ago when the rabbi of the Kotel refused to allow [the new olim] to sit together."

As well, she noted, female Israel Defence Forces commanders used to swear in new soldiers and sing Hatikvah, but that's no longer allowed. Now, she said, men do all the swearing-in, and women either don't sing, or move their lips "without sound coming out."

Beyond the boundaries of the Kotel area, Hoffman cited gender-segregated sidewalks in Jerusalem haredi areas Mea Shearim and Geula, more than 100 segregated buses and a segregated police station in Ashdod.

"It doesn't end at the Wall," she warned. "It just begins."

Coast To Coast

Israel and Israelis are unfairly caricatured

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In a July 12 Globe and Mail opinion piece, "Is Israel a normal country?" Ian Buruma raised a number of important questions about why Israel, as he acknowledged, is "judged by different standards from other countries."

Buruma gave a few reasons for the double standard (although they are only part of a much longer list): the charge of imperialism and colonialism is projected onto Israel, making it bear the burden of the West's past sins in the Third World; as a democracy Israel inevitably is going to be judged by higher standards than are applied to the surrounding Arab dictatorships; but related to this is what Israeli philosopher Avishai Margalit has termed "moral racism" – which Buruma explains as the "bloodlust of an African or Asian people is not taken as seriously as that of a European – or other white – people." In other words, since the West has systematically low expectations of others (but why did Buruma fail to also mention Arab people in this context?), this racism results in intensified scrutiny on those seen to be "like us" – the Israelis.

What Buruma failed to note, however, is the crucial fact that Israel is not only judged by a higher standard than is applied to "Third World" people, it is frequently judged by a higher standard than is expected of the "First World" – of other democracies in the West. We see this most clearly in the emotionally charged rush to judgment by the United Nations and organizations such as Human Rights Watch, which condemn Israel for "war crimes" against the Palestinians while remaining silent when U.S. and NATO forces kill large numbers of civilians in their counter-insurgency operations in Afghanistan and Iraq.

Buruma went on to fault Israelis for using their role as victims of the Holocaust as an excuse to act brutally and aggressively against Palestinians, implying that this is a wilful policy. Yet, by depicting Palestinians only as victims, not actors shaping their own destiny, he ironically committed the very sin he commends Margalit for recognizing.

Buruma, for instance, ignored the long history of Arab and Palestinian rejection of Israel's very right to exist. He ignored the fact that previous Israeli governments have tried to reach a negotiated resolution of the conflict with the Palestinians, only to be met with violence that has left the majority of Israelis who favour a two-state solution convinced that they do not currently have a reliable negotiating partner.

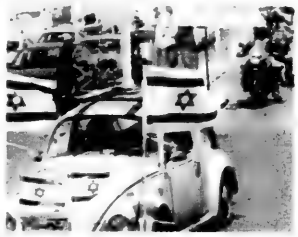
Speaking of "Israelis" – Jim Lederman, who is writing a book on the nature of Israeli society and governance, asked (in conversation from his office in Jerusalem), "Which 'Israelis' is he talking about? To Buruma and others like him, the 'Israelis' seem to be a formless miasma of oppression.

"That, of course, is not true. Most Israelis, Jew and Arab, are sensible, humane, sentient individuals."

Lederman is appalled by the failure of journalists to pay any attention to the 70 per cent of ordinary Israelis who comprise what he calls the "rational centre" of the country. "They've not only been written out of the story of what is happening here, they've been written out of history," he said. "And it is these people who make the country work, make all the final decisions on policy, and who have to clean up the mistakes their own governments make."



'The 70 per cent of ordinary Israelis who comprise the rational centre of the country' demostrate on behalf of Gilad Schalit.

Lederman added: "Instead, what we get is not even a cartoon or a caricature of 'the Israelis,' but a stick-figure drawing – one arm is the settlers, the other arm is the army; one leg is the government, the other is the ultra-Orthodox, and the torso is the 'occupation.' But in this case, the head – the people – is invariably left out.

"The situation is exacerbated by the fact the elites in the Diaspora follow the journalists and talk only about the elites. Then, both the journalists and the elites have the gall to claim that the Israeli public is apathetic because they're not out marching in the streets. Those who count the most are simply too busy working. Nonetheless, when presented with an existential problem or the need to make a fundamental decision about peace, they do rouse themselves and provide the needed legitimacy for compromise. Without their participation and consent, no agreement is possible."

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Philanthropists Joseph & Wolf Lebovic welcomed close to 50 guests to a fabulous outdoor barbecue on July 11th in the Koschitzky Family Courtyard of the Kimel Family Education Centre. The event was the perfect opportunity for the brothers to showcase the incredible progress being made in the development of the Joseph & Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan. Guests, many of them donors to UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign, were taken on guided bus tours of the campus and the surrounding neighbourhoods to see first-hand, the growing community already putting down roots in the area.

Construction on the current phase of the Lebovic Campus began in November and includes the Schwartz/Reisman Centre, the Phil Granovsky Sports & Recreation Pavilion, the Sharp Family Atrium, the Leo & Sala Goldhar Conference & Celebration Centre, and the Gorman Shore Goodman Childhood Education Centre. The grand opening of these facilities – and many others – is slated for the fall of 2012. For more information visit LebovicCampus.com or TomorrowCampaign.com.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Online Jewish auctions

Want to bid on an original Chagall? How about a siddur from the 16th century? Or a baseball card featuring a Major League Jewish player? Although you may be tempted to travel to a famous auction house, you can bid for a wealth of Jewish artifacts and ephemera right from your computer.

But before you buy (or sell) anything through an online auction, you should check the reliability of the site and its policies regarding commission, shipping, insurance, tax, duty and returns. I strongly recommend reading a primer written by the U.S. Federal Trade Commission, "Internet Auctions: A Guide for Buyers and Sellers." [http://bit.ly/aucti01]

Jewish & Digital
By Mark Mietkewicz

Of course the granddaddy of all online auctions isn't actually a "Jewish" auction. But Jewish collectors are bound to find something interesting in eBay's Jewish section, where there were over 25,000 items up for sale when I last checked. [http://bit.ly/aucti02]

At the upper end, you can bid on a 15th century Hebrew Incunabula (printed booklet) from Naples or buy it now for $23,500 (US). [http://bit.ly/aucti03] If that's a bit rich for your taste, you can purchase a first day cover featuring Hammerin' Hank Greenberg, the Jewish all-star home run slugger of the Detroit Tigers. [http://bit.ly/aucti04]

At its most recent auction, Jerusalem-based MatArts sold a Johannes Jacobus Hilverdink (1837-1884, Dutch). His View of Jerusalem (1874 oil on canvas) went for $110,500. [http://bit.ly/aucti05] Although there are no MatArts auctions scheduled right now, you can view that three-hour auction online and decide whether you would have raised your virtual paddle to bid. [http://bit.ly/aucti06]

Available right now over at Virtual Judaica Auctions:

- a poster announcing the funeral of Rabbi Isaac Jacob Weiss (1902–1989), chief dayan of the Edah Haredit of Jerusalem;
- a 19th-century silk far eastern tallit bag,
- and the Jewish cookbook, Israelitisches Kochbuch (Prague 1886). [http://bit.ly/aucti12]

Aside from acquiring a beautiful piece of art or religious object, is collecting Judaica a good investment? An article at Antiquetrader.com [http://Antiquetrader.com] says yes and suggests that Austrian, German and Polish silver Torah ornaments dating from 1850 to 1880 have held their value in times of economic stress. [http://bit.ly/aucti08]

Jonathan Greenstein of the Judaica auction house J. Greenstein Co. agrees, but warns that the Jewish market is flooded with fakes. So be careful before you bid. [http://bit.ly/aucti09]

In a surprising side effect of the Madoff scandal, the Judaica market has been flooded with antiques by people who have had to part with treasures to shore up lost fortunes. Last year Rhea Schindler, widow of Rabbi Alexander Schindler of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, was forced to auction off a 200-year old diamond adorned yad (Torah pointer) that went for $23,000. [http://bit.ly/aucti10]

If you're planning a trip to Israel and want to try a different kind of auction, bid on a meal at a restaurant at eluna.com [http://eluna.com]. Here's how it works: a dinner for two at Café Inbal in Jerusalem is valued at 150 shekels. The current bid is 70 shekels. If that bid wins, the bidder can go to the restaurant and enjoy a meal at less than half price. [http://bit.ly/aucti11]

More Jews in canoes: I recently did a column on camping and Jews, but neglected to mention the Mosaic Outdoor Club of Ontario, which has been organizing seasonal activities for Jewish adults for the past 13 years. Coming up is an Aug. 20 voyage along the province's French River. [http://mosaicontario.org]

A fateful choice of software

For my bar mitzvah, I was given a gift certificate to Chapters Indigo. Walking through the aisles, I agonized over what to buy. Should it be a Jewish text, connecting me to the rich tradition of my religion (and fitting for a bar mitzvah gift), or a set of Archie comics, which brought me hours of laughs during the preceding summer at camp? A "great" novel that my parents insisted was part of the canon of literature that any young man must master, or a CD of my favourite band? After hours of deliberation, I selected a piece of computer software that, unbeknownst to me, would shape my personal and professional identity – Family Tree Maker.

CLASS ACT
By Daniel Held

At first I thought it would be exciting to see my name and that of my parents, sister and cousins on a family tree. I imagined a few branches heading off in different directions with a couple of dozen names in the database. Within a few months, however, the software had become my and my parents' obsession. Within a few years, we had travelled to Germany to take rubbings of tombstones, searched through archives in Tel Aviv and New York, discovered lost branches of the family in Australia, Argentina and South Africa, input the details of more than 2,100 family members into the program, and reincorporated a number of long-lost family traditions into our ritual practice.

Growing up, I didn't know much of my family. In the mid 1930s, my family fled Germany in search of safety from the Nazis. While fortunate to find refuge, they dispersed to the far corners of the globe. In the process, they lost one another and much of the family tradition. Born to immigrant parents living in Canada, with my grandparents across the ocean in South Africa and England, this sense of familial disconnect was compounded for me, as I didn't have grandparents to tell me stories and family lore. It was during weekly Sunday morning telephone calls, fraught with static and interruptions, and regular summer visits, that I connected with my grandparents and my past.

In hindsight, my selection of Family Tree Maker was likely born not only of a desire to see my immediate family on the computer screen, but it was a way for me to strengthen the roots of family and tradition. Through the process of researching and slowly uncovering my family's story, I developed a deep sense of history and a connection to my family's and my people's history. This sense of historical and genealogical connection has informed my educational philosophy and engendered my passion for teaching Jewish history and tradition. To me, teaching is a form of retelling my people's narrative, which finds an echo in my students' own histories.

One of my favourite classroom projects is to ask my students to construct their own family trees. Over the course of the project, students interview their parents, grandparents and other relatives. Not only do they ask for names and birth dates, but they ask to hear family stories. It's these narratives that are often the most compelling part of the exercise. I've heard students repeat epic stories of immigration, struggle and success alongside accounts of practical jokes their grandparents would play on siblings and cousins.

History connects us to the past. To me, however, it's our personal stories that make history come alive, connecting us to our family, our people, our community and our religion and informing our values and ideals.

Thinking back to that day in Chapters Indigo, as I walked up and down the aisles debating between the Archie comic and the CD, I realize that the choice of Family Tree Maker is a story unto itself that I will, one day, share with my family.

Fighting double standards on campus

ON CAMPUS
By Justin Dahan

April 4 was a night that Mark Klibanov will surely not forget.

That was the night the current president of Hillel Ottawa's Israel Awareness Committee (IAC) and his roommate, Nick Bergamini, were chased by a group of anti-Zionist thugs, one of whom had a machete.

This incident has been reported here in The CJN, as well as in other national media outlets.

At B'nai Brith's recent national meeting, Klibanov was asked to speak, as a representative of both Carleton University and the Israel Advocacy Committee, but also as the witness to, and victim of, a hate crime.

In his speech, Klibanov gave his explanation of why the attack happened, "The incitement was based purely on the fact that we were Zionists, based on some of the slurs that came out of their mouths," he said.

Klibanov also outlined his involvement in Ottawa's Jewish community and talked about his team at Carleton and the University of Ottawa. "Recently I was elected as the city-wide president of the Israel Awareness Committee, which is the Israel advocacy wing of the student Jewish community at both Carleton and the University of Ottawa. It's worth mentioning our executive team, as they are both extremely capable and enthusiastic for the upcoming year. At Carleton, we have Alina Sherman, who has been actively advocating for Israel since before I enrolled in university. At Ottawa U, we have Matthew Stancek, who also sits on the executive board of the Ottawa U campus Conservatives and has always been a proud supporter of Israel," he said.

Klibanov is confident they'll be able to achieve their goals of advocating for Israel. He also touched on some of the issues plaguing Carleton.

"At Carleton University, during Israeli Apartheid Week, current and retired professors are allowed to hold hands and sing anti-Israel songs in the very middle of our atrium, the single busiest area on campus," he said. "They are permitted to condemn the only democratic nation in the region, yet we are not allowed to condemn extremist Islam, terrorism and oppressive regimes."

He also spoke of the hostile attitude that has historically greeted anyone who has tried to defend Israel and condemn those who oppose it. He cited an AEPi fraternity event that took place at Carleton in 2008.

"The idea was to set up a short stretch of fence somewhere in the corner of the university atrium that resembled the security fence in the West Bank," he said. "The fence would have information posted on the front that dispelled some of the myths surrounding this issue back in Israel."

The result? "Quite quickly, the event escalated to arguing, shouting, threats of violence and finally violence itself," Klibanov said. "Toward the end, it was probably a crowd of 40 angry pro-Palestinian students versus 10 pro-Israel students, including myself, and [we were] outnumbered, as usual."

Klibanov said this double standard needs to be dealt with. "I hope that during my term as president of the IAC, I can bring the two opposite ends of the spectrum back to the centre for a civil conversation and show that being pro-Israeli and pro-Palestinian does not have to be mutually exclusive."

Conversion as a strategic goal

By Israel Harel

The inability, or unwillingness, to meet the needs of more than 300,000 immigrants who are not halachically Jewish has been a frustrating problem in Israel for many years. These immigrants can't convert even if they want to, because they must promise to maintain a religious lifestyle. Then Yisrael Beiteinu went and submitted a conversion bill that encountered a wall of political and media opposition.

Did the bill's detractors ask themselves why it was put forth by the party that is most identified with these immigrants? Alternatively, is it possible that this party, whose political sense is the sharpest in Israel, would back a bill that is damaging to its voters?

Since there is no reason to believe that Yisrael Beiteinu or its chairman have changed their position regarding the bill, we must ask what is really behind the opposition to the bill and to the threat – yes, threat – that it will divide the Jewish people. And we must also ask why this threat from Reform and Conservative Judaism has been joined by some who take a positive view of mixed marriage and of the secularization and de-Zionization of Israel, via the High Court of Justice.

There is more than a little ignorance of the bill's purpose among the Reform and Conservative Jews who are threatening to stop the flow of donations from Jewish communities abroad to Israel, a move that I favour in principle, and to convince the U.S. Congress and the media to pressure Israel not to pass the law, which I consider to be pure chutzpah.

Not surprisingly, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, panicked by the pressure from these movements, has accepted the validity of their empty threat that the law would "divide the Jewish people."

Does Yisrael Beiteinu, which has an interest in bringing into the ranks of the Jewish people every immigrant who so desires, seek to divide the Jewish people? The fact that this party proposed the bill should reassure rather than rile up Reform and Conservative Jews. Is it logical for a party so dependent on the votes of immigrants who are not Jewish in accordance with religious law to be behind a bill that seeks to make the conversion process more difficult?

The Reform and Conservative movements want to obtain official status in Israel, alongside Orthodoxy. I support this. It is this desire that is the true reason for their outcry. But even if the High Court grants their wish, their status will remain unchanged. There are fewer than 100 congregations in Israel that describe themselves as Reform or Conservative, and most are small. Compare that to thousands of active and growing Orthodox congregations. Only spiritual influence, not High Court rulings, can fill their ranks, and influence legislation.

The purpose of the Conversion Bill is to increase the number of Jews, and as such it must be supported on principle. It is a strategic goal, a matter of survival for our people, whose ranks are dwindling exponentially. Diaspora Jewry is in an accelerated process of extinction, out of choice, and every action that increases the worldwide Jewish population, whether legislative or educational, is welcome.

The bill's opponents are concealing the fact that it would not revoke Israel's recognition of Reform and Conservative conversions performed abroad. The only split in the Jewish people is thus the one carried out daily by those who split off from it. The hundreds of thousands of people who have turned away from Judaism did so irrespective of the admitted difficulties of converting in Israel, and this will hold for those who desert in the future, too. They will not even be aware of the existence, assuming it is passed, of the Conversion Law.

Jewish Life

A Passion Play that's probably as good as it gets

By JENNIE MORGAN
Special to The CJN

Passion Plays have a bad reputation among Jews and a good one among anti-Semites. But a small town in Germany really does seem to want to change that.

The Passion Play tradition has all but died out since the Middle Ages, though it was famously revisited in Mel Gibson's 2004 film, The Passion of the Christ. Oberammergau, an otherwise obscure burg just outside of Munich, is keeping the tradition alive. Every 10 years, the villagers do what they have done since the 16th century – re-enact the last few days of Christ's life in the Oberammergau Passionsspiele.

Guest Voice

Though the production has modest medieval origins, it now has enough dazzle to rival the most elaborate Broadway musical: a cast of 2,000, a fully weatherproof yet still semi open-air theatre, and authentic period costumes complete with pharisaic priestly garb. The entire town collaborates in the production. To appear in the Passion Play, actors must have resided in Oberammergau for at least 20 years.

On May 27, I took a train from Munich to Oberammergau to see the play. Since the town itself is Judenrein, my first thought was, "Is that to make sure they don't have any real Jews in the cast?" As I watched the play, however, I was pleasantly surprised.

Jesus is depicted as a practising Jew, who recites blessings in Hebrew, lifts a Torah scroll, lights a menorah and wears traditional Jewish garb. His apostles follow suit. There is no hint of revulsion at the notion of Jews or Jewish observance, as was the way the play was performed from the Middle Ages until a decade or two ago.

In addition, much of the blame for Christ's death is placed on Judas, who delivers a long soliloquy filled with sadness and regret before dramatically hanging himself. There may have been a mob screaming for Christ's demise in the final scene of the play, but it couldn't compare with one man's devastating betrayal. Watching the action unfold, I couldn't help but think that the message was more one of personal than collective guilt. Judas was portrayed as the prime mover in the dramatic conclusion of the play, far more than any mob of Jews.

Although it remains an obscure theatrical event, the Oberammergau Passion Play has not escaped attention in the larger Jewish world. Rabbi Noam Marans of the American Jewish Committee and Rabbi Eric Greenberg of the Anti-Defamation League have recently published their reflections on the current version. Both agree that the production is not as anti-Semitic as in years past. At the same time, Rabbi Greenberg has said that it continues to perpetuate the "false accusation that it was the Jews who were responsible for the crucifixion."

The truth or falsehood of the entire crucifixion scene is, of course, a matter for debate, since the historical accuracy of the Gospels is a hotly contested issue. Whether a mob of Jews was present during the execution of Jesus Christ, and whether they clamoured for his death, is one of the ancient text's open questions. Of course, so is almost everything else about the story, including the true origins of Christ's teachings and the historical existence of the man himself.

The problem with Rabbi Greenberg's perspective is that it identifies the heart of the tale as its real problem, leaving little room for the existence of a Passion Play. The story that the Gospels tell has at its core the conflict between Christ, the Pharisees – the ancient Jewish leadership – and the Jewish "street." To edit out the anti-Jewish flavour of the story is to eliminate the story. The Jewish world's rejection of Christ and his teachings, and Christianity's following of its own non-Jewish path, is precisely what the New Testament's foundational story is all about.

The theme of the Gospels ensures that no Jew will ever feel good about seeing the story on stage. That said, this year's Passion Play is probably the best I could hope to see. If the townsfolk of Oberammergau haven't got it right this time around, they probably never will.

Birthright Israel No Limits trip gives disabled full access to the Jewish state

Torontonian with cerebral palsy finally experiences Israel firsthand

By Daniel Horowitz

For Toronto's Jessica Silver, visiting Israel had long been a dream.

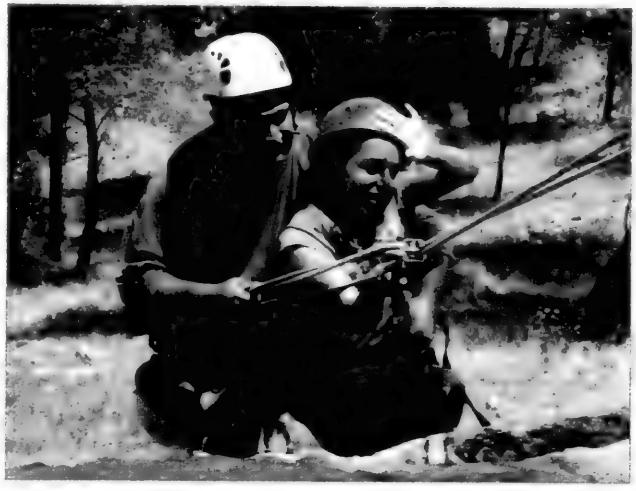
The 21-year-old had watched as many friends set out to enjoy the Jewish state over the years; even her own sister Joanne participated in Birthright Israel six years ago. But, for Jessica, who has spent her entire life in a wheelchair as a result of being born with cerebral palsy, her dream seemed destined to remain just that.

"I always thought it would be amazing to go, but I figured that being in a wheelchair would just make it too difficult, with too many constraints; too many accessibility issues, and, of course, travelling is always a challenge," says the fourth-year York University student. "Even here, in Toronto, I find it tough to get around sometimes. Many places claim that they're accessible, but often they are not."

But, when it comes to a young Jewish adult discovering his or her Israeli roots, Taglit Birthright Israel, which is funded by the government of Israel, private philanthropists, Jewish communities around the world, in accommodations, site visits and activities, was designed for participants with reduced mobility, so that they too could reap the life-changing benefits of the Taglit Birthright Israel experience.

"I've taken many history courses, as well as some world religion courses, so I've had a lot of exposure to the historical context of Israel, but to actually be there, to finally see this remarkable place, to meet its people and to be immersed in the culture was completely amazing," gushes Jessica, who, like the other participants brought a chaperone on the trip. In Jessica's case, it was her mom Julia who also experienced Israel for the first time.

"Finally being there, I felt as if I had been transported into the pages of a history book. When we got to Jerusalem, my tour guide asked me how it felt, and I didn't have the words to articulate my feelings. It was as if I was a rabbit who fell through a portal into this world. I had to keep pinching myself. After being in Jerusalem – at the Kotel for Shabbat – I instantly felt a strong connection



Jessica Silver climbs Mount Gilboa during the recent Birthright Israel No Limits trip.

Jessica Silver, (centre, in white jacket and pants), visits the Kotel with other Birthright Israel participants.

Toronto by UJA Federation, believes that no one should be left behind, and recently Jessica's dream became a reality thanks to the unique and life-changing No Limits Birthright Israel initiative. Jessica joined a group of other disabled Jewish men and women between the ages of 18 and 26 on their first trip to Israel, through the trip organizer Routes Amazing Israel.

Since the inception of Birthright Israel in 2000, close to 14,000 young Torontonians between the ages of 18 and 26 have participated in this unforgettable, free of charge, ten-day educational trip to Israel.

Funded by the Community Fund of The Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto – UJA Federation's endowment development program - the wheelchair friendly No Limits Trip, featuring handicap accessible to Israel. It quickly became my home away from home."

"We were thrilled that we had the opportunity to design and provide a trip to accommodate this group with mobility challenges," says Elizabeth Sokolsky, vice president, education and operations, Taglit Birthright Israel. "Thanks to the generosity of the Jewish Foundation, these young Jewish adults were able to experience Israel on this amazing and intense ten day exploration of Jewish culture, history and its people. It was important to the organizers of this trip to ensure that the participants have a fully inclusive experience, and regardless of physical ability, that they would be able to experience their 'Birthright' in a meaningful way. By making Israel accessible to these young adults, they now join the over 250,000 worldwide alumni of Taglit Birthright Israel in a new and strengthened bond between Israel and Diaspora Jews and in their own journey to an ever-evolving Jewish identity."

Adding to the uniqueness of the No Limits trip was one of its leaders, Lerona Gelb, a 27 year old Jewish woman from north London, who has been confined to a wheelchair since a car accident at the age of five.

"I have always wanted to take a Birthright group," said Gelb. "I've seen the impact these trips have on the participants and when I was asked to take part, I jumped at the chance. As a wheelchair user myself, I know what it is like to be with a group and have to accept that I won't be able to take part in every aspect of the tour. However, on this trip, every participant took part in every activity. From abseiling down Mount Gilboa to sailing on the Mediterranean, from climbing to the top of Masada and swimming in the Dead Sea, everyone was a part of the group, and everyone bonded over the same experiences with no one staying behind on the bus. There is a special bond between all participants of a Birthright trip; however the bond with this group went even deeper. The participants were so touched that so many people had gone to the effort to arrange their first trip to Israel, free of charge, so they could experience what Jews all over the world are automatically entitled to."

And for Jessica, the name "No Limits" was far more than a mere marketing slogan - it was a promise that was made good on.

"Think about it, I actually got to go to Israel, and I even got to go rock-climbing, something else that I always wanted to do, but didn't know if I'd ever be able to," she explains. "There we were, a group of physically disabled people, climbing up Mount Gilboa with no constraints, feeling totally free while looking out at the magnificent Israeli landscape. It was an incredible experience; one that, like the trip itself, I will never forget."

An English major and aspiring writer, Silver was so inspired by her trip to Israel, she wrote a poem based on the experience. The poem is called Sacred City of Chalk and includes a reference to her unforgettable rock-climbing experience. "Climbing Gilboa's red rock, my body and mind in a state of numb-like shock, as the rhythm of my heart chimed in, I began to realize where my foot had been."

Summertime – cool ideas for hot weather

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

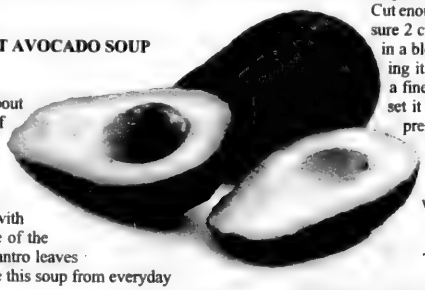
We all know that summertime means barbecues, picnics, pot-luck dinners and get-togethers with family and friends. But when the weather is hot and humid and our energy levels run low, the thought of cooking isn't very appealing.

Here are some simple summer dishes that come together quickly with little or no cooking and will help rehydrate you on those hot summer days. The recipes come from one of my favourite cookbooks, How to Cook Everything Vegetarian (Wiley), by one of my favourite cookbook authors, Mark Bittman. An award-winning cookbook author and among the most widely respected and beloved food writers and home cooks in North America, Bittman's weekly New York Times column The Minimalist and his frequent appearances on the Today Show showcase his love of simple and delicious food.

In How to Cook Everything Vegetarian, Bittman delivers the ultimate guide to meatless meals. This book is not only for vegetarians but for those striving for a more health-conscious, planet-friendly diet. Definitely worth adding to your cookbook shelf! Enjoy…

MARK BITTMAN'S ULTRA-FAST AVOCADO SOUP

Time: 10 minutes, plus time to chill



This lovely, celadon-coloured soup is about as simple as it gets; the subtle, rich flavours of avocado and milk benefit from a hit of acidity, so Bittman adds orange or lime juice at the end, but that's about it. You can, however, dress it up for company in a hurry – a couple of brightly coloured cherry tomatoes tossed with oil, salt and pepper and nestled in the middle of the soup are handsome additions. Even a few cilantro leaves arranged in the middle of the bowl would take this soup from everyday to elegant. Makes 4 servings.

3 or 4 ripe avocados, peeled, pitted and chopped (about 2 cups)
3 cups milk, preferably whole milk salt and cayenne pepper to taste
2 tbsp. freshly squeezed orange or lime juice, or to taste (optional)

Put the chopped avocado in a blender. Add half the milk, a large pinch of salt and a small pinch of cayenne, and process to a puree. Beat in the remaining milk, then chill for up to 6 hours if you have time. (Press a piece of plastic to the surface of the soup so it doesn't discolour.)

Taste and adjust the seasoning if necessary, add the citrus juice if you're using it, and serve – in chilled bowls if you want to be precise.

Soup for dessert? Bittman believes that dessert soups are a fantastic way to showcase deliciously ripe fruit while ending the meal on the light side. Getting what's in season and delicious is key; this is no place to compromise on quality or flavour. Here are a few pointers:

- Keep the flavours simple, let the fruit or other base ingredient speak for itself.
- Make the soup no more than a day in advance if not just a couple of hours before serving; it will taste fresher.
- In most recipes, you can substitute just about any ripe and flavourful fruit for any other.
- For pureed soup, the consistency should be like that of heavy cream, neither watery nor overly thick.
- If you like, add a scoop of ice cream, sour cream, yogurt, sorbet or granita; it adds another layer of flavour, texture and temperature.

WATERMELON AND MINT SOUP

Time: 20 minutes

This light, refreshing soup is an ideal summertime dessert – add more rum and turn it into a cocktail you can either pour from a glass or eat with a spoon. Cantaloupe, honeydew and Crenshaw melons work here too. But since they aren't as watery as watermelon you'll have to press the puree more in Step 2 and may have to add a little water to the blender. For a classic berry soup – the kind you'd get at a fancy brunch – try the first variation. Makes 4 servings.

1/2 cup sugar syrup (recipe below)
4 stems fresh mint
2 pounds ripe watermelon, rind and seeds removed
3 tbsp. freshly squeezed lemon or lime juice
1/4 cup rum (optional)
1 tsp grated lemon or lime zest
chopped fresh mint leaves for garnish

Put the syrup and mint stems in a small pot and bring to a boil. Turn off the heat and steep for about 10 minutes, then discard the stems and let the mint syrup cool to room temperature.

Cut enough of the watermelon into 1/2-inch cubes to measure 2 cups and set aside. Put the remaining watermelon in a blender; add the lemon juice, the rum if you're using it, and the mint syrup. Puree until liquefied. Line a fine-meshed strainer with a clean kitchen towel and set it over a large bowl; strain the watermelon puree, pressing on the pulp to squeeze as much juice out as you can.

Divide the watermelon soup among 4 bowls, add the watermelon cubes and zest and garnish with the chopped mint leaves.

SUGAR SYRUP

Time: 10 minutes

Also called simple syrup, this is perfect for adding sweetness to something without worrying about the sugar dissolving. It comes in handy when making sorbets, other frozen desserts and ice drinks, including tea, coffee and cocktails. Make this syrup in any quantity you need; the ratio – equal parts water and sugar – is always the same. Makes 2 cups.

2 cups sugar
2 cups water

Combine the sugar with the water in a small pot; bring to a boil and cook until the sugar is dissolved, stirring occasionally. Set aside and cool to room temperature. Use immediately or store in a clean container or jar, covered, in the fridge, for up to 6 months.

MANGO OR APRICOT SORBET

Time: 20 minutes, plus time to churn and chill

This sorbet is so creamy and approaching rich that you may not believe it doesn't contain egg; add some milk or cream (see variation below) and you'll swear it's a proper ice cream.

When you're adding the sugar, remember that the sweetness will be less apparent when the sorbet is frozen, so add a little more when the liquid mixture tastes just right. Makes about 3 cups.

4 cups peeled, pitted ripe mango or apricot
1 cup superfine sugar or Sugar Syrup (above) or to taste
1 tbsp. freshly squeezed lemon juice or to taste

Puree the fruit in a blender with most of the sugar and lemon juice. Taste and add more of either if necessary. If using mango, strain the puree, stirring and pressing the mixture through a strainer with a rubber spatula to leave any fibres behind; be sure to get all the puree from the underside of the strainer.

Refrigerate until cool, then churn in an ice cream maker according to the manufacturer's directions.

Variation: Mango or Apricot Ice Milk: Thick and creamy; substitute 1 cup milk (or cream if you want it really rich) for a cup of the fruit. Omit the lemon juice.

Cantor remembered for musical talent and giving nature

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Cantor Louis Harry Danto, world-renowned cantos emeritus of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, died last Friday morning at Toronto's Baycrest Hospital of Parkinson's Disease. He was 81.

A lyric tenor who performed extensively in North America, Europe and Israel, Cantor Danto's career highlights included his singing of the Prayer for the Royal Family before an audience of 16,000, including Queen Elizabeth and Prince Philip, at an interfaith Thanksgiving service at Maple Leaf Gardens in 1984.

Cantor Louis Danto

At the time of his retirement after 25 years as Beth Emeth's cantor, he had recorded 20 CDs, including a Jewish operetta he discovered on a 1989 east European concert tour, and even German arias.

But it was as a loving father, who would wear his tuxedo to take his kids skating before one of his concerts, that his daughter Denise Lash remembered him in a eulogy at his funeral Sunday, held at the synagogue.

She also recalled how, when she was seven years old, her mother died and her father became a single parent to her and her older sister, Annette, "almost overnight" following their move from Long Island, N.Y., to Cleveland.

"No matter the challenges that faced my father in those early years, Annette and I always felt very secure and loved by my dad."

The girls' brother, David, was born after the cantor's 1969 marriage to his wife Rouhama, a native of Jerusalem.

Cantor Danto was born Hersh Leib Marczuk in 1929 in Suwalki, a Polish town of 30,000. He adopted his mother's surname as a young adult.

His musical aptitude, evidenced as a synagogue child soloist, saved his life. In 1939, the 10-year-old future cantor won a scholarship to attend music school in Minsk, where he studied voice and cello. When Germany invaded Russia, the students were relocated to the Ural Mountains.

In 1943, Grisha, as he was then known, ran away to Turkistan, in central Asia, looking for his parents, but they had died in the Holocaust, along with his three brothers and two sisters.

He resumed his musical education after spending time with cousins, and financed his studies by chopping wood and loading it onto a raft.

After the war, with the help of Jewish organizations, he studied at the conservatory in Lodz, then at Rome's Santa Sicilia music school, where he studied the demanding 17th-century bel canto ("beautiful singing") technique for which he would become known.

He studied at the Mirrer Yeshiva in Brooklyn, N.Y., from 1950 to 1954, after immigrating at age 20 to join an uncle.

Because of his early experiences, he would never turn away anyone who approached him for assistance, and he often helped new immigrants find work and make connections in the community, his daughter said.

He sang for hospital patients and was a founder of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem in Toronto.

"Despite all this, he still found time for us," Denise said.

The cantor was "much more than a chazzan," Rabbi Howard Morrison, Beth Emeth's spiritual leader, said in a eulogy, recalling his colleague's "charming and pleasant demeanour."

For the rabbi, who has been at the synagogue 10 years, Cantor Danto "quickly became a dear friend and father figure," he said.

On a broader scale, Cantor Danto "entered the hearts of ourselves and our families," said Rabbi Morrison. "He didn't merely sing on the bimah. He brought his soul, and embraced us in a way that only he could, at our moments of sadness and joy."

Danto and Beth Emeth's founding rabbi, Joseph Kelman, who died in June 2009, were "both the face and the vision" of the synagogue, Morrison said.

Cantor Danto leaves Rouhama, his wife of 41 years; daughters Annette Danto and Denise Lash; son David; and grandchildren Maya and Gabe Lash. His first wife Ada, whom he married in 1954, predeceased him.

Decision misguided, Congress says

In a statement, Clement dismissed objections to the move, saying Canadians shouldn't have to answer "intrusive" questions under penalty of prosecution.

"There are some people... who believe that Canadians should be forced to divulge intimate, private details about their personal lives to the government. We disagree," Clement said.

He added that making the long-form census voluntary "strikes a fair and reasonable balance between ensuring the federal government has the basic information every government requires, and protecting the privacy of Canadian citizens."

But Jewish groups said making such a decision based on privacy rights is misguided. In its letter to Harper, Congress said the conclusion that Canadians consider the long form "an intrusive invasion of privacy" isn't credible.

"Anecdotally, it would be just as defensible to assert that while some Canadians may have grumbled just a bit while filling out the long form, many readily embraced it as a civic duty," it read.

Congress CEO Bernie Farber, a signatory to the letter, told The CJN last week he held out hope that "over the next short while," a national groundswell of opposition would convince Clement and Harper to reconsider.

Asked what would happen to Jewish community planning if the decision stands, Farber said it's too early to tell and that CJC, in conjunction with various Jewish federations, would consider next steps "once the situation was entirely clear and the government has its opportunity to reassess" its decision.

Howard English, vice-president of strategic communications with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, said the decision, if final, would make his organization's work "more challenging."

Both Clement and Munir Sheikh – who resigned last week as the head of Statistics Canada – were asked to appear before the House of Commons industry committee to testify about the matter this week. As of Monday, neither had confirmed their attendance.

Montreal resident probed for Ponzi scheme

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL – The victims of an apparent multimillion-dollar Ponzi scheme suspected of being perpetrated by a Montrealer all appear to be from the New York City area and don't appear to include members of the local Orthodox Jewish community, as initial news reports seemed to suggest.

Fifty-one-year-old Hampstead resident Perry Newman was reportedly being investigated by local fraud police and the FBI for allegedly defrauding victims of at least $10 million.

The victims were said to include Edith Olanoff of New York City and Jerusalem. According to court documents cited in media reports, she is owed $7.5 million by Newman, who also reportedly went by the names of William Newman and Peter Newman.

But initial reports that potential victims could include members of the local Orthodox community appeared unsubstantiated.

Olanoff, who has two sons in Israel who are rabbis and moved there to be near them, reportedly discovered the fraud when she sought – but never got – a second $200,000 from Newman to help pay for the construction of an apartment in Jerusalem.

When she then contacted the FCStone brokerage house in Chicago, through which her transactions with Newman were supposedly being processed, Olanoff learned that that the statements she had been receiving with the FCStone imprimatur were forgeries and that the letterhead they were printed on was old stock and no longer in use.

Olanoff had reportedly given Newman money to invest since 2005 through his company, Dover Financial Corp., whose holding company's name was Ramat. On July 12, both Newman and Dover, which was located on Chabanel Street, were declared bankrupt in Quebec Superior Court and the local law firm of Stein & Stein was retained to represent Olanoff.

Lawyer Neil Stein of the firm has also represented victims in the Earl Jones fraud case.

According to court documents cited in news reports, Olanoff first heard of Newman through her accountant, now also believed to be a fraud victim. As in the Earl Jones case, neither Newman nor his company were registered with the Autorité des marches financiers, which would have made financial compensation feasible.

Late last month, about a week after the petition for bankruptcy, Newman was reportedly treated in hospital for self-inflicted knife wounds.

Firebomber denied parole again

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL – The National Parole Board recently rejected convicted firebomber Omar Bulphred's second bid for parole, meaning he'll spend at least another year inside Laval's Leclerc Institute for the 2006 firebombing of the Skver Toldos yeshiva in Outremont and the 2007 fire at the YM-YWHA Ben Weider JCC in Snowdon.

In February 2009, Bulphred, now 25, was sentenced to the equivalent of a seven-year prison term and effectively had 40 months left to serve.

However, the Correctional Service of Canada reportedly informed the National Parole Board that it's now seeking to have Bulphred serve his entire sentence.

At a two-hour hearing July 12, the board stated its concern about Bulphred's "capacity to commit violence at such a young age." He had been investigated before for making terrorist threats and had considered himself a "soldier" at the time of the crimes, he reportedly told the hearing.

Bulphred's first parole bid was denied a year ago after guards found writings of his containing fantasies of murder and exalting the Dawson College shootings of 2006.

Performing taharah, the ultimate kindness

By RABBI MAYER WAXMAN
JTA

To describe the dead body that lay before me at my first taharah, the simple word "real" seems most appropriate. A taharah is the traditional Jewish cleansing performed on a body before burial.

At my recent first taharah, none of the cliches occurred. I did not feel scared or sickened by the body, but conversely, I can't say I sensed the neshamah, the soul, circumambulating the room, as reported by some people who perform the deed.

I wasn't supposed to perform the taharah but observe. A taharah ideally is performed by four people. In the funeral home basement, I stood beside the rosh, or head – the leader of the taharah – as he telephoned the chevra team's fourth and absent member, who responded that he was unable to make the scheduled taharah.

Instead of contacting another trained chevra member, the rosh deemed to allow me to serve as the fourth based on my existing knowledge of the relevant customs and halachot, Jewish laws.

He knew I was no stranger to death. I had studied the laws of mourning in my rabbinical training. As long as I can remember, my mother has been active in her local chevra kadishas, or Jewish burial societies. I narrated a widely used instructive video on taharah practice scripted by Rabbi Elchonon Zohn, the renowned director of the Vaad Harabanim of Queens and founding director of the National Association of Chevra Kadisha. I wrote the foreword to Living Kaddish: Incredible and Inspiring Stories regarding experiences of people in their year of mourning after losing a family member. I studied the signatures of serial killers for my master's degree in forensic psychology.

And I had the unusual experience of actually performing CPR on the body of a man who passed away before my eyes. I was doing my brief hospital rotation while studying for my emergency medical technician's licence when a doctor carried out the life-saving manoeuvre on an old man whose heart had stopped in the hospital. After the doctor was sufficiently sure that the man could not be revived, he allowed us two EMT students to attempt the procedure before pronouncing the man dead.

But this was different. The body before me was waiting for the chevra kadisha to enact the ultimate kindness, to prepare the body for burial in the age-old Jewish way.

I arrived at this moment through my position in the National Association of Chevra Kadisha, which carries the mission "to provide the entire Jewish community with a resource to help promote and strengthen traditional Jewish burial practices." Among my early tasks was registering chevras across North America, and promoting the reception of NASCK newsletters and information among funeral homes.

One Jewish funeral director asked me on receipt of my call, "Have you ever done a taharah?"

I was prepared for the valid question: "I will be doing my first one on Sunday."

He responded warmly, but in a way that put his work and the work of chevra kadisha in perspective: "Let's hope you won't have to."

He was right. For me to have to do a taharah would mean someone would die.

In fact, many chevra kadishas around the world dedicate the seventh day of the Jewish month of Adar to prayers and fasting followed by a feast, as that is the day God Himself buried Moses – providing the ideal situation: a time when the chevra kadisha is no longer required.

Procedure is performed in sensitive, purposeful way

In today's world of medical awareness, taharahs are performed with sanitary precautions. Rubber gloves and aprons are donned. I was called on to assist in moving the body occasionally, and I noted through my gloves how cold it was to the touch. It only occurred to me afterward that the body temperature was a result of the refrigeration the funeral home used to stay the body's deterioration.

This body – this man – was about my height, about my weight, not much older than I. I observed the rosh meticulously clean the body from head to toe. Any open wounds were treated with Monsel's Solution, a coagulant. The rosh carefully washed away any dirt. He also wiped up blood and gathered unattached hair.

In Jewish tradition, bodies are buried as complete as possible, and any blood or fluids that leak or are wiped from the body are buried along with the body. The act was sensitive – not delicate, rather caringly purposeful, like a mother removing ink from her child's arm or syrup from her child's cheek.

I poured water on the body as the cleaning was completed. I was instructed to pour backwards, turning my hand holding the bucket in the opposite direction than I intuitively would.

The body is then carefully placed on a slatted wooden base that is attached by natural fibre ropes to a pulley, which hoists the wood and moves it over a dedicated mikvah in the funeral home. The body is lowered inside for ritual immersion. In the interest of maintaining dignity, it is only at the moment of immersion that the body is completely exposed.

The body is then re-hoisted, covered and returned to the dressing table. On the table, the body is completely dried and then dressed in tachrichim, traditional Jewish burial shrouds. The shrouds have no pockets, and their only fasteners are drawstrings on the trousers, tied in a specific way at the waist, and two sets on the tunic, tied at the neck and around the waist.

The prepared body is put into the plain wood coffin. A light sprinkling of dust from Israel is placed at various points of the body, and clay shards are put on the eyes and mouth.

The body receives compassionate care. The Jewish name of the person is written on a board on the wall in the room. The room is silent, aside from occasional directions, the recitation of some prayers and supplications, and a request for forgiveness from the person on whom the taharah is performed, lest any wrong was done the body during the process. The body is tenderly treated and dressed.

The body is a body; a human shell. Real.

The taharah is a beautiful and symbolic procedure, a respectful and tributary send-off. I can't help but grieve for the growing number of Jews who opt to have their sullied remains carelessly tossed into crematoria for disposal.

After leaving the funeral home, I proceeded to synagogue for morning prayers. I'm not sure I prayed with greater intent, but the deceased was surely on my mind.

When prayers were over, I was hungry. I went to pick up bagels and eggs, foods that are traditionally associated with mourning – their roundness symbolizes the circle of life. But I think my motivation was baser. Appeasing hunger satisfies the living body. And there is nothing more life-affirming than death.

Rabbi Mayer Waxman is the national director of the National Association of Chevra Kadisha based in New York.

Students look beyond Jewish community at blood drive

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Brenna Singer had always been too nervous to give blood. Until last Wednesday.

"I wanted to give to help people," said Singer at the Hillel and Canadian Friends of Rambam (CFRAM) Health Care Campus blood drive last week. "I was nervous, I don't know, of the unknown. [But] I thought it was a good program and I thought, 'This is my chance to do it.'"

Singer, a Queen's University student going into her fourth year, was one of about 19 people to donate blood at the Canadian Blood Services Clinic, a number that impressed Sara Cuneo, a Hillel of Greater Toronto summer intern placed at CFRAM and the co-organizer of the drive.

"We brought in nearly 20 people, the [daily] average [at the clinic] is 44. That's almost half of what they would have brought in," said Cuneo, a York University master's student.

"I really hope that, in this program, we were able to facilitate people's ability to give blood in a way that was sort of more comfortable. We were able to go as a group rather than going by yourself and donating."

For Lyla Abells, a Western University student going into her third year and a fellow Hillel intern and event organizer, the drive is a way to give to Toronto's broader community.

"I think it's important for Hillel to not only be responsive to Jewish causes," she said. "We are a part of the greater community and we can't forget that."

Being a part of the greater community, for Abells, means responding to an important need.

According to the Canadian Blood Services, 52 per cent of Canadians say they or a family member have needed blood or blood products for surgery or medical treatment.

Nineteen people came to donate blood at the Hillel/Canadian Friends of Rambam Health Care Campus blood drive last Wednesday. From left are Josh Zelikovitz, Lyla Abells, an organizer, and Brenna Singer.

"There's such a need for blood. We don't realize how many people need it," she said. "So many people are scared to [donate]. This gives them a boost. We're giving people that last little push to do it."

And it's an important push, especially since each blood donation can save up to three lives.

Ryan Kroll, who is going into Queen's University for medical school, has given blood before, mainly because he has a B negative blood type, which is rare.

"It's always good to give while you can," said Kroll, adding that, while he came out, he wasn't able to donate blood this time because of a recent trip to Panama, which could put him at risk for developing malaria.

The event, which included a barbecue, also helped raise awareness for Rambam Hospital in Haifa.

"[It's] a 1,000-bed teaching hospital… that serves about two million people. That's a third of Israel's population," Cuneo, who helped pass out pamphlets and answer questions, said.

Cuneo added that the hospital sets a good example for Canadians.

"In the wake of the flotilla [incident], the hospital took in both activists and soldiers. They provide medical care regardless of who you are. That's something I think is very pertinent," she said, adding that the hospital was the first in Israel to have an Israeli Muslim woman to head a department.

"It's an example of Jews and Arabs working together. That's an example we can take with us back to our campuses," she said.

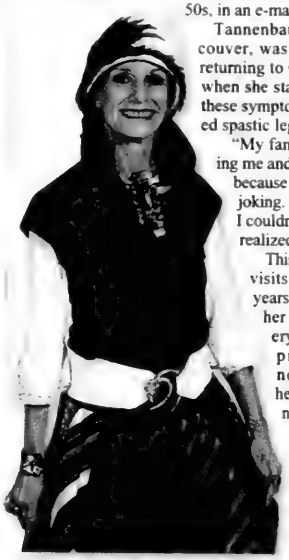
Designer lives with rare disease

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

It started with some messy handwriting and weight gain, something Cheri Tannenbaum, then in her early 20s and studying at Stern College in New York, blamed on late nights and snacking. Then her voice began to change.

"I remember being in the kitchen with my mother [in Vancouver] making a salad, and she asked me a question and I couldn't answer her. My mouth wouldn't move, so I couldn't form intelligible speech," said Tannenbaum, now in her late 50s, in an e-mail interview.



Cheri Tannenbaum

Tannenbaum, born in Vancouver, was in the process of returning to Orthodox Judaism when she started experiencing these symptoms, which included spastic leg movements.

"My family started imitating me and making fun of me because they thought I was joking. After awhile, when I couldn't speak, everyone realized it wasn't a joke."

This is when the doctor visits started. For three years, Tannenbaum and her family visited everyone from general practitioners to neurologists, but her tests came back normal.

"They decided it was psychological, so I went to lots of psychologists and psychiatrists," Tannenbaum said.

Eventually, she was diagnosed with hysteria due to "turning religious, getting in touch with my roots, the Holocaust, etc.," she said.

"I had to go to a psychiatrist a few times a week. All I did in the sessions was cry, 'I'm not psychologically ill, I just can't talk or walk anymore and I don't know why.'"

Tannenbaum, who was told that a change in her life might snap her out of the hysteria, eventually got married and moved to Los Angeles, where her husband lived.

"My honeymoon was spent at Scripps clinic in La Jolla, Calif., for more testing," she said.

Eventually, she went to a neurologist who diagnosed her with a rare neurological condition called dystonia musculorum deformans.

Dystonia is a movement disorder that causes muscles to spasm involuntarily. Focal dystonia affects specific parts of the body, while general dystonia affects all major muscle groups.

After she was diagnosed, Tannenbaum's family started the Dystonia Research Foundation, which works with doctors and researchers worldwide.

"Ironically, it has helped many people, but not the one it was started for. Me," she said, adding that doctors still can't tell exactly what kind of dystonia she has.

"It was a tremendous relief for me to finally have a name for what I had," she said. "But there is no cure for it, so this was a tremendous disappointment for me."

Still, Tannenbaum continued with her education, receiving a degree in psychology from the University of California Los Angeles.

Tannenbaum then began studying to qualify as a special education teacher, but she was unable to finish.

"I finished all the course work and then I was told that I needed to teach in a regular classroom first. I knew that with my speech limitation, there was no way I could control a classroom of 30 rowdy children," she said.

Hunting for a career, Tannenbaum started looking through school catalogues and came across a jewelry-making course.

"Not ever having a creative bone in my body, I suddenly developed into an artist," she said.

Now living in Israel with three kids and a grandchild, Tannenbaum makes and sells "fun, funky, whimsical, big, bold bohemian-style necklaces" and skirts made of ties.

While speaking and mobility are difficult, Tannenbaum uses a BlackBerry, e-mail and sign language when communicating. It's difficult for her to walk, but she can drive.

Still, dystonia isn't something Tannenbaum can ignore.

"It isn't like you have a broken finger, where the only time it bothers you is when you need to use it," she said. "Dystonia is all-encompassing… Sometimes I just wish I could shirk it off for just one second, but at this time, it's not meant to be."

Singer fills the musical gap for kids

By Rita Poliakov
Staff Reporter

When Marlowe Stone went through a breakup, she wouldn't write poetry. She'd write music.

"A lot of people find an escape in music," the singer/song writer said. "I definitely see it as a therapy. It's just very healing... When I was a teen, if I had a bad day or a breakup, I'd always have a moment when I'd say to myself, 'That's ok, 'cuz I'm going to write a good song.' And I always did."

Stone, who released her debut CD in 2001, has been a singer since she was very young. As a child, she would create concerts for her parents, belting out songs she had written about love and searching for a man.

"It just felt like that was my thing. It was always the thing I knew made me extra special, even in public school," she said.

After high school, the singer went to Ryerson University's radio and television arts program.

"I knew all I wanted to do was music, but I needed to have a real career," she said.

Still, she made sure to stay involved with the musial community. After going into advertising, Stone switched to music reporting and worked behind the scenes for eNow and CTV, all the while continuing to write music.

In 1999, Stone moved to Chicago with her fiancé and started to focus on her song-writing, which culminated in her self-produced CD, Blue Satin Dress.

"I ended up with a CD that was very influenced by Chicago. It had a lot of bluesy, jazzy undertones and I loved it," she said.

But radio stations didn't. At first.

Marlowe Stone

"The only thing was that when I came back to Canada to release it, a lot of the record labels told me they loved the songs and writing but didn't feel like horns and strings had a place on pop radio," she said.

This changed after Norah Jones's songs hit the radio a year later. During that time, Stone won a song-writing contest on Mix 99.9, and later had a music video air on Much More Music.

Then, in the same year, she got pregnant with her first child.

As Stone transitioned into motherhood, she started realizing that there's a gap in children's music.

"The first thing that I realized is how much kids in general love learning about music," she said.

"There's a lot of kids' music that was kiddy, and understandably so, for ages one to four... [Musicians] would do it with balloons, makeup, speaking really slowly, and I started to realize that kids are just growing up faster."

Stone noticed that three- and four-year- olds didn't necessarily enjoy that kind of music, but their parents didn't feel comfortable letting them listen to contemporary pop songs.

"[My sons, aged five and eight,] started to say, 'We don't want to watch the Wiggles anymore. We don't like Disney songs,'" she said. "One father described it to me as being music-less."

This is what drove Stone to focus on a different demographic – kids who are too young for Miley Cyrus but too old for the Wiggles.

"I have a nice network of amazing pop record producers in the city of Toronto. When I approached one or two of them, it was really great. I didn't have to say we're working on a kids' project," she said.

While aiming at younger kids, Stone, who has been working on this concept for around a year, didn't want change anything about the sound of her music, which she describes as a mix of genres, like dance pop and pop rock.

"It was like, I don't want [producers] to do anything different than what [they] would do if [they] were producing this new pop star. That's the approach I've taken," she said.

The only difference is that Stone's songs aren't about sex and drugs, but about local heroes and positive messages.

While Stone's new band, called Marlowe and the Mix, has yet to release a CD, she has a song on iTunes and hopes to launch Marlowe and the Mix through live concerts in the fall.

"I'm not pretending to be something. I'm just being Marlowe Stone, the song writer. Even some of the songs that will be on Marlowe and the Mix CDs were songs I wrote four or five years ago," she said.

"They're just kid-friendly enough. They're 'poppy' enough. They're not depressing or sexual. I don't write music like that anyways."

For Stone, who wrote the song Step by Step for the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Walk with Israel this year, music is an essential part of a child's life.

"I think there's something so pure about music, and I've seen with my own eyes, even at a birthday party, the minute you turn the music on, it changes the whole energy of the room. Everybody's giggling and smiling," she said.

"It really does something amazing for children. A lot of people find an escape in music, or they find comfort in listening to music. As young as you can expose kids to it, the better [it is]."

American Jewish Congress may close its doors

JTA

WASHINGTON — After a death watch lasting nearly two years, news that the end of the American Jewish Congress (AJC) was imminent set off a flurry of e-mails in the Jewish organizational world.

"We have suspended most of our operations," the organization's co-executive director, Marc Stern, told JTA by phone on July 16, confirming that the organization had laid off nearly all its remaining employees. It was devastated by the Bernard Madoff's billion-dollar Ponzi scheme that affected several American Jewish groups in December 2008.

"Some things are continuing to go on because they are in process, and there are future activities a couple of months down the road," Stern said, citing cash flow problems. "There are some other things floating around that can be done with minimal costs. I hope things will become very clear and we can discuss it in public."

The AJC's demise is a story not just about cash-flow problems but about the changing of priorities of the American Jewish community, organizational insiders said.

While the fulcrum was certainly the organization's losses in the Madoff scandal – $21 million of its $24-million endowment disappeared in the scheme – the money woes laid bare the longstanding weaknesses that for years had made the AJC a junior sibling to larger Jewish advocacy organizations such as the American Jewish Committee and Anti-Defamation League.

"I think we had to find our voice in the community and in the arenas that were important. I don't know that we did that very effectively," AJC chair Jack Rosen, told JTA.

Others say privately that while the AJC was doing important work, focusing on issues of religious freedom in the United States, free speech and women's rights, those simply did not resonate with donors, who, time and again, have shown more interest in Israel and anti-Semitism.

Officially launched in 1922 by prominent Jews including Rabbi Stephen Wise and Supreme Court justice Louis Brandeis, the AJC was established to be a democratic body that spoke for American Jews on a wide range of issues. At the time the American Jewish Committee, which had a similar mission, was seen as an elite bastion of German Jewish immigrants that was unresponsive to the broader Jewish community.

By the 1940s, the AJC was pioneering the model of using legal action to better Jewish lives in America. In the 1960s, it took the lead role on behalf of the Jewish community in the legal fight for civil rights. In recent years, it focused on securing the church-state divide in the United States, along with international issues such as helping refine Israel's relationship with NATO and leading the legal fight against terrorists' use of human shields.

The organization's president, Richard Gordon, attributed the AJC's fundraising woes to a changing of priorities in the Jewish community that many organizations are feeling.

"The number of people who give to organizations like ours is dwindling," Gordon said. "There is not a group of younger people who see these organizations as vital to American Jews."

PLO's D.C. office will fly Palestinian flag

JTA

WASHINGTON — The Obama administration will allow the Palestine Liberation Organization office in Washington, D.C., to fly the Palestinian flag and assume the title of "delegation."

The change in status comes with no enhancement in diplomatic status, U.S. officials said.

The new privileges for the PLO office do not mean the representation has "any diplomatic privileges or immunities," State Department spokesperson P.J. Crowley said last Friday.

"At the request of the PLO representative, which we have granted given the improvement in the relations between the United States and Palestinians, they have requested permission to fly the Palestinian flag," he said. "And they have requested permission to call themselves the General Delegation of the PLO, which is a name that conforms to how they describe their missions in Europe, Canada and several Latin American countries."

Crowley said the steps have symbolic value and reflect improved relations between the United States and Palestinians, but they have no meaning under the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations.

A White House spokesperson suggested the changes would help spur the Palestinians toward direct peace talks with Israel, a key demand of the Israeli and U.S. governments.

"This decision reflects our confidence that through direct negotiations, we can help achieve a two-state solution with an independent and viable Palestine living side by side with Israel," Tommy Vietor said. "We should begin preparing for that outcome now, as we continue to work with the Palestinian people on behalf of a better future."

PLO representation in Washington was made illegal under a number of laws in the mid-1980s, when the group was widely regarded as terrorist.

Since 1993, at the launch of the Oslo peace process, U.S. presidents have exercised their prerogative to waive the ban every six months. Obama and his predecessor, George W. Bush, have cultivated the PLO and its leadership of the Palestinian Authority as a means of stemming the influence of Hamas, a radical Islamist terrorist group.

A number of lawmakers have sought to reinstate the ban, saying the Palestinian Authority has not moderated enough, citing among other factors the Palestinian refusal to enter direct negotiations.

Republican congresswoman Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, the ranking member on the U.S. House of Representatives Foreign Affairs Committee, tied her efforts to eject the PLO from Washington to congressional efforts to move the U.S. Embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem, another law that presidents have routinely waived since its passage in 1995.

"Instead of giving more undeserved gifts to the PLO, it's time for us to kick the PLO out of the U.S. once and for all and move our embassy in Israel to Jerusalem, where it belongs," she said in a statement.

Conversion bill frozen for six months

JTA

JERUSALEM — An agreement has been reached to put a six-month freeze on a controversial Israeli conversion bill up for a vote in the Knesset.

According to a deal brokered last Thursday between Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's cabinet secretary and several Israeli non-Orthodox religious movements, the bill, proposed by Knesset member David Rotem of the Yisrael Beiteinu Party, will be withdrawn for six months while a coalition of non-Orthodox Israeli groups led by Natan Sharansky, chairman of the Jewish Agency for Israel, submit proposals on how to redraft the bill, Ha'aretz reported.

The bill, which passed a committee vote last week but still needs three Knesset readings to become law, had drawn significant opposition from Diaspora Jewish groups, including the non-Orthodox American religious movements and the Jewish Federations of North America, as well as Netanyahu and the Jewish Agency. They objected to the bill's giving ultimate authority over conversions to the Orthodox-dominated Chief Rabbinate of Israel.

"Change in the law on conversions in Israel must be carried out through broad agreement to prevent a split within the Jewish nation," Netanyahu said. "Unity is in the foremost interest of the State of Israel and the Jewish nation, and I intend to defend that principle with determination."

The Jewish Federations of North America welcomed the delay.

"We truly support this process of a dialogue table, which allows the participants time to discuss this important issue appropriately and reach a solution that protects the bonds between Israel and the Diaspora," the JFNA's CEO, Jerry Silverman, said in a statement late Thursday. "We are also thrilled that Natan Sharansky will be leading the process."

Israel won't co-operate with flotilla investigation

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel does not intend to co-operate with the United Nations Human Rights Council's investigation into Israel's interception of a Gaza-bound flotilla at the end of May. The raid resulted in nine deaths.

According to a senior Israeli official, the sense at the Foreign Ministry, the Defence Ministry and the Prime Minister's Office is that co-operating with the investigative committee would only confer legitimacy upon the UNHRC, which has consistently acted against Israel.

"This is an unnecessary committee," the official said, "which is the product of an obsession with Israel."

The decision not to co-operate with the UN committee will be accompanied, however, by a decision to co-operate with a separate flotilla committee acting on behalf UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon.

The secretary general's team is expected to examine the conclusions of Israel's Turkel committee as well as the results of a Turkish investigation into the flotilla incident.

Last weekend, Israel prepared for a possible attempt by another flotilla, this time from Lebanon, to run the Gaza naval blockade. Syria and Hezbollah are thought to be organizing the flotilla in an effort to divert international attention from the imminent release of conclusions from an investigation into the assassination of former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri.

Defence Minister Ehud Barak sent a message to Lebanon over the weekend demanding the government there stop the flotilla. The Lebanese government, however, vehemently denied that any such flotilla is in the offing.

The country's transportation minister, Ghazi al-Aridi, told the daily Lebanese newspaper An-Nahar he was unaware of any such plans. He said that if he did ever receive such a request, it would be considered based on applicable laws and regulations. Al-Aridi added that Lebanon supports the Palestinians, but is committed above all to observing international law.

Young Jewish innovators brainstorm to fix the world

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

RAMAT GAN, Israel – Young Jewish business and social entrepreneurs, activists and innovators from 27 different countries met in Ramat Gan July 4 to 8 to brainstorm on how best to improve the Jewish world and the world at large.

Participants at the Fifth Annual ROI (Return On Investment) Global Summit for Young Jewish Innovators included 20- and 30-something Jewish communal leaders from countries in ROI's global network. About half of them are alumni of Israel-oriented programs such as Taglit-Birthright Israel, Hillel or Masa.

The summit, attended by about 120 participants, focused on Jewish education and identity, visions of Israel, Jewish arts and culture, environmental responsibility, and tikkun olam.

The event was highlighted by a ROI community-wide in-person/online five-hour brainstorming session in which participants created a list of more than 300 challenges facing the Jewish People and came up with some 140 potential solutions.

The result was 42 different project proposals. "The next step is in the hands of our members to turn these proposals into action plans," said Justin Korda, director of ROI and a former Montrealer.

According to Korda, the work couldn't be in better hands. Since ROI was established as a partnership between American Jewish philanthropist Lynn Schusterman's Center for Leadership Initiatives (CLI) and Taglit-Birthright Israel in 2006, the network has sponsored at least 200 different initiatives, launched across more than 100 communities around the world. Sixty-five of these projects have received grants totalling some $600,000 (US) from CLI.

Former grant winners include PresenTense (www.presentense.org), Moishe House (www.moishehouse.org), Challah for Hunger (www.challahforhunger.org), G-dcast (www.g-dcast.com), and Oleh! Records (www.olehrecords.org).

Projects chosen for funding usually include Jewish content or are focused on building Jewish community in one way or another. "Some projects are dedicated to serving the non-Jewish world," Korda said. "But even though they are not focused on Jewish content, they are still very much motivated by Jewish values."

Rabbi Yoni Gordis, the executive director of CLI, added a few more requirements to the mix: the projects must show good business sense, vision and passion, and possess the potential to have a wide impact, and applicants must hail from the ROI community.

"We give preference to projects that deploy the ROI network. We want these innovators to work with each other," he said. "Our network includes people who are very left and very right, both politically and religiously. The definitions are quite diverse. But we are tied together by common values. We are here to fix the world."

Those who haven't received funding from CLI still reap enormous membership benefits: courses in professional development, managerial skills, and communication; access to the ROI community and all of its resources, and opportunities for collaboration. "We give people a socket to plug into this idea of global Jewish networking," said Korda.

ROI member Yaniv Rivlin, 28, from Montreal, one of 15 Canadians in the ROI network, says a price cannot be put on this assistance. This month, he launched his ROI-inspired initiative, Comtribute (www.comtribute.com), an online fundraising tool for non-profit organizations.

"ROI is an amazing network. They gave me advice, brought me together with the most inspiring, motivated people, and connected me to non-profits and press," said Rivlin, who will start his master's degree in public policy and government at Harvard University in September.

"Everyone in the ROI community just wants to help. It was this community that gave me the inspiration to start this project.

"They are also doing everything in a very progressive way. They really understand the needs of the next Jewish generation."

This is what ROI founders had in mind – to create a fresh new space for young Jewish community leaders outside of the often restrictive, conservative, non-progressive, "old school" bounds of existing Jewish community organizations.

Said Korda, it all started in 2005, after Taglit-Birthright Israel hit the 100,000 alumni mark and there was little improvement in alumnus' post-trip involvement with Jewish community. "People were asking, 'Why aren't these young people lining up to get involved in federations and organizations?'

"But these organizations failed to engage young people before Taglit-Birthright Israel was established, why would they be able to now?"

What was needed, said Korda, was a paradigm shift. "ROI represents that shift. It's an exciting, energetic, creative global community that is succeeding to engage young Jewish leaders on their terms."

Rabbi Gordis said: "For us, ROI is the actualization of everything that we are about – providing an opportunity for the best and brightest, most impassioned young members of the global Jewish community. We are eager to give them any and all assistance they need to make this world better now, rather than later.

"We need to let them run and shape the world in the way they think it should be. I, for one, trust them with this task from the bottom of my heart."

Israeli docs treat burn victims

By CNAAN LIPHSHIZ
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

BUJUMBURA, Burundi — Two weeks after the death of more than 200 people in an oil-tanker explosion in Congo, Israeli doctors were the first specialists sent to treat the dozens of burn victims who survived the blast.

The Agency for International Development Cooperation of the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs, MASHAV, sent four doctors and a nurse from Sheba Medical Center to the area surrounding the village of Sange in eastern Congo, where a truck carrying hundreds of kilotons of petroleum had caught fire. The group arrived on July 13.

"We're carrying half a ton of equipment to treat 30 injured in two locales," said Dr. Eyal Winkler, deputy director of Sheba's department of plastic and reconstructive surgery. With Winkler are doctors Shmuel Kalazkin, Ariel Tessone and Gil Gragov Nardini, and nurse Noa Anastasia Ouchakova.

The new arrivals will be working with a U.S.-born Israeli woman, Gila Garaway, who lives in Congo and works with the foreign ministry. She says not all the patients are receiving anesthetics in rural hospitals, where electricity and running water are unreliable.

"When I came to visit them, I could see their eyes light up with hope because they mistook me for the doctor from Israel they'd been expecting," said Garaway, whose two sons live in Israel with her seven grandchildren. She also said that she had seen cases in which burn victims became "psychotic from pain."

Jean-Michel Bolima, a social activist who was born in the eastern Congo city of Kisangani, said: "Any help is welcome and important, but we want to see actions that benefit more people than 31. This is a limited operation. Israel is always first to offer aid, and this is admirable. But it is not constructing a hospital there. Yet this [construction of a hospital] would have made a serious impact on people's lives."

Haim Divon, head of MASHAV, said the agency has been helping Garaway in her efforts over the past year to open a burn treatment centre in Bukavu, near the village of Sange.

Congolese President Joseph Kabila telephoned the Israeli delegation to convey his personal thanks to them.

Conversion bill vote postponed

Israel's conversion bill reportedly will not reach the Knesset floor until October. Proponents of the controversial bill had hoped to bring the bill to the Knesset floor on July 21, the last day of the Knesset's summer session before the start of a three-month hiatus. Its sponsor, Yisrael Beiteinu party MK David Rotem, reportedly isn't willing to introduce the bill on the floor until he's sure he has a majority of MKs supporting it. The bill would consolidate control over conversions under the office of the Orthodox-dominated Israeli Chief Rabbinate. It was approved recently by the Knesset's constitution, law and justice committee. The Knesset will reconvene for its winter session Oct. 11, when Rotem likely will reintroduce the bill. American Jewish groups and religious organizations have rallied against it.

Gaza probe brings policy change

Israel's military has implemented operational changes designed to further minimize future civilian casualties, according to an update on Israel's investigation into the Gaza war. The update, the second to the original July 2009 government report, was released last week and delivered to United Nations Secretary General Ban Ki-moon. The report appears on the Israeli Foreign Ministry website. New procedures have been adopted by Israel's military to ensure further protection of civilians during urban warfare, the report says. They include continuing to emphasize that the protection of civilians is an integral part of an IDF commander's mission, as well integrating a humanitarian affairs officer in each combat unit. New procedures also have been adopted to regulate the destruction of private property in cases of military necessity. Israel's investigations has led to 47 probes relating to the Gaza war in the winter of 2008-09. Some have led to criminal indictments.

N. Korea must pay for Lod attack

Israeli media reported that a U.S. federal court has fined North Korea $300 million (U.S.) for financing a 1972 attack on Israel's airport. Twenty-six people were killed and more than 80 wounded in the attack on the Lod Airport, now called Ben-Gurion Airport, carried out by the Japanese Red Army and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine with the financial support of North Korea. A lawsuit was filed by the family of Carmelo Calderon-Molina, a U.S. citizen killed in the attack. Judge Francisco Besosa of the U.S. District Court in Puerto Rico on July 16 fined North Korea $300 million, which the judge said is typical punitive damages for such an attack. Two of the terrorists died in the attack. A third was sentenced by Israel to life in jail. He was released after 13 years as part of an exchange of 1,150 prisoners for three Israeli soldiers captured in the First Lebanon War.

Oil found in Israel

A commercially sized oil field has been identified in central Israel, an oil prospecting firm said. Tests on the Meged Five drill site near the central town of Rosh Ha'ayin have determined that the site can produce about 470 barrels of oil a day, the Givot Olam Oil prospecting and production firm announced. The well will be ready for production by Aug. 15, the Israeli business daily Globes reported.

Ritz Carlton plans kosher hotel

The Ritz Carlton hotel chain will build its first kosher hotel in Herzliya. The $160 million (US) project, which will include a hotel and six floors of luxury condominiums, will be outfitted with Shabbat elevators and an upscale kosher restaurant, the chain said July 21. The hotel will be located on the coastline overlooking the Herzliya Marina.

How images succeed and fail: graphic novels and history

BY NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

Spectacle in art is an old story. Though it seems that our age, with its ability to resort to technological extravagances, is unique, the desire for a view of the spectacular, whether in the Victorian panorama, the era of the great travelling circuses, or in elaborate European church architecture, was alive in past societies.

One trend in recent filmmaking toward the blockbuster of eye-popping explosions and seemingly miraculous feats of world transformation is part of this tradition. In Inception, which is in theatres this summer, cities turn inside out like M.C. Escher drawings, and the filmmaker imagines his own ruined cityscapes that look like they might be modelled on an idea of the end of times, empty of people.

Norman Ravvin

Images in Jewish art have an unusual history. Although until well into the 19th century Jews were kept out of mainstream European artistic schools, the past century and a half allowed for a reconnection between Jewish artistic creativity and major schools of visual art.

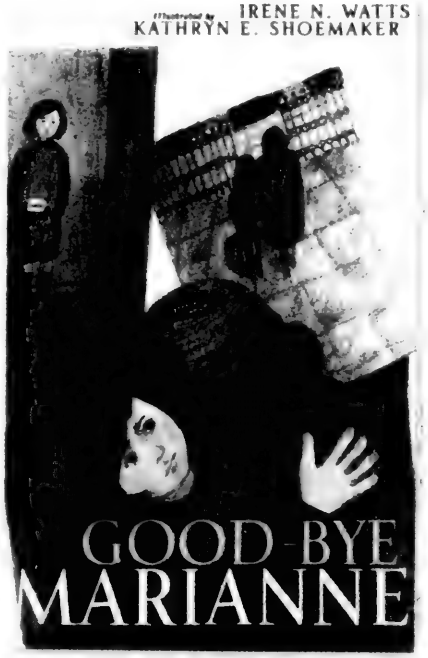
Technologies like photography and film have become crucial to modern ways of recording people's lives, and it feels that we have arrived at a time when images, spectacular or not, define who we see ourselves to be.

These shifts have brought a change to the way Jewish themes such as the Holocaust are presented. It would be wrong to think that the events of the war were initially and most capably defined by words. G.I.s with Brownie cameras and newsreels shot by the occupying Allied forces answered the postwar need for a detailed and immediate record of events in Europe. But these media were largely documentary – factual – and not part of an artistic tradition.

Creative work linking images and the events of the war did not play much of a role until the 1950s, and then, it was a rare film, such as Alain Resnais' Night and Fog, and rare paintings or drawings by Chagall and Picasso, which aimed to convey horror in ways different from those used by historians and novelists.

Today, if you were asked which visual artist treats the Holocaust in a way that is most satisfying, you would likely draw a blank. There is the conceptual art of Christian Boltanski; recently he undertook a darkly spectacular piece that consisted of a roomful of mountains of clothing, evocative of the possessions taken by the Germans from their victims at Auschwitz. But in popular terms, one might turn to the graphic artist Art Spiegelman as the best example of a figure who turned Holocaust-related narratives toward the image in ways that satisfied both critics and a large audience. Spiegelman's methods seem uncannily well-thought-out: the black and white pages of Maus, the meagre stylization of his characters, who express themselves through the slightest shift in an eyebrow, and the novelistic quality of his narrative voice all signal that he does not wish to draw on what might be called the spectacular in comic book visuals – the fancy points of view, the exciting colours and overheated language common to stories of superheroes.

But one unavoidable outcome of Spiegelman's success is the rash of other graphic novels associated with the Holocaust, many of them weaker and less fully developed than Maus. Recently, the Anne Frank House in Amsterdam published a graphic novel version of the famous diary, which is its raison d'être, and in discussions about it one hears the old questions resurface regarding the effectiveness of images in relation to words in telling a story. There is the issue of which medium most effectively conveys a dark story to children; and then the more contemporary consideration – too exaggerated to be true but still reflecting our times – that people don't want to read anymore, and prefer to receive their information in shorthand, the way they do on a cellphone or text-messaging screen.



A graphic novel worth a look by a Canadian-based artist and author is Good-bye Marianne, which, not unlike the new Anne Frank publication, is adapted from what was originally a story book for young adults under the same name by Irene N. Watts. Good-bye Marianne approaches the Holocaust through a prewar framework and wisely, considering that it is aimed at young readers, follows a girl's experiences in Nazi-run Berlin to reveal how totalitarian society destroyed children's lives.

Some of the decisions by illustrator Kathryn E. Shoemaker seem influenced by the muted artistic approach taken by Spiegelman in Maus. The only colour in Good-bye Marianne is on its cover. Its graphic story of Marianne Kohn is rendered in soft pencil sketches, so the reader must look carefully into the rooms and faces on the book's pages to get their full effect. The story's original contribution to its genre may be its time and place – prewar Berlin, on streets made unsafe for Jews by prohibitions and Nazi spectacles. Much of it takes place, too, in the interiors of Jewish apartments at a time when the freedom to live in such apartments would soon be taken away.

One reads Good-bye Marianne in something like a half hour. Because of its artwork, it is the kind of book a reader might return to and muse over. It is well-suited to a young reader's way of understanding events associated with the war, and resists presenting material in a lurid or sensational way. In this, the book follows Maus in its efforts to use images in a way that advances knowledge as much as it entertains. This is an interesting challenge for a visual artist: the creation of an eye-catching and stylistically interesting work that does not overwhelm the story at hand or fall into the clichés of art that flirt with spectacle.

Norman Ravvin is chair of the Concordia Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies. His novel The Joyful Child is due out this fall.

Canadian actor gives 'blood, sweat and tears'

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

It started with ballet and musical theatre. Then came the cannibalism.

Canadian actor Ellen Dubin is mostly still known for her role as Giggerota the Wicked, a cannibalistic alien in the sci-fi show Lexx, which ran from1997 to 2002.

But she started off her career on stage, playing Tzeitel, the eldest daughter in Fiddler on the Roof.

"I'm very proud of that show," Dubin, who has performed in theatrical productions across North America, said. "It's one of the only shows I've ever done where I've played a Jewish girl."

Dubin wasn't supposed to be an actor. She was supposed to be a ballerina. But around 18, that changed.

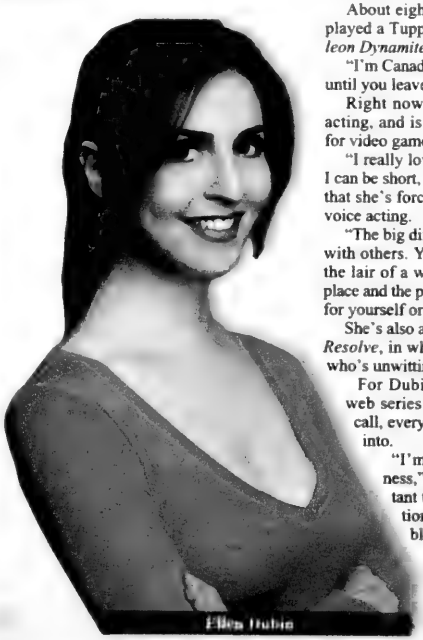
"I was doing a big audition in New York [for a ballet school]. I could feel my knee tear, it was devastating," she said. "I got up and hobbled off."

After abandoning her dream of dancing, Dubin attended the University of Toronto, where she took drama, mainly because "I heard it was an easy credit," she said.

It didn't take long for Dubin to fall for the theatre.

"Part of the program was you had to do shows. I always loved that. You get the immediate response of an audience," she said. "I was like, 'This is fantastic.'"

After university, Dubin began acting in Fiddler, toured Canada with the show and got her Actors Equity card. (Actors Equity is a union that represents actors and technicians.)



Ellen Dubin

But her mother wasn't fond of her career choice at first.

"Initially, I don't think my mom wanted me to be an actor. She was worried I'd be rejected."

And she was. Many, many times.

"I don't quite fit the mould. I'm 5-foot-10 and a half, I have a strong face, I haven't gotten my nose chopped off," she said. "I've been told, 'You should be shorter – or fatter.' Everyone has their own opinion.

"[Acting] is the only business where you can be brilliant [and are] told 'no' most of the time," she said.

But Dubin, who's been called ethnically ambiguous, wasn't fazed by the rejection.

"My humour comes in handy. You've just got to laugh," she said.

After Fiddler on the Roof, Dubin went on to do more musical theatre. And to perfect her craft.

"I studied a lot. I worked my ass off. I didn't settle. I was always striving to learn more," she said. "I didn't know improv? I'd go to Second City. I didn't know Shakespeare? I'd take [Shakespearean acting] lessons."

Eventually, Dubin, who has never been a sci-fi fanatic, got a role in Forever Knight, a show about a vampire cop in Toronto.

"I played a sexy dominatrix in a grey leather dress," she said, adding that CBS ended up censoring a scene of hers – not for sex or violence, but because "I stood there and stared at a man crawling on the floor. They could hack off people's heads, but I couldn't stand and watch a man squirm."

Dubin's role in the sci-fi world continued with Giggerota, a character that she still gets fan mail for.

About eight years ago, Dubin, who also played a Tupperware-loving mom in Napoleon Dynamite, moved to Los Angeles.

"I'm Canadian. They don't appreciate you until you leave their country," she said.

Right now, Dubin's involved in voice acting, and is currently voicing characters for video games.

"I really love it. I can be 14, I can be 90. I can be short, I can be tall," she said, adding that she's forced to get creative when she's voice acting.

"The big difference is you don't get to act with others. You have to pretend you're in the lair of a witch. You have to invent the place and the people, you have to make it real for yourself or it comes out phoney."

She's also appeared in the web series The Resolve, in which she plays a psychologist who's unwittingly dating a serial killer.

For Dubin, who found out about the web series through a Facebook casting call, every opportunity is worth looking into.

"I'm not a snob about the business," she said. "I think the important thing is the passion, the devotion… If you hire me, you'll get blood, sweat and tears."

Local jazz trio recognized for its excellence

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Being nominated by the Toronto Independent Music Awards (TIMAs) is one of two things jazz pianist Steve Koven is really excited to talk about.

The Steve Koven Trio's last CD, Sound of Songs, has been nominated in the best jazz CD category. And at the same time, the trio is about to release its eighth CD, Alone Together, a collection of jazz standards commissioned by a Japanese company.

"It's really exciting," Koven, 46, says. "Any recognition of your work is great."

The Steve Koven Trio, a Toronto-based jazz group has been performing around the world since 1993 and has shared the stage with Nancy Wilson, John Pizzarelli, T.S. Monk, Ben Castle and several others. But this is the first time Koven feels the band is getting major recognition.

"Sound of Songs was all original songs and represents my best works, so I was blown away when I got a call from L.A. telling me I was nominated for an album I'm very proud of. It's a strong piece of work," he says.

Now in its fifth year, the TIMAs acknowledge up-and-coming indpenendent artists. Previous winners have included singer Amanda Martinez and klezmer/world music band Beyond the Pale.

Koven is especially proud of the title track, a swinging groove that opens with a beautiful string quartet arrangement. The title comes from a book written by his father about his ancestors' emigration from Russia.

"It's specifically about my grandfather coming here as a 14-year-old boy to make a life for himself. When I was composing songs for this CD, I had all the tracks except one, and when I read his book, I went, 'Wow,' and literally wrote the song in a minute."

Sound of Songs contains nine original jazz songs that take the listener on an instrumental journey around the world.

Indeed, Koven has performed in dozens of places including Barbados, Mexico, Colombia, China, Jamaica and Japan – which brings us to the other thing he's excited about.

Alone Together was financed by a Japanese music distribution company. "They told me they'd like us to make an album of jazz standards," Koven says, although the talented composer is better known for his progressive improvisations. "They made us an offer we couldn't refuse. It's not my typical approach, but it's not really a bad thing. I'm extremely honoured to be approached by a company – one in another country – that wants to import and support a project of ours."

Of the 10 songs on Alone Together, seven are standards including works by Cole Porter, T.S. Monk, and Fats Waller's Ain't Misbehavin'. The other three are original compositions by the members of the band, which also includes Rob Clutton on double bass and Anthony Michelli on drums.

"This will be released shortly in Canada and Japan, and then we'll start recording our ninth CD, one of original music, later this year."

Of all their travels, Koven was especially taken by Colombia.

"Colombia was one of the highlights of my career," he says. "We were invited by the Canadian Embassy in Bogota."

Most of the band's performances abroad have been through Canadian embassies and high commissions as cultural ambassadors. "We would go to different places and present concerts and do educational workshops and clinics."

At the National University of Colombia in Bogota, the band was about half an hour late arriving. "There were thousands of people waiting for us, and it was like a riot. It's like they were waiting for the Rolling Stones," he says. "We didn't know what to expect. It was like being a rock star. I've never experienced anything of that magnitude."

Another thrilling place was China, where they got to play to 5,000 people at Beijing University, and later at the Shanghai Concert Hall. "It was absolutely amazing."

Unfortunately some of these government-sponsored gigs are drying up because of cutbacks. "There's no funding anymore, and I'm not going to go on tour and come back a few thousand dollars in the hole," he says. "It's a sad situation. Artists like myself rely on funding in order to get exposure – we need the support of our government to help us."

Steve Koven

The local scene hasn't been much better, especially since the closing of The Senator and other venues, he laments.

"The jazz scene has really deteriorated over the years. There's only a couple of jazz venues in the city left. I'm too old to be playing for $50 in a coffee house."

Koven reacts positively to this though, saying it forces him to go out and do his own promotion. He's rented a 350-seat theatre for the CD release party for his forthcoming ninth album in November. "This way I can put on an amazing show and make some money."

Koven also attends York University, both as a student where he's studying composition, and as an instructor where he teaches a course in musical improvisation.

Koven doesn't see himself as a traditional jazz player. His compositions frequently blend many different styles including East Indian, classical, funk and blues. The CBC said about him: "He can be as experimental as John Cage, as impressionistic as Claude Debussy or as bluesy as Fats Waller."

"I might make a living as a 'jazz musician,' but my forte is being an improviser and I borrow from many traditions, from pretty much the whole spectrum," Koven says. "I'm just a musician playing my own music. I feel blessed that I chose this path."

Anarchy in the Middle East?

Johnny (Rotten) Lydon, the former Sex Pistols front man, will not cancel his Aug. 31 show in Tel Aviv despite receiving hate mail.

In his announcement on BBC 6 Music News, Lydon said he would not let "the political powers-that-be" dictate his audience.

Other performers, including Carlos Santana, Elivs Costello, The Pixies, The Klaxons, The Gorillaz, Dvendra Banhart and Gil Scott-Heron, have cancelled performances in Israel.

Lydon said he would ignore the hate mail and stir up trouble musically.

"I'm anti-government," he told the BBC. "And I shall be making that loud and clearly proud once I'm in Israel."

Pro-Palestinian activists have been picketing his current British tour to protest his Tel Aviv show.

A Facebook page calling on him to boycott Israel – "Johnny Rotten, you ain't no human being if u play the Israeli fascist regime" – has almost 1,000 members.

No Rivers of Babylon

Boney M, the popular 1970s disco band, acquiesced to a request not to perform a song in the West Bank that refers to Jews' yearning to return to Zion.

Organizers asked the European band not to perform the song Rivers of Babylon on July 20 in Ramallah during the six-day Palestinian International Festival because the chorus includes the phrase from the Book of Psalms, "Yeah, we wept, when we remembered Zion." The organizers said the song would be "inappropriate."

The festival is designed to draw attention to water shortages in the region.

"I don't know if it is a political thing or what, but they asked us not to do it, and we were a bit disappointed that we could not do it because we know that everybody loves this song no matter what," lead singer Maizie Williams told AFP, the French news agency.

Israelis and Arabs danced together at the festival. Many Israelis defied an official ban and travelled to the West Bank for that concert. Other concerts were held throughout the week in Ramallah, Hebron, Jenin, Bethlehem and Haifa.

International musicians are performing at the festival, which comes amid a Palestinian campaign to have international artists boycott Israel.

SUMMER LITERARY COLUMN: DETECTIVE BENNY COOPERMAN TURNS 30

Thirty years ago, writer Howard Engel gave the world Benny Cooperman, a new made-in-Canada literary detective whom the Globe and Mail and others would acknowledge as "the country's first truly Canadian detective hero."

According to Cynthia Good, former senior editor at Penguin, Engel's pioneering Canadian-Jewish detective opened the floodgates for scores of other Canadian crime writers to follow. "Engel's creation of a Jewish detective has enriched the mystery genre and promoted a positive, alternative depiction of the private eye," she said at the 2010 Canadian Jewish Book Awards in May, where Engel was honoured with a lifetime achievement award.

As Engel told me in a recent interview in the off-Bloor Street café that is his frequent haunt, he consciously made Benny Cooperman different than and antithetical to other literary detectives.

"I had read a lot of mystery novels over the years, and I decided I would try to make a character who wasn't like any of the others," he said.

"Where one American detective was fast with his fists, Benny Cooperman was going to avoid confrontation. Where the others were American and Christian, Benny Cooperman was going to be Canadian and Jewish. And where most of the American and British detectives came from large cities like New York, London, San Francisco or Los Angeles, Benny Cooperman was going to come from a small town." (Cooperman lives in Grantham, a fictional town modelled after St. Catharines, Ont., where Engel grew up.)

One evening in 1980, Engel fed a sheet of paper into his typewriter. "I didn't know when I began to type that it was going to be the beginning of Chapter 1 of a novel," he recalled. When he read back what he had written to his wife and a friend, they urged him to continue with it.

Those early pages became the start of The Suicide Murders, the first of about a dozen Benny Cooperman mysteries: others would include The Ransom Game, A City Called July, Dead and Buried, and There Was An Old Woman. Penguin recently reprinted all of them in attractive new covers, along with East of Suez, the latest one in the series. Meanwhile, the prolific Engel has already finished another two or three more Benny Cooperman mysteries. "The manuscripts are piling up. I don't think they've had a look at them yet, but they will be publishing them in the next little while."

A former top-notch writer-producer for the CBC, Engel has received many literary awards, including the Arthur Ellis Award for crime fiction, and has been named a member of the Order of Canada. A couple of his books have been made into movies.

Like the rest of us, Benny Cooperman has changed over the decades – for instance, he's now married – but, as befits a fictitious creation, he ages more slowly than we mortals. He still works in Grantham, still likes egg-salad sandwiches, still has an edge of ironic humour.

Years ago, he started out on divorce cases for which he had to "stand all night under leaky eavestroughs looking into a window and getting wet in the rain" in order to prove adultery. These days he gets a better class of clients and a better quality of cases; even the once-disdainful Grantham police have come to respect his sleuthing abilities. His parents, however, still make the occasional dig because he didn't go into a regular profession like his brother the surgeon.

In at least one key aspect, Cooperman has become more like his creator over the years. Just as Engel awoke one morning a decade ago with some perplexing mental difficulties, Cooperman has also acquired some mental cloudiness, as evidenced in The Memory Book, in which he sleuths his way out of a jam despite a head injury that impairs his reading ability. His affliction continues in East of Suez but doesn't stop him from solving the case.

One morning in 2000, Engel suddenly discovered that printed English seemed as unfathomable to him as printed Chinese. He was diagnosed with alexia sine agraphia, a form of visual impairment involving an inability to recognize written language. His affliction continues but his writing ability remains as good as ever. His condition is so unusual that neurologist-writer Oliver Sacks wrote a New Yorker piece about him called The Man Who Forgot How to Read.

With the aid of friends who read to him, Engel still produces manuscripts at an admirable pace, including several non-Benny Cooperman detective mysteries. To the relief of thousands of his fans, he has no plans to stop crafting Benny Cooperman stories. "I'm not tempted, as Conan Doyle was with Sherlock Holmes, to push Benny off a cliff," he said. "I don't find Benny crowds me. I think that poor Conan Doyle was crowded by Holmes."

Happy birthday, Benny Cooperman. And mazel tov, Howard Engel.

St. Urbain's Horseman faithfully adapted to film

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

St. Urbain's Horseman, the three-hour CBC adaptation of Mordechai Richler's 1971 Governor-General-Award-winning novel, was released recently on DVD.

Richler's classic novel is about Jake Hersh, a Jewish man who grew up in Montreal's Jewish neighbourhood (as did Richler) and went on to become a successful film director in England. (Hersh was previously introduced in Richler's earlier novel, The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz).

The movie, which originally aired as a two-part miniseries in 2007, begins with a wonderful opening shot of observant Jews painting over a swastika that was scrawled on the wall of their townhouse. Racial tensions in 1950s Montreal play a large part of the first half of the movie.

As a young teenager, Hersh idolizes his older cousin, Joey, a rebel and adventurer, who's not afraid to stand up for himself against the prevalent anti-Semitism. Hersh witnesses Joey get into a fight with local French youths and is plagued by guilt for the rest of the movie for not helping his cousin out.

As Hersh grows up, Joey, who's been gallivanting around the globe for years, is mythologized in his mind. He imagines that the small-time crook and swindler is really hunting down Nazis in South America.

The conflict between Jew and gentile is one of the book's (and movie's) central themes. In London, Hersh marries a fashion model, and the scenes between her and Hersh's visiting mother (delightfully played by SCTV veteran Andrea Martin), who blames all of her son's problems on marrying "that shiksa" provides much needed comic relief in this otherwise heavy adaptation of Richler's thematic novel.

David Hirsh is equally up to the task of playing Jake Hersh. And Michael Riley as the sleazy pornographer/accountant Harry Stein, who Hersh mistakenly gets involved with, is simply brilliant.

All in all, this is a great adaptation that remains faithful to Richler's classic novel. It's unfortunate that the DVD lacks any special features.

When U.S. President Barack Obama met with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu earlier this month in Washington, D.C., it appeared to have been a love fest. The handshakes went on and on and on, as if they were both determined to show their affection for each other and that of their mutual countries.

But was this renewed warmth between the Obama administration and Israel real, or was it Obama tending to his political needs in the light of upcoming Congressional elections? One must remember that although the Jewish vote is relatively numerically small, evangelical supporters of Israel may represent a huge negative voting bloc.

Some people simply don't trust the president. "Can a man whose middle name is Hussein be trusted,?" the Dry Bones comic strip once asked? Frankly, I don't put too much emphasis on the name in and of itself, but I do worry about some of Obama's practices.

It's as if Obama has a speech impediment. He simply cannot utter the word "Islam" in the context of the evil we have seen perpetrated in the name of the religion since 9/11. His inhibition becomes unmistakable when Islam is directly connected to terrorism by jihadists or other fundamentalist radicals and when he then repeatedly finds ways to avoid using that word.

That is not to say that Obama cannot speak of Islam at all. When he speaks of it in glowing terms, as he did in his Cairo speech in June 2009, he had no difficulty lauding its contributions to American society and paying tribute to Islam as a religion of peace.

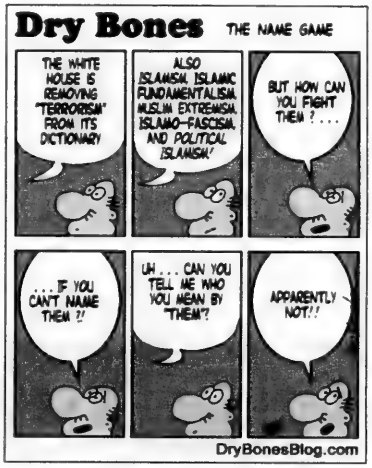
The examples of Obama's reluctance to couple Islam with negative, malicious associations are numerous. Take for example the case of Nadal Malik Hasan's terrorist attack. When Hasan shot and killed 13 soldiers and wounded 32 others at Fort Hood on Nov. 5, 2009, everyone everywhere knew what his motive was. He told us as much when he yelled " Allahu akbar" (" Allah is the greatest") to accompany his murderous attack. He was killing for his Islamic god. But Obama was quick off the mark to make sure that nobody jumped to that conclusion. His immediate response was precisely that. Don't prejudge this matter, he told the world. Although there were other times when Obama rushed to judgement, as in the case of black scholar Henry Louis Gates' arrest by a police officer in Cambridge, Mass. In that instance, Obama jumped quickly to the erroneous conclusion that the officer was motivated by racism .

Well, did the president jump to any conclusion about the motive of Abdul Mudallad on a flight from Amsterdam to Detroit on Christmas Day in 2009? Mudallad tried but failed to blow up the airplane. This time, Obama took his time before he spoke to the people of the United States and the world, and when he did, he condemned Al Qaeda for this latest obscenity. But once again he managed to avoid any reference to the Islamic influence on this terrorist perpetrator, whose failure was a lucky escape for close to 278 passengers. The motive for Mudallad's attempted slaughter of innocents may have been Al Qaeda, or it may not have been Al Qaeda, but for sure it was Islamic terrorism, as we were to find out.

After the latest failed terrorist attack against the United States by Faisal Shazhad to explode a car bomb in Times Square, Obama had the following to say: "Around the world and here at home there are those [italics mine] who will attack our citizens, who will slaughter innocent men, women, and children in the pursuit of their murderous agenda." I was looking in vain for his explanation of the cause of such murderous intent, and his reference to "those" indefinite persons in the world was yet another instance of Obama dodging the truth about Islamic radicalism.

Of course, this evasion by Obama is not actually due to a speech impediment, as I hinted – not seriously – above. I began to wonder about the psychological defences of a man who grew up during part of his early and formative years close to Islam, as both his father and stepfather were Muslims, as are currently his sister and half-brother. Was it now too much for Obama to have to admit that this part of his existence is the source of the hostility and danger to his country? I'm afraid we are unlikely to answer this question without psychoanalysis of the president of the United States, which is certainly outside the scope of this essay. However, whatever Obama's personal psychological inhibitions with respect to identifying the enemy in the current terrorist war, these boundaries have now been transformed into official American policy.

The Obama administration has recently announced its intent to ban all words that allude to Islamic terrorism from important national security documents. An Associated Press report had the following disturbing details: "President Barack Obama's advisers plan to remove terms such as 'Islamic radicalism' from documents outlining national security strategy and will use the new version to emphasize that the U.S. does not view Muslim nations through the lens of terrorism."



Dry Bones
THE NAME GAME
THE WHITE HOUSE IS REMOVING "TERRORISM" FROM ITS DICTIONARY
ALSO ISLAMISM, ISLAMIC FUNDAMENTALISM, MUSLIM EXTREMISM, ISLAMO-FASCISM, AND POLITICAL ISLAMISM!
BUT HOW CAN YOU FIGHT THEM ? . . .
. . . IF YOU CAN'T NAME THEM ?!
UH . . . CAN YOU TELL ME WHO YOU MEAN BY "THEM"?
APPARENTLY NOT!!
DryBonesBlog.com

But this gag order goes beyond national security documents. The Obama administration has apparently issued an internal order that forbids any official statements to include interpretations of the Islamic religion in a negative light. A case in point recently had Attorney General Eric Holder Jr., during questioning before the House Judiciary Committee, desperately and ludicrously trying to avoid uttering the term "radical Islam" when that reality was staring him and the committee in the face. So excessive is Obama's demand for linguistic obfuscation that last year, a publication of the Department of Homeland Security listed Jewish extremism and various forms of Christian extremism as threats, but it made no mention of any form of Muslim extremism.

Does Obama really think that appeasing Muslims by fudging language will somehow alter Islamic radicalism's war against the United States. Perhaps he does! In the Cairo speech early in his presidency, in which he promised to ameliorate relations between America and Muslims, he stressed the role of language as follows: "I consider it part of my responsibility as president of the United States to fight against negative stereotypes of Islam wherever they appear."

But while he soothes his own psyche and placates Muslim sensitivities, he is missing out in explaining to his people in accurate language exactly who and what they have to watch out for. If the president of the United States cannot be straight on the question of national security, there's no doubt in my mind that this enhances the power of dangerous jihadists and weakens American ability to prepare and respond. Why? Because, the United States cannot defeat an enemy that its president, and hence his administration, is unwilling to name.

Rising for Albert and his famous baseball song

By EDMON J. RODMAN
JTA

LOS ANGELES — At the ballpark this summer, when you rise for the seventh-inning stretch to sing Take Me Out to the Ball Game, stretch a bit taller – one of the song's writers was Jewish.

The unofficial song of America's pastime, Take Me Out to the Ball Game is the product of a Jewish-Episcopalian collaboration: Jewish songwriter Albert Von Tilzer wrote the melody, lyricist Jack Norworth penned the words.

Prior to writing baseball's hit tune, the lore goes, neither had attended a ball game.

Their famous collaboration, which is sung publicly somewhere in the United States every day from mid-spring to early fall, is believed to trail only Happy Birthday and The Star-Spangled Banner as America's most performed songs.

Since sportscaster Harry Caray first began belting it out at Chicago's Comiskey Park in the mid-1970s, and later at Wrigley Field, the song has become a regular feature at major league and minor league ballparks across America. They even sing it in Japan.

Yet considering the song's fame, Norworth and Van Tilzer go largely unrecognized by baseball officialdom, and Von Tilzer scores barely a nod in the Jewish community. Their story resembles the song's famous punchline: "and it's one, two, three strikes, you're out at the old ball game."

According to the Songwriters Hall of Fame website, Norworth wrote the lyrics to the universal seventh-inning stretch anthem in 1908 "while riding a New York City subway train." He had spotted a sign that said "Ballgame Today at the Polo Grounds" and "baseball-related lyrics started popping into his head."

His partner, Von Tilzer, already had a successful career in songwriting and music publishing in the Jewishly influenced Tin Pan Alley in New York when he wrote the music for what was to be his most enduring creation.

In 2008, the U.S. Postal Service issued a stamp commemorating the 100-year anniversary of the song, but there's no mention of the songwriters.

Von Tilzer died in 1956 and Norworth three years later, but word now comes from AOL columnist Chris Epting in a story titled "Stepping Up to Bat for Jack Norworth" that in Southern California where Norworth is buried – just a mile or two from the site of this year's Major League Baseball All-Star Game in Anaheim – the stone marking his grave site is worn and barely readable.

A Facebook group has formed recently dedicated to raising Norworth's visibility and "getting a groundswell going." Its goal is to have the marker re-done on better quality stone, adding words marking Norworth's role in co-writing the famous song.

But since Norworth has no known next of kin for approval, the Melrose Abbey Memorial Park is not allowing any do-overs, although it is open to discussing a plaque elsewhere on the grounds.

And what of Von Tilzer's grave?

Von Tilzer is buried in Glendale, N.Y., in a family plot in the New Mount Carmel cemetery. The headstone, simple in design with just a name and date, has no words memorializing his part in celebrating America's pastime.

In an era of sheet music, "Von Tilzer wrote the music for 20 million-copy-selling songs," said Tim Wiles, director of research at the National Baseball Hall of Fame in Cooperstown, N.Y., one of the authors of Baseball's Greatest Hit: The Story of Take Me Out to the Ball Game.

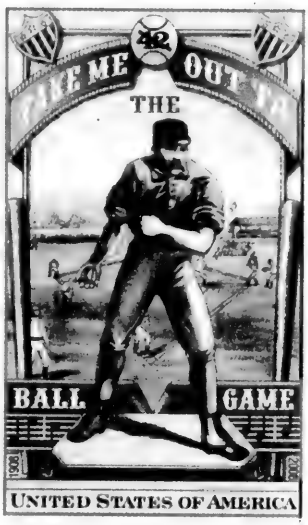
Von Tilzer, who changed his name from Gumm (originally Gumbinski), was one of five brothers from Indiana who all had careers on Tin Pan Alley and in vaudeville.

In Indianapolis, where Von Tilzer grew up, "The Gumbinskis owned a shoe store," Wiles said. "Upstairs was a performance space where they could kind of get their feet wet."

Despite their achievements, the Baseball Hall of Fame hasn't done anything permanent to commemorate the composer and lyricist of baseball's most often-heard song.

Wiles says Von Tilzer and Norworth don't fit into any of the four categories recognized by the hall: "player, umpire, ownership and pioneers."

"Von Tilzer's and Norworth's cultural contribution was one of the most important that has ever been made to the game," he said. "A contribution that is worthy of being remembered."



In 2008, the U.S. Postal Service issued a stamp to mark the 100th anniversary of Take Me Out to the Ballgame.

Wiles recalled that in 1997, the hall of fame did have an exhibit.

And what recognition has Von Tilzer received in Jewish circles? The website of the National Jewish Sports Hall of Fame and Museum in Commack, N.Y., less than 40 miles from where Von Tilzer is buried, states its goal is to foster "Jewish identity through sports." The hall has honoured athletes, sportswriters, broadcasters, columnists and a photographer, but no songwriters. Von Tilzer has yet to be inducted.

Why not add a plaque singing the praises of Von Tilzer? We already stand and sing his song at every game.

Like the song says, if he doesn't win it's a shame.

Israeli fencer wins bronze in Europe

JTA

LEIPZIG, Germany — An Israeli fencer won the bronze medal at the European Fencing Championships.

Noam Mills, 24, lost in the semifinals to Germany's Imke Duplitzer, who went on to win the gold medal July 18 in Leipzig, Germany.

Mills, who competed in the 2008 Beijing Olympics, is a native of Kfar Saba. She is entering her junior year at Harvard University and was captain of the women's fencing team there last year.

She finished seventh in last year's European championships.

HISTORIC CUNEIFORM TABLET UNEARTHED IN ISRAEL

A document containing a law code that parallels portions of the famous Code of Hammurabi, the ancient code of law enacted in 1750 BCE by Hammurabi, the king and chief priest of Babylonia, has been uncovered in Israel. The recently found code, written on fragments of a cuneiform tablet, also dates from the 18th to 17th centuries BCE, the Middle Bronze Age. The cuneiform tablet was discovered by researchers from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem earlier this summer at the Hazor dig site in the north of Israel.

REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS

HARRIS DELICATESSEN, CIRCA 1909-1914

The Harris Delicatessen, at Queen and Simcoe streets, was reportedly Toronto's first Jewish delicatessen. In this photo, which likely dates from between 1909 and 1914, various meats and delicacies sit along the counters, canned and bottled goods line the walls, several scales are suspended from the ceiling, and a cash register is visible at left. Sarah Harris, shown, was the mother of Dr. Lou Harris and the grandmother of Judge Sydney Harris. At the back, a poster advertises a play at the Lyric Yiddish Theatre. [Ontario Jewish Archives photo]

So long Israel. Hello Ivy League

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Slowly but surely, the Americanization of our youth is seeping into our community. What began a number of years ago in the United States – the pursuit of money that trumped a love of Israel and our people – is now happening here.

This summer, I've had the chance to speak with day school students, Jewish campers and staff, as well as shlichim (Israeli emissaries).

URBAN WRITER

Over and over, I've heard that many of our Jewish teens and university students view Torah study skeptically and as a religious imposition, and they care less and less about Israel – in fact, they frequently see it as the aggressor in the Middle East.

Individuals who were madrichim (leaders) on trips such as the March of the Living and Birthright have told me that programs participants have changed and are becoming less passionate about their Judaism and Eretz Yisrael.

Of course, times are changing and young people will look at our peoplehood differently than do our Holocaust survivors and those who were at the Christie Pits riot in 1933. Our youth don't generally experience or see anti-Semitism. They feel much safer than our parents and grandparents did.

That being said, the changes we're witnessing are still very disconcerting, particularly as Israel and the Jewish people become more isolated on the world stage.

If our youth aren't learning to appreciate and love Judaism, Torah and Israel, who can our Israeli brothers and sisters rely upon? Are we hanging Israel out to dry? Do we use Israel when we need her? Is Judaism and community a movement of commerce and fun?

When a shaliach tells me that his campers are unfamiliar with the name Gilad Schalit, we're in trouble. This is even more problematic when we consider the massive investments we've made in Israel programming.

The expectation of the Jewish community is that when we send young people to Israel, they'll come back and stand tall when our homeland is under siege. Ask Jewish university professionals if that's the case. Are these students better represented at Israel rallies?

Brave campus professionals have told me that they're highly disappointed in the turnout of Jewish students – especially those who have travelled to Israel under community auspices – when a strong, unified voice is needed to mute those of our enemies and adversaries.

Clearly there are Jewish children, teens, university students and adults who stand courageously in support of Israel. You know them when you see them, because they're the ones with purpose in their hearts and soul and an obvious recognition of the simple fact that, without Israel, a land "promised to us by God," the Jewish people aren't safe, nor are we living out our destiny.

But alas, these youthful ideologues will also tell you that they're on their own.

Mistakes are being made in our community, leading to a place where we're becoming far less aware of our Judaism and less caring of Israel.

Instead, what is foremost in our students minds is achieving high grades to get into Ivy League schools so that they can reach the ultimate goal: making lots of money, but for what I'm not sure.

We're failing our youth, ourselves and leaving Israel to fend for herself. Parents are spending fortunes to send their children to day schools (and Talmud Torahs), yet the investment, more often than not, doesn't produce Zionists and lovers of Israel.

We must look very closely at the underlying message we as parents, educators and leaders are sending to our progeny. Is it, "Work to become wealthy," or is it, "Know and embrace your roots and be aware of the Jewish value of loving Israel?"

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Discover A New "Taste" at Pilaros Taste Of The Danforth

Toronto's favourite festival offers fun for the whole family

Toronto's favourite street festival has a whole new way to celebrate the fun and flavours of Greece and summer in the city. Every year in August, the city of Toronto flocks to GreekTown on the Danforth. Now celebrating its 17th year, the Pilaros Taste Of The Danforth is Canada's largest street festival, welcoming approximately 1.3 million visitors. A Decima Research poll reported that 90% of respondents identified "The Taste" as their favourite GTA festival event — beating out such iconic events as the Toronto International Film Festival, Caribana and Pride Week.

Canada's largest street festival is favourite event of GTA residents

The GTA has more than 200,000 residents of Greek ancestry, the third largest Hellenic community outside of Greece, and between August 6th and August 8th, 2010, everyone who comes to the Danforth gets to be Greek for the day.

This year, as in 2009, Pilaros International Trading Inc. is proud to be the Title Sponsor of the Taste of the Danforth. Pilaros is a leading importer of Mediterranean food products, primarily olives and olive oil — what the ancient Greeks referred to as "The Essence of Life".

This year's Pilaros Taste Of The Danforth has loads of fun, family-friendly activities for your entertainment and enjoyment. For a full list of attractions and events, refer to page 13 of this section.

On Friday afternoon, August 6th, as part of our "Pre-Show", celebrities, politicians, members of the media and corporations will be kicking up their heels with "Beds On Wheels" at the 5th Annual Danforth Dash Bed Race, in support of the Toronto East General Hospital Foundation. To date this event, in conjunction with the GreekTown On The Danforth BIA, has raised in excess of $100,000 towards the purchase of new electric hospital beds for TEGH. In addition to supporting The Danforth Dash, over the years the GreekTown on the Danforth BIA has raised more than $1 million in support of Toronto East General Hospital.

Over $1,000,000 raised in support of Toronto East General Hospital

There will also be opportunities to win an Aegean Splendour Trip For Two To Glorious Greece, courtesy of Transat Holidays. This is a eight days/seven nights trip consisting of a four-night Greek island and Turkey cruise and three nights in Athens, Greece.

With great food, great entertainment and great family fun, a splendid time is guaranteed for all.

We look forward to seeing you at the Taste. Opa!

This year, Montreal-based Pilaros International Trading is once again gratified to sponsor the 17th Annual Taste of The Danforth. To President Miltiadis ("Milton") Antypas, the Taste is much more than a branding opportunity.

"When we were approached last year about sponsoring the Taste, we were aware of its history, and excited at the chance to be involved. We knew it was a wonderful cause. Now that we've come aboard, we are even more impressed at the community's participation and the passion they bring to the event, at all levels.

We share that passion. Our entire team is focused on ensuring that this year's Taste is the best ever.

We are proud to associate our name with such a prestigious event. But it's much more than a marketing opportunity. It's a chance to help save lives. We'd like to thank everyone involved — the Toronto East General Hospital, the merchants, and especially, you the public — for helping to make this a reality. Opa!"

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Sun Valley a paradise for food shoppers

If you value quality, hate spending hours schlepping through faceless supermarkets and need more than the corner store can offer, Sun Valley Fine Foods is tailor-made for you.

Larger than a neighbourhood European food store, yet small enough to navigate your way through quickly, Sun Valley is boutique food shopping at its very finest. Just about every sought-after brand name is here, from gourmet grocery items to breads, cakes and pastries. And if there's a hot new product on the market, you'll find it here first.

The produce here is simply spectacular. The fruit has fewer blemishes than the average Hollywood actress. The meat, fish and poultry are exquisite, a boon to homemakers and BBQ enthusiasts alike.

Unlike most supermarkets that include high-end brand names and quality as part of their overall mix, Sun Valley sells nothing but quality. You won't have to sift through five brands to find one good one. And the layout of the store lends itself to ease and efficiency, with the produce, bakery and grocery areas surrounding a central meat department. You'll find exactly what you need for your family and special occasion dining with friendly, knowledgeable personal service.

It's these attributes which keep customers coming back — not only the locals, but shoppers from North York, Thornhill, and even Richmond Hill, armed with the temperature-controlled bags that have become standard equipment among shoppers willing to go the extra mile for the very best.

People come from outside GreekTown to shop Sun Valley "for the same reasons they patronize the restaurants," says Spiro Aravantinos: "quality, freshness, flavour, and value."

Ah yes, value. What Aravantinos doesn't mention — but what's common knowledge among Sun Valley shoppers — is that they've resisted "snob appeal". In true GreekTown spirit, they've kept their prices affordable even as their reputation has continued to grow.

The bottom line is that under this one roof you'll find exactly what you want in less time — yet at a more leisurely pace — than in the "big box" supermarkets. And, if you're a husband who'se been "commissioned" to bring home the groceries, your chances of getting a glowing report card on arrival are better here than just about anywhere else.

The reason is simple. Sun Valley just doesn't sell anything that won't get the spousal seal of approval — no matter how hard that may be to come by in your household.

Christina's authenticity has universal appeal

If one restaurant can be said to embody all the good qualities that GreekTown is known for, Christina's is that place.

Authentic Greek cuisine served in a festive ambience. A choice of dining indoors with elegance and intimacy, or outdoors on a convivial patio. And a bit of je-ne-sais-quoi — that intangible magnetism that makes celebrities and local Danforth-goers alike choose this restaurant over dozens of others at their disposal.

Christina's appeal stems from all of the aforementioned attributes, but food is always first and foremost in GreekTown. The term "authentic" is ubiquitous — you'll see it on almost every menu — but here it really carries weight, as those who've travelled to Greece will attest.

The fresh fish and seafood is a prime example. "Fresh catch of the day" heads the menu; it's what you'd typically be served in a Greek fishing village, and here is no different. Also popular are the Grilled fresh Atlantic salmon (brushed with herbs and spices) and Filet of sole (lightly pan fried with herbs and garlic).

As any Greek will tell you, "authenticity" means allowing the full flavour of the food to emerge, not smothering it in elaborate sauces to create the illusion of grandeur. With fresh fish that sometimes means "less is more", using exactly the right amount of herbs and seasoning for optimum taste — not a shake or sprig more.

The Lobster Tail broiled in garlic butter is a long-time favourite among the seafood entrées, but don't overlook the subtle synergy of tastes and textures in a Seafood Platter. For two, the Aegean brims with Shrimp, scallops, salmon and mussels sautéed in a tomato herb sauce; for several, the Mediterranean combines lobster tail, tiger shrimp, salmon, scallops, kalamari and mussels.

The meat entrées and vegetarian options are also first-rate, but don't expect to be confused by hundreds of choices. Christina's philosophy has always been to offer only as many specialties as they can prepare perfectly — a "Mother Knows Best" approach you'll find in any good Greek home. Or any good Jewish home, for that matter.

Live music and belly dancing on Friday and Saturday, an extensive wine list and the opportunity to host intimate private parties add to Christina's appeal. Partners Bill, Tony and Kathy are proud of their multiple awards, but the smile on your face is the trophy they covet most.

Astoria's second location more of a good thing, say customers

How do you duplicate a one-of-a-kind? You don't. You make a second one in the general image of the first, retaining its best characteristics and adding a few proprietary tweaks of its own — then invite the former's fan club to discover the latter.

To say that Astoria's Mississauga location was an overnight success would be misleading. True, it was instantly embraced by Greek food lovers. Many who live or work west of the 427 were gratified to trade in traffic jams on the 401 and the QEW for quicker access to their favourite restaurant. Some Astoria regulars east of the 427 have found it to their liking simply as a change of pace, or for the novelty of free parking. And, says Company Director Peter Kerasiotis, the expansion was carefully coordinated with major renovations to the GreekTown location to ensure a slow, smooth transition to a new, brighter and bolder Astoria.

"We measure our success by customer satisfaction"

"Any art critic knows a cheap reproduction from the original. It's the same with food. You don't take a brand with a 40-year history of success and give it a quick facelift, nor do you cookie-cutter it." Lifelong Astoria customers, he says, have developed such a proprietary relationship with Astoria that "they consider it theirs — and it is. Their loyalty and support over four decades gives them an ownership stake. It may not be on paper, but as a bond and a partnership it carries equal weight. Everything that's been done has been done with our customers in mind, and in response to their wishes." Responding to customer feedback is a constant, he says. "We're not expanding so much as growing the brand. In some people's minds, expansion implies dilution. That's not our m.o. We felt the way to achieve that and maintain quality control and consistency is by doing it slowly. We're not a fast food restaurant charting growth by how many franchises we can open in a year. We measure our success by customer satisfaction, one meal at a time."

The cornerstones of successful restauranteuring — freshness, quality, and friendly personal service — are unfailingly apparent at both locations. Astoria still imports staples such as feta cheese, olive oil and olives in small quantities directly from Greece. Their staggering portions still quell the most outrageous appetites.

While customer feedback is Astoria's #1 barometer, a little third-party corroboration never hurts. Judged "Best of the City" by Toronto Life and "Best of Toronto" by Now, Astoria is also a multiple winner of the Toronto Sun's Readers' Choice Award as Toronto's favourite Greek restaurant, and was rated "Best Greek International Restaurant" by Where.

New generations of Greek food lovers with increasingly sophisticated palates have prompted many restaurants to overhaul their menus. Astoria has resisted sweeping changes in favour of subtle tweaks, while retaining the favourite dishes beloved by young and old alike. If it ain't broke, don't fix it; Astoria's souvlaki, moussaka and grilled fresh fish taste as good today as they did four decades ago. It's hard to improve on perfection.

Greek appetizers like grilled calamari and creamy homemade tzatziki are a welcome prelude to your feast, if you can keep your Astoria-induced souvlaki craving at bay long enough to sample them.

It's no accident that the first signs of an upcurve in the popularity of Greek cuisine coincided with Astoria's opening, nor is it coincidental that Greek food's continued growth in popularity parallels that of the Astoria we know today.

It's too early to tell if Astoria's Mississauga location is the start of a GreekTown West. Some old customers for whom the Danforth location will always be the Mother Ship wouldn't go elsewhere if you paid them. For others, the new location is like having a favourite relative in another city: something to look forward to when you travel. Either way, there's more of Astoria to love.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Pantheon redefines freshness for fish lovers

They say you can't catch lightning in a bottle. But if "they" saw the lightning quickness with which chef Nick Parousss turns fresh fish into the most delicious oceanic offerings you've ever tasted, "they" might well revise that proverb. "Pantheon's catch of the day is lighting in a bottle" sounds right.

It's an exaggeration, of course. But it's no exaggeration to suggest that the perfect timing required to maximize the inherent flavour and freshness of each variety of fish is better captured by Pantheon than any other restaurant. In 12 years since dropping anchor on the Danforth, this bastion of seafood bounty has become the pre-eminent destination for fresh fish and seafood, not only in GreekTown but city-wide.

The popular favourites like red snapper, Atlantic salmon and sea bass are here in abundance, but so are many other exotic selections you're unlikely to find elsewhere. Pantheon eliminates the need to call around to see who has what: if it resides in the ocean depths, it's here. Baby sea smelts and fresh anchovies are imported directly from Greece. Striped bass, orange roughy, black porgy, red mullet, sea smelts, and many others, impeccably prepared and seasoned, gratify the most discriminating fish and seafood lovers. At Pantheon, you could dine on a different fresh fish every day for a fortnight.

"... a winning charm ..."

"... fresh fish, care with good products and little razzmatazz nudges Pantheon ahead of most competitors ..."

"As golden and desirable as an Olympic medal"

But freshness and selection alone do not a reputation make. The overall excellence across the entire menu and the gracious hospitality that allow a newly-minted restaurant to double in size after only six years in business are also in evidence. Parousss' partner John Troupis and his son Bobby Troupis understand that food is not merely sustenance, but art and soul. In that spirit, they do their utmost to ensure that each customer's visit is a sensory experience.

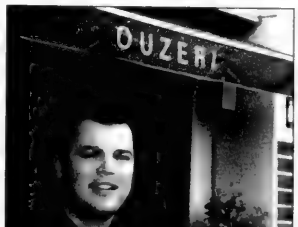
Embodying that spirit are two bright, spacious dining rooms. Semi-private dining with a comforting fireplace is available in the east room. Best to reserve to avoid wait times.

In a business where turnover is the norm, Pantheon's continuity stands out. The same head chef and most of the same wait staff present when it opened are still in place. People enjoy working here, they like the clientele, and the clientele likes them. Continuity fosters loyalty, and vice versa.

The Olympic Pantheon was blessed with the opportunity to taste the Ambrosia and Nectar of the Gods. The Olympics happen every four years, but at Pantheon, in the heart of GreekTown, you can indulge in those same taste sensations whenever the mood strikes you.

Ouzeri: Danforth's most relaxed dining

A splash of vibrant colour, sweeping sky-blue awnings, and a festive patio beckon you inside. It's as if you stepped straight off the sidewalk onto the beach. Ouzeri has the unique ability to relax you in seconds — a valuable asset when you consider that the enjoyment of any meal hinges first and foremost on the absence of stress. This is the one GreekTown restaurant that feels like one giant patio. Even when you're seated inside, the open, airy ambience gives you a sense of freedom, of letting go.



500A Danforth Ave. 416.778.0500

Like their pride and joy, brothers Chris and Alex Trahiotis are bright, cheery, welcoming people whose love of the restaurant business comes naturally, since they grew up in the business.

Marrying European fine dining with Greek cuisine, Ouzeri's eclectic menu is focused on quality, not volume. The kind of quality that will stir your fondest memories of home cooking. Sacrilegious though it sounds, Ouzeri's Avgolemono Soup will have you drawing favourable comparisons with your Bubie's chicken soup — high praise indeed.

Famed for their appetizers, Ouzeri also offers a number of intriguing entrées. Strydia Ouzeri is topped with spinach, tomato, kaseri cheese and Ouzeri's special sauce, then baked to perfection. Lamb rosemary pie, offered in your choice of lamb shank and feta or chicken with a rosemary and mushroom sauce enveloped in filo, is warmly recommended. The moussaka — both meat and vegetarian — is as good as it gets in GreekTown, and the seafood richly deserves the "authentically Greek" label you'll encounter everywhere on the Danforth. Fresh fish is available daily, and may feature Red Snapper, Sea Bass, Salmon, or whatever catch happens to be freshest on the day you visit.

Ouzeri's extensive Greek wine list has a selection that will perfectly complement any of the entrées, or stand on its own as an after-work or after-dinner libation.

The service is friendly and extremely thorough, with ample wait staff to keep pace with your needs. Like the awnings, they're dressed in an extremely comforting shade of blue.

Whether you're looking for a quick bite or a long, pleasurable meal, Ouzeri's three levels of dining all convey the same gentle message: Relax. Relax. Relax.

"One of my favourite summer patios" — Saul Korman

"What do you think this is, a restaurant?"

Mothers worldwide have an informal copyright on this question. If you've ever had the temerity to tell the family matriarch that anything other that what she's put on your plate might be more to your liking, then you've been on the receiving end of this missive.

At Zorba's, Mom is Dad. But you'll never hear owner and chef Kosta Carasoulos pose the aforementioned question. He's far too nice — and you'll be far too busy enjoying whatever he's prepared to even think of alternatives.

Like your Mom, he cooks whatever he feels like cooking on any given day. What he puts on the table is what you get. Like an artist setting a fresh canvas, he goes wherever his brush takes him — cooking not from a formula, but from the heart.

Zorba's differs from home in one respect; here, you're not limited you to one or two choices. The prolific Carasoulos gives you 10 to 20 selections, enticingly arrayed on is a steam table. You choose what you're in the mood for and are generously served by one of seven or eight Carasoulos family members. "We have an informal family reunion here every day," jokes son Bobby.

They have menus here if you insist on à la carte, but unless you're ordering a fresh salad, a shish kebob or hamburgers and French fries for the kids, you can do just as well without them.

Heavenly scents beckon from the steam table. Today, there's moussaka, pastitsio, lamb shank, lamb fricassee, roast chicken, roast potatoes, green beans with zucchini, carrots, or cauliflower, soup, and a variety of other specialties. Tomorrow? Only Carasoulos knows. This is less a restaurant than a home kitchen feeding a huge extended family, of which you are now a de facto member. You can call ahead to see what's available, but why spoil the fun? Most of Zorba's customers just show up with an appetite and a smile.

416-406-1212

Having each dish on piping hot display makes deciding what you want a lot easier; taste buds respond better to immediate stimuli than to menu suggestion. In that respect Zorba's katsarola (Greek for "pot", a metaphor for home cooking) is much like a holiday dinner that your Mom has slaved over. It's a labour of love that sees all your old favourites materialize before your eyes.

That's the good news. The bad news is that once these haymishe specialties are gone, they're gone, and with an eager clientele weaned on home cooking, it's best to arrive early for best selection.

The service is warm and courteous, but there are no grand formalities here — just the familial ease and grace of people who, like an old friend who never changes, are always easy to be with.

The prices are so low they're almost guilt-inducing; rarely will you enjoy so much food for so little. That may explain why during the week, the take-out lineup sometimes rivals the sit-down crowd. You just can't cook at home for less.

Eating here will, however, rekindle all your good memories of home cooking and of a simpler time and place in life that most of us would dearly love to get back to, if only for an evening.

Here, you can.

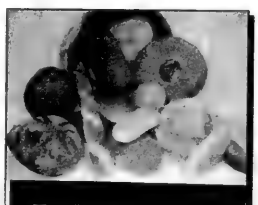
Select Bakery lives up to symbolic standard

More has been written about bread than perhaps any other food. Millions of words — in every conceivable literary medium and in almost every language — have been devoted to it throughout history. At the most elemental level, it symbolizes sustenance.

Sadly, modern mass production has obscured that quality while obliterating taste. Fortunately, there are a select few bakeries still making bread replete with the kind of fundamental goodness that we once took for granted.

Select Bakery takes you back to that artisanal era. Your childhood forays into the local bakery — and the irresistible urge to eat everything in sight — come rushing back.

Row upon row of freshly-baked perfection awaits. It's GreekTown, so try Select's signature Kalamata Olive bread. Get there early before it sells out. The European Village Bread — crusty on the outside, buttery soft on the inside — is also highly recommended.



405 Donlands Ave. 416.421.2400
www.selectbakery.ca

But Select is much more than bread. It's noshing heaven on a grand scale. Huge (5,000 sq. ft.) yet intimate (GreekTown's only bakery with a dedicated seating area), the majestic array of baked bounty is the gustatory equivalent of surround sound.

It's kid-in-a-candy-store syndrome, but better. You get to set adult limits on how many fresh-daily delectables to ingest — then disregard those limits as your resolve crumbles faster than a sheet of phyllo pastry. Think you can limit yourself to just one chocolate-covered baklava? Are you prepared to state that under oath?

Enhancing Select's seductiveness is the colour scheme (tan on caramel on chocolate) and a refinement of presentation worthy of the illustrious cafés of Europe after which it's modelled.

The Katsamakis family — father Emmanuel, sons Kosta and Nick, and daughter Areti — lead a cheery staff of skilled bakers and pastry chefs. A full range of traditional Greek, European and continental pastries (baklava, galaktobourèko, petits fours et al) is complemented by the aforementioned European breads, specialty cakes of the highest order, and sublime specialty coffees.

For weddings and other events, Select's special occasion cakes score a 10 on 10 for artistic merit. Your input is welcome in the design process, though doing so feels a bit like advising Michelangelo on sculpting techniques.

Further distinguishing Select are its prepared foods. Moussaka, pastitsio, and many other entrées — plus the full gamut of Greek dips and sauces — are made fresh daily. Many entrées are available fresh or frozen, and most are suitable for freezing. Need to entertain on short notice? Select is a one-stop destination for party trays, rolls, and related comestibles. And its ultraconvenient location on Donlands just south of O'Connor has ample, inexpensive meter parking at the front door.

Bakeries are the stuff of childhood longing; each is measured against our favourites of yesteryear. This bakery belongs in that Select group.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Kalyvia's food or home cooking? Same thing.

Those who take issue with describing restaurant food as "home cooking" haven't eaten in GreekTown lately. And they definitely haven't eaten at Kalyvia.

This apparent oxymoron is easily explained. "Home cooking" is not just the standard most restaurants aspire to; it is, in large part, the reason they exist. Go back one or two generations in any Greek restauranteur's family, and you'll find a home cooker who was famous in his or her home town or village. Go back 400 years, and you'll find a home cooker who wouldn't even know the meaning of the word "restaurant." Wouldn't even understand the concept.

What he or she might understand is that this "restaurant" is your only way of preserving the family legacy of home cooking in a world that's now too busy for many of us to pick up a frying pan, let alone use it.

In the case of Kalyvia and the Tsafatinos family, pride of ownership goes beyond upholding the family standard. It's about bragging rights. The World Cup of soccer may have ended a few weeks ago, but equally intense regional rivalries persist in the culinary arena. Like, Kalyvia, Greece vs. Kalyvia, Greece, with the winner advancing to the next round vs... Kalyvia, Greece. That's right: with several towns of the same name, each boasting their own regional specialties, you've got to prove your mettle on the domestic front before you can represent your country.

The competition is good-natured, of course, but underpinning the friendly banter is genuine pride. Coming from the Tsafatinos' home town and being unable to cook is like coming from Venice and being unable to stay upright in a gondola.

The high esteem in which the Tsafatinos family is held by their customers is mirrored by the respect from their peers. Like most GreekTown restauranteurs, they adhere to the unwritten rule that mutual support trumps one-upmanship.

"Is our souvlaki good?", says Jimmy Tsafatinos. "Yes. Is our moussaka great? Yes. Are our dips amazing? We like to think so. But we can say our food is good without putting ourselves on a pedestal, or saying we're better than our neighbours. It's up to the customer to decide who's best. If you're too busy pounding your chest, then you're not spending enough time listening to your customers. And no one likes a prima donna."

Humility is an important part of the GreekTown restaurant psyche, he explains. "We're happy to be one of many good restaurants with something to offer. We work together to create a family environment, an area that everyone will enjoy coming to. One night they might eat here, the next night at our neighbour's. As long as they come to GreekTown, we're happy."

Now, which town of Kalyvia cooks better than the next town of Kalyvia...that's another story. That's a rivalry everyone can get with — a tasting competition in which no holds are barred, no one takes themselves too seriously, and the customer always wins.

Exactly as it should be.

Culinary art worthy of the Louvre at Pappas

"The art of Mediterranean cuisine" is a ubiquitous phrase in culinary circles. For Pappas Grill it's doubly relevant.

In 1988, founders Bill and Meropi Kliants were sourcing a new location for their art gallery (Williams Gallery at Yonge and Eglinton) when they stumbled on a sprawling space in the heart of GreekTown. Too large and too ambitious for their small gallery — but too loaded with restaurant potential to pass up — the serendipitous space wooed the Kliants family from one art form to another.

A lengthy and painstaking transformation ensued under the direction of architect Robert Chan of Hirschberg Design Group, with considerable input from Bill and Meropi. The breathtaking result instantly captured the fancy of a dining public eager for an eclectic departure from traditional Greek fare.

"We didn't want to open just another Greek restaurant," says daughter Jane Kliants, who with brother John now oversees all of the restaurant's day-to-day-operations. "There was no point in duplicating what was already being done by our neighbours." In the art world, if you bring nothing new to the table, you're either uninspired or a copycat. Clearly, the Kliants family's art experience transmuted to their restaurant ethos.

Pappas' winning mix of elegant Mediterranean dining in an airy, light-filled, tri-level dining room has captivated GreekTown goers since Day One, not only for the quality of its cuisine but also for its unique ability to adapt to any occasion or mood. It's fine dining, yet casual and relaxed. It affords privacy, yet provides sweeping sightlines. It's the epicentre of GreekTown activity — letting the outside in like a beautifully landscaped public square disguised as a restaurant — yet it's a secluded shelter in which to pause and reflect.

Jane and John keep close tabs on all aspects of the business, but are careful not to micromanage — especially with their chefs. "Artistic people need artistic license," smiles Jane. "If you take that away their freedom, you stultify their creativity. We buy market fresh ingredients every day, give them to our chefs, and tell them to make something wonderful."

The result is always novel and often spectacular, she says. "Our customers look to us for new taste experiences. That doesn't mean changing the menu every six months, it means creating a complete new set of dinner specials every week."

These take the form of a seven-day Prix Fixe menu which revitalizes your palate without devitalizing your portfolio. $25 gets you a choice of hot or cold soup, two appetizers, and four entrées. That's exceptional value for any fine restaurant, let along one that racks up awards like others rack lamb.

Speaking of this Mediterranean staple, there's more care and attention to detail in Pappas' Oven-Roasted Lamb Shank than in some entire menus we've seen. Slow roasted for eight hours in Greek oregano, fresh garlic and spices, it stews longer in its own juices than your mother-in-law after a putdown of her cooking. The Pappas Rigatoni (spicy homemade Greek sausage, sweet peppers and garlic with feta, parmesan and kefalotri cheese in a rich white wine cream sauce) has seen more than one Italian chef add Opa! to his vocabulary. The Mediterranean Shrimp sautéed in white wine is a seafood relevation.

Pappas cooks most of its dishes in extra-virgin olive oil, but the extra cost of this and other premium ingredients like white wine is not reflected in its prices. "Using fresh, pure ingredients isn't a "bonus," says Jane, "it's standard. You don't like a contractor cutting corners on your house; we don't cut corners in creating your meal."

All Pappas' dishes are made fresh from scratch on the premises. No MSG, additives or preservatives are used — ever. "Mediterranean cuisine in its pure state is intrinsically healthy," says Kliants. "We keep it that way."

Ditto for the Saturday and Sunday continental Brunch, where you can enjoy eggs in any style imaginable, including a decadent chicken benedict, with charred-to-perfection chicken complemented by two poached eggs and a wonderfully creamy Hollandaise sauce.

Fame may be fleeting, but not at Pappas Grill. If so, its cameo appearance in My Big Fat Greek Wedding would be long forgotten. Truth is, Pappas' cuisine had made a lasting impression on the Toronto dining consciousness long before its foliated frontage lit up the silver screen.

VOTED BEST GREEK RESTAURANT BY TORONTO SUN READERS' CHOICE FOR 6 YEARS AND RUNNING!

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

World leaders agree: 521 a better event venue

Ever since the G20, the debate has raged. Was downtown Toronto the best place to hold it? (Most say no). Was $1.2 billion excessive? (All say yes). Where should it be held next time? (521 guesses).

This is one meeting place about which there's no debate — and those who enjoy its friendly confines will give you 521 good reasons to do likewise. The best beverages money can buy, at prices that are easy on your pocketbook. The kind of relaxed atmosphere that would induce warmongers to broker peace, hotheads to take a chill pill, and kvetchers to be content. In short, the kind of ambience that says RELAX in a language so universal you cannot but heed its call.

In a tzimmes? 521 will extract you from it. Got tsuris? 521 will chase it. However challenging your day, 521 will smooth out its rough edges.

If Lambros and Frank Babatsikos work hard at making your life easy, they certainly don't show it. When you're weaned on the restaurant business, gracious hospitality and a pleasant demeanour become second nature. Work becomes play.

Such is its aesthetic appeal that 521 has become a magnet not only for Danforth regulars, but also those for whom an oasis of calm and comfort is everything.

The Babatsikos brothers may be easygoing, but they've never been content to rest on their laurels. Since opening Café 521 in 1999, they have renovated it twice. The most recent upgrade, courtesy of George Foussias of Hirschberg Design, has elevated the trendy spot to iconic status. In typically Greek fashion, the bar celebrates man's imperfection by making perfect harmony out of a cluster of asymmetrical components. The bar and seating area at front, the dining area midway, the back patio and private lounge at rear are connected by three huge portals. The resulting depth perspective affords guests a telescopic view of the street.

A warm summer's hour on 521's back patio with a cool beverage is as close to perfect relaxation as this imperfect world gets.

Toronto's finest scotches, martinis and specialty mixed beverages — as well as delicious light meals — make 521 the ideal gathering spot. There are no Fortune 500 companies on the Danforth, but through their enterprising manner and irrepressible good nature, the Babatsikos brothers are making this 500 number famous for better reasons: good food, good service and good cheer. And, needless to say, a better return on your enjoyment dollar.

Whether you're looking to enjoy a quick lunch or an after-dinner drink — or turn a relaxing dinner into a very relaxing evening — this hot spot gives you 521 reasons to chill out.

And 521 reasons for visiting dignitaries to follow your good example.

Hot new taste arrives on cool island breeze

Everyting irie, mon.

GreekTown's growing culinary diversity has seen its restaurant ranks swelled by participants from the four corners of the world. Heretofore, however — apart from a token presence on some take-out menus — West Indian cuisine has been noticeably absent from the mix.

Until today. A cool island breeze has swept across the Danforth, beanng a wave of tropical delights. If you're taking attendance, you can mark West Indian cuisine emphatically Present.

But before we sample these delicacies, one question. Why is the Danforth's first full-service Jamaican restaurant named To The World? Simple, says owner Sandy (Rosa) Small. This taste is far too big to be confined to a one-country frame of reference. Once these compelling flavours set sail from Jamaican shores, grins Small, "they belong to the whole wide world."

TO THE WORLD
CARIBBEAN BISTRO
786 Broadview Avenue at Danforth
647-351-3330 • www.totheworld.ca

As usual, Danforth-goers get first dibs on a hot new culinary phenomenon.

How hot?

The notion that all West Indian food's over-the-top spicy is misguided, says Small. "Jamaican cuisine is milder than East Indian food. The taste doesn't need to be acquired; you can enjoy it right away." Facilitating your indoctrination is the ability to specify just how hot you'd like your food. "Your server will always ask you whether you'd like it mild, medium, hot, or extra-hot," says Small.

Most restaurants offering geographic cuisine bill themselves as "authentic." If you're at all familiar with Jamaican fare, a quick perusal of the menu renders this declaration superfluous. This is back-home cooking that would make any Bubie proud. And well it should, for it was Small's grandmother who inspired her to open the restaurant in the first place. "I'm repaying a debt," says Small. "She put so much love into everything she made that I'd have to cook a whole lifetime just to give it back."

Assisting her in the endeavour is chef Tayyib Thomas, whose boatload of specialties is as Jamaican as coconut palms and Irish Moss. Two hybrid offerings cater to more mainstream palates: Jerk Wings ("because everyone likes chicken wings, and some people just need to wade in slowly before jumping in with both feet," says Small. And a vegetable medley of the freshest local produce available on any given day, stir-fried in a coconut sauce.

Seasoning isn't just a flavouring technique here, it's an art form. All of To The World's dishes are seasoned with up to eight freshly hand-picked spices, translating into heavenly aromas and equally celestial taste. On the intrinsically warmer end, signature dishes include Jerk Chicken, Curried Goat, and Oxtail. On the cooler side, Jamaica's national dish — Salt Cod with Ackee — is a must-try, as is the Mackerel Run Down.

Everything's made fresh from scratch here, including the desserts. If you're as well-steeped in wisdom as the Jamaican Fruit Cake is in prime island rum, you'll prep your palate with a savoury entrée before ascending this sweet crescendo.

To The Word's bistro-relaxed setting offers a main dining area and a cozy rear patio where you can watch your food being grilled, backyard-like, within easy reach of your table.

With hospitality as warm as the tropical sun, ambience as relaxed as a swaying palm, and a taste as big as the whole wide world, this little slice of island paradise will carry the taste of Jamaica clear into your heart.

There is one house rule, however, that all guests must observe, without exception. All worldy cares must be checked at the door.

Everyting irie.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Pan: GreekTown's biggest little dining experience

A hockey, football or basketball player who's small in stature but performs fearlessly is said to "play big". Pan On The Danforth may be GreekTown's version of that player.

No, Pan is not a sports bar. Quite the contrary, it's one of Toronto's most refined Mediterranean restaurants, proving that big things often come in small packages.

More has been accomplished here in less space than in perhaps any other restaurant in Toronto. Interleaved brickwork, gleaming hardwood floors, a cachet of curtains, nested wine rack and ensconced fireplace capped by an embossed copper ceiling merge seamlessly to form Toronto's coziest, most intimate dining environment.

Owners Chris and Soula Christodoulou are always on the premises, greeting customers personally and attending to the finer details. It's a hands-on approach that's worked so well for them they couldn't change it even if they wanted to. "There are some things you can delegate, and other things you never should," says Chris. "This business is very personal. You don't send someone to your child's graduation on your behalf. You go. You're there for them. We feel the same way about our customers."

Chris, who hails from Cyprus, knows a thing or two about overachieving. In life, as in the restaurant business, "it's not about how big you are, it's about making the best use of what you've got. One look at the State of Israel will tell you that."

A quaint dining environment is a big plus — as are live music and belly dancing Friday and Saturday — but it's the cuisine that makes or breaks a restaurant. Here, Pan shines. They don't just serve Mediterranean food; they bring it to life. And in order to encourage their always-steady traffic flow to continue unabated, they have extended their highly popular Prix Fixe specials (lunch $15, dinner $25), which as of this writing were still available in addition to the regular menu.

The Christodoulous have spent most of their adult lives in the restaurant business, yet they've retained the youthful enthusiasm of their teens. "When it becomes a job, then it's time to get out," says Chris. "When you go home for dinner, is it acceptable for whoever's cooking to go through the motions? No. It's even less acceptable here. Anyone who walks in this door has chosen us, out of hundreds of other restaurants. That's a huge compliment and we will never it for granted."

New twist has Akropolis pies on upward spiral

Having your life spiral out of control isn't always a bad thing. Just ask Peter and Bill Gekas of Akropolis Pastries.

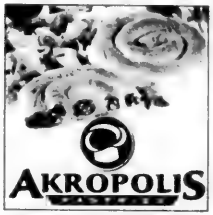
Involved since childhood in their parents' business (Akropolis Pastries at 708 Danforth Avenue), both boys took an adult hiatus to pursue other careers — Peter in teaching, Bill in operations management. During this period, while continuing to help out their parents, they watched the demand for Akropolis' handmade products grow to exceed supply and the ability to replenish it by traditional methods. Says Peter, "It occurred to us that if we could produce our pies on a larger scale without compromising quality, it might enable us to meet demand and create new markets for our products."

Extensive testing and tweaking led to a recipe that would allow them to produce their Spanakopita (Spinach/Feta), Tyropita (Feta/Ricotta), Kreatopita (Beef), and Bougatsa (Custard) pies in larger quantities with the same old-world quality and flaky pastry as the hand-made variety. They then had a brainstorm: Why not change the shape of things to come? Thus was born North America's first and only "twister": a signature swirl of proprietarily-prepared pastry that, much like a twister bagel, offers endless undulations to enjoy.

That's when things began to spiral out of control.

It didn't take long for the Gekas twister to whip up a tornado of wholesale activity. Pusateri's and Highland Farms quickly bought in, and other fine stores, including Whole Foods in the U.S., soon followed. Today, dozens of better food stores and restaurants proudly sell Akropolis' pies — in twister, mini rolls, and other formulations.

Further enhancing the line's appeal is the fact that all the pies are egg-free and trans-fat free, made with non-hydrogenated vegetable oil and unbleached flour. The combination of great taste, healthy ingredients and reasonable prices has proven irresistible to vendors and consumers alike.



STORE	FACTORY

The increased popularity of Akropolis' products has made staying ahead of the production curve a full-time job. Through constant machinery and equipment upgrades, the Gekas brothers have spared no expense to ensure a steady flow of supply to their eager clientele.

Akropolis' state-of-the-art factory in Scarborough is open to the public for large catering and party orders. The hubbub of production, however, is nowhere in evidence at the original Akropolis Pastries on the Danforth. At the little shop that Thomas and Aliki Gekas opened in 1979, nine years after immigrating from Thessaloniki, serenity is the rule. "Our parents are old-school," says Peter. "They sell our products but they still make all the sweet pastries by hand — the baklava, the galaktoboureko, the loukoumades, the kataifi."

At the pleasant, licensed Akropolis bakery restaurant, in addition to the pies, pastries and a variety of coffees, you can also enjoy a combination platter consisting of your choice of spinach, meat or cheese pie with a Greek salad and tzatziki for a mere $6. "We may be innovative, but our prices are retro," says Peter.

So the next time your hectic lifestyle has you spiralling out of control, head down to the Danforth or to your nearest fine food store for the antidote: another type of spiral that goes down smoother than a Scarlett O'Hara staircase.

Toronto East General's lifesaving commitment to community

Since 1994, the Taste of the Danforth has raised over $1,000,000 for the Toronto East General Hospital. Members of the GreekTown on the Danforth Business Improvement Association and their Chair Constantin Voidonicolas (third from right) recently visited the Hospital to celebrate the milestone.

There are bigger hospitals — but none more committed to serving the community and to saving lives.

Throughout its history, Toronto East General Hospital has earned a reputation as the quintessential community hospital. No other institution better exemplifies the cornerstones on which such a legacy is built: accessibility, personal connection with patients, and community outreach.

Ironically, the fact that TEGH doesn't "feel" like an institution may be its greatest appeal. That quality resonated with Teresa Vasilopoulos when she joined the TEGH team in 1995 with a view to giving back to a community she'd called home since early childhood.

Above and beyond the obvious opportunity to save lives by enabling the hospital to continue offering an exceptional quality of care, Vasilopoulos saw in TEGH a community spirit and a positive energy that transcended institutional boundaries. "It always felt more like a friendly neighbour who shows up when you really need them."

During her tenure at Toronto East General, Ms. Vasilopoulos has become known for her efficiency, approachability, geniality — and focus. "We're here to save lives. That's as basic as it gets. We need everybody rowing in the same direction."

Or, in the case of the bed race, running in the same direction. In its capacity as charity designate of the Pilaros Taste of the Danforth, TEGH gives new meaning to the term "active participation". Anyone who has witnessed the annual bed race has seen TEGH medical personnel display athletic prowess that makes the emergency medical teams on 24 and ER look like lollygaggers.

In 17 years since the inaugural Taste of the Danforth, the TEGH Foundation has received over one million lifesaving dollars, mostly in support of the TEGH Special Care Nursery. Further revenues from the Taste will go towards the $60 million in private sector funds required for a new $200,000,000 Patient Care Centre. Outpatient services will be consolidated on the first two floors and will see a significant increase in inpatient rooms.

The half million people in the TEGH's catchment area, consisting of some 70 distinct linguistic groups, were recently designated by the U.N. as one of Canada's most diverse communities. To the CJN's many readers for whom "None Is Too Many" is still front of mind, the embracing of minorities further enhances an already-appealing charity. A dynamic board of directors, including GreekTown icon Saul Korman, oversees a highly efficient and fully transparent growth process.

"Saul has been a marvellous spokesperson on all levels — for the hospital, for the Taste, and for the entire community," says Vasilopoulos. The synergy between these three elements makes the whole greater than the sum of its parts, she says. "We have a unique and very personal relationship with the people we serve, and that includes the merchants on the Danforth who go out of their way to help during the Taste. I know of no other scenario in which a hospital and its community are so closely connected by a major annual event."

Vasilopoulos and her family have experienced the myriad benefits of TEGH first hand. Her three children were born at TEGH, and she and her immediate family have personally been treated in enough of its departments that "we're running out of services to sample," she chuckles. On a serious note, Vasilopoulos says "this is one hospital where the physician who examines you in emergency is likely to be the one who performs your surgery." This continuity of care, she notes, gives patients an added comfort level and fosters relationship-building all round: between patient and physician, patient and hospital, physician and -hospital. "Nobody's a number here," says Vasilopoulos.

TEGH donors are made to feel that every dollar counts. The Foundation wants to ensure they never get that drop-in-the-bucket feeling. "We welcome donors to visit our hospital to see the results of their contribution with their own eyes. Our donors consistently tell us that they can see, touch and feel the difference their donation makes." And taste it — at the Pilaros Taste of the Danforth, where every bite they take helps save a life.

Team Bank of Montreal dashes down the Danforth in the 2009 Danforth Dash Bed Race

Two generations for one suits Korry's clientele jus

From the store that pioneered the two-for-one suit, we've always expected great value. But this two for one is priceless.

Actually, it's a three for one. Joining the father-son team of Saul and Michael Korman (60- and 27-year veterans of the clothing business, respectively), son Shawn makes it a hat trick.

There's nothing abrupt about this passing of the torch. In hockey parlance, you might say the wily old centreman continues to feed his two young wingers with deft passes, all the while imparting the knowledge and experience of six decades in the shmatah business.

For Shawn, joining the Korry's team after a career with the Teamsters Union — and a stint as a CEO and celebrity bodyguard — is a homecoming of sorts. "It's in my blood, I guess," he smiles. "I enjoyed my previous endeavours, but this is more than a livelihood; it's a legacy."

In keeping with the genealogical theme, today's clothing trends beg the question: Can a generation both lead and follow at the same time? The 50s comeback says yes. Remember those old plaids dad wore? The luxurious fabrics and classic styles that lasted forever and a day? They're back for fall, in a big way. Combine them with the ongoing slimming trend and you've got a look that's both timeless and trendy, says Michael Korman.

"You've got the glamour of the Bogey and Bacall era in slim, tapered cuts that accentuate a good physique and improve an average one. You've got pinstripes with panache — not just white and black, but a hint of seasonal colour like pink or green. It's a subtle twist that works well with a white shirt but is also sensational with pastels."

"When people look at you, they're looking at us"

In the summer palette, purple is prominent — the full gamut from lilac through mauve into indigo. Cool mint green also glimmers. For fall, ever-present staples black, gray and blue have been joined by a now almost-equal partner: dark brown.

"Again, it's the 50s renaissance," says Michael. "If you're a 50s baby, your dad probably owned at least one brown suit. Now you're him. That might not have been cool 40 years ago, but it is now. We're going back to basics."

In this case, says Michael, "basics" does not mean a lowering of the bar; quite the contrary. It means returning to the high standard of yesteryear, when suit and tie or jacket and tie was de rigueur in the professional workplace. Casual wear is still acceptable in most circles, he says, but only insofar as it conforms to a high standard of quality. Most power dressers will gravitate to suits and jackets, embracing the cashmeres, soft leathers and other luxurious fabrics that are coming back into style.

The veteran centre flanked by his wingers (l

Again, full circle. What's old is new again. With a difference: there's infinitely more variety now, in fabrics, styles and patterns, and more freedom to mix and match. The possibilities are endless — making all the more valuable a store that can help you run the gauntlet of choices and pick what's right for you.

A store with, say, several hundred years of experience on the floor at any given time. A store that won't let you leave looking like less than a million bucks.

"We don' low-grade It's not in c

"If you look like 900 thousand, we've failed," chirps Saul.

"It's advertising," offers Michael. "When people look at you, they're looking at us. Everyone who wears a Korry's suit is like a mobile ad for Korry's. I'd better not say that too loud," he grins, "or my customers will start asking for royalties." Most well-dressed wear their clothes like a badge of honour, notes Korman. It's empowerment like this, he says, that keeps the confidence flowing like water from the tap. "The statement you make is important to us. We're not going to rubber-stamp anything that just looks OK."

Nor will they leave any stone uncovered in conveying their message. Between them, Saul and Michael extol the virtues of Korry's on five radio stations. Any more carriers and their handful of detractors might be calling for a CRTC inquiry into too much Korman content. Saul's signature off-the-cuff style was reality radio two decades before the advent of reality TV. And, some would argue, told a better story. Most listeners love his spontaneity and frankness. A few grit their teeth. But they listen: no one's ever bored by a Korman spot. Many multinational corporations spending billions on ad campaigns wish they could say the same about their ads.

't sell a garment. our DNA"

"What's more interesting than the truth?" says Saul. "Nothing. Like the Pilaros Taste of the Danforth, doing so much good for charity. Started from nothing 17 years ago by people coming from a good place and now it's Canada's largest street festival. Right here on the Danforth. Now that's my street."

Over its six decades of existence, Korry's has become famous as a suit store. When Torontonians think suit, they think Korry's. This share of mind — and a level of service unparalleled in men's retail — has generated a volume of business that keeps seven full-time tailors busy onsite doing alterations and custom tailoring.

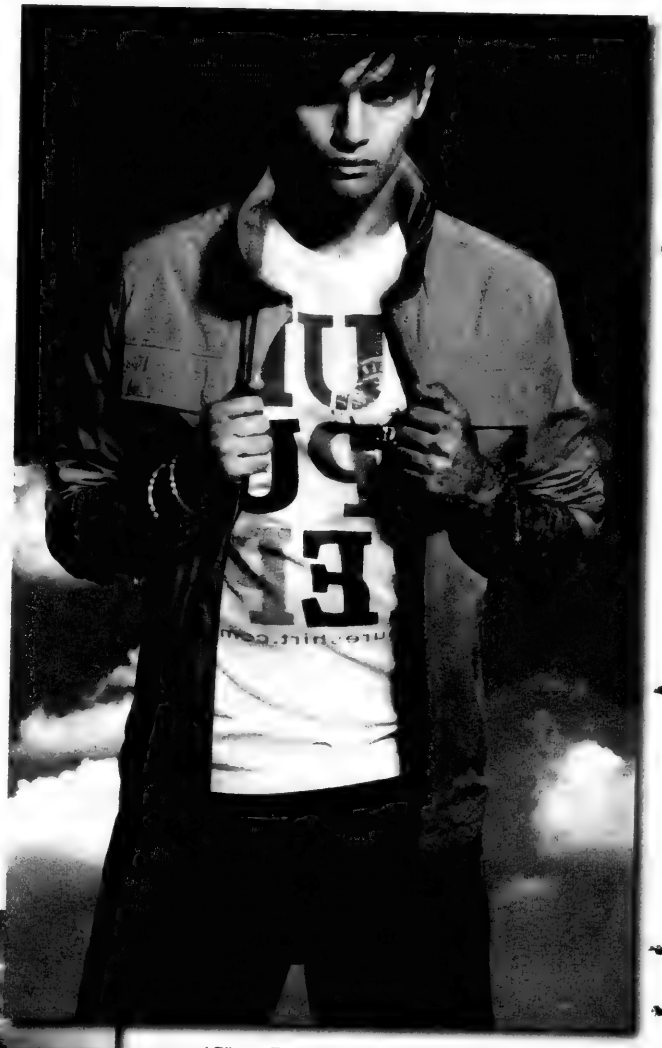
It's a suit store, to be sure — but casual wear, sportswear and accessories have been occupying an ever-increasing share of the mix. "We can outfit you from head to toe," says Michael. "If you wander around a shopping centre you might find some of the things you're looking for, but here everything's at your fingertips."

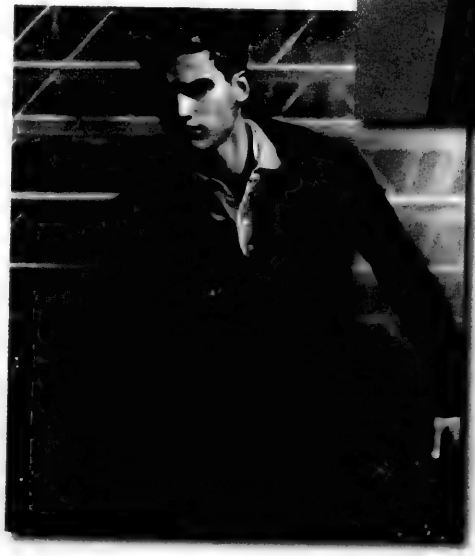
And — as Saul is quick to point out — who needs to wander around a mall looking for one good restaurant when you've got 100 good ones within a two-step on the Danforth? "You don't need to find a restaurant here," says Saul. "They find you."

What's on the menu at Korry's?

The Hugo Boss, Canali, Pal Zileri and Coppley collections anchor its high end, while its own Roberto label dominates the midrange. But don't think for a minute that taking advantage of the Roberto two for one means settling for second best. "'Proudly made in Canada and Italy still means something," says Saul. "That's what you get when you buy Roberto." Its quality, notes Shawn, rivals that of imports costing double the price. "We don't sell a low-grade garment," interjects Michael. "We can't. It's not in our DNA."

Korry's contributions to the sartorial splendour of Toronto men are mirrored by its contributions to the community. Its annual golf tournament — ably hosted this year by the Scarboro Golf and Country Club — raises significant funds for the Toronto East General Hospital Foundation, on whose board Saul serves. And his promotional efforts on behalf of the annual Pilaros Taste Of The Danforth, which to date has raised over $1,000,000 for the Toronto East General — are tireless. This, too, is part of the legacy Michael, and now Shawn, are inheriting.





While the old master may have lost a step — two double knee surgeries will do that to you — his passion for the menswear trade burns unabated. More than brand value, knowledge of fabrics and the art of fitting, it's that passion he most likes to impart — not only to his sons, but to other members of the Korry's team. "Love your trade, and it will love you back," he says. "If you're as excited about menswear as we are, you're a candidate to join our team."

With two generations of Kormans at the helm, that team never looked better — as will you when your menswear shopping brings you to Korry's. With constant reminders of its location emanating from your favourite radio station, it's certainly not hard to find. But, like your mother's noodging you to wear a sweater, the reminders just keep on coming. "Where? In the heart of GreekTown. At five six nine Danforth Avenue. And it's called....Korry's."

Music to a fashion maven's ears.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

City Pharmacy offers holistic approach

This pharmacy's a throwback.

If it wasn't so modern, orderly, and immaculate — and so environmentally friendly — it could be deemed an anachronism. A nostalgic reminder of an era in which the corner drugstore was operated by a compounding pharmacist who dispensed care and caring advice along with his custom remedies.

With the growth of the big chains, that modus operandi has become increasingly rare. Championing its renaissance is City Pharmacy Remedy'sRx, which nurtures relationships with patients through a highly informative, multidisciplinary approach.

That model appealed greatly to Malay Panchal, R.Ph., when he graduated from the University Of Toronto's prestigious School of Pharmacy. A visit to City Pharmacy at 238 Danforth Avenue quickly reveals his success in implementing an educational focus and his committment to parient care.

To measure City merely on the merits of its throwback qualities would be to minimize its scope, however. Here, expert advice streams you'd normally have to tap into and ferret out from a variety of disciplines, sources and places are consolidated under one modest roof.

Eliminating runaround. In addition to mainstream dispensing and medical advice, City Pharmacy provides basic naturopathic, holistic, and nutritional consultation. This multidisciplinary approach, says Panchal, enables patients "to compare medicinal and therapeutic alternatives in a more efficient and timely manner. It's much easier to digest information from one informed source than from many."

Panchal has studied natural medicine and is therefore well-positioned to offer patients this added layer of expertise. "It's our mandate to give parients as much relevant information as possible to assist them in making well-informed decisions."

Key to this approach, says Panchal, is that City Pharmacy treats each patient as an individual. "We do not subscribe to cookie-cutter solutions, nor do we have hidden agendas to recommend one product or procedure over another. We educate, provide information, and refer patients to the appropriate professionals as needed." Clearly this m.o. resonates with patients, many of whom come from outlying municipalities. Some even continue to rely on City Pharmacy after moving far from the GTA.

All of which is gratifying to Panchal. "Giving people health advice is a sacred trust," he opines. "Just like physicians, we are bound by an oath to heal the sick."

City Pharmacy is a designated Canadian Diabetes Association supply centre and is widely recommended by medical practitioners for whom the strong clinical backgrounds of City's pharmacists carries weight.

City Pharmacy offers several additional services, including:

- Free MedsCheck consultation as prescribed by the Ontario Ministry of Health and Long-Term Care;
- Diabetes and Cardiovascular education;
- Daily seniors discount;
- Free delivery throughout the GTA;
- Premium breast pumps and expertise in pre- and post-natal breastfeeding needs.
- Premium medical compression stockings with a certified fitter onsite;
- Onsite blister packaging.

City Pharmacy Remedy'sRx fills a valuable niche in the Danforth's increasingly health-centric west end. For those seeking a personal approach to their healthcare needs, it's just what the doctor ordered.

Thuna Herbals' past a beacon for future

It's a delightful anachronism reminiscent of an old English apothecary shop. Fifteen hundred glass jars, each filled with a different herb or root, stacked high in orderly rows. The original creaking hardwood floor. And a proprietor who's all about knowledge and caring.

Established in 1888 (how's that for history?), this family business is now run by Evelyn Dorfman, the granddaughter of founder Dr. Max Harriman Thuna, and a staff of qualified herbalists on the original turn-of-the-century premises at 298 Danforth Avenue.

Over the years, the Thuna family has seen the use of herbal remedies — once the de facto method of treatment for most medical problems — lose ground to the synthetic drugs that have flooded the marketplace.

More recently, however, the pendulum has slowly but surely begun to swing back, as more and more people seek alternatives to mainstream medicine. Thuna's doesn't diagnose problems presented to them; rather, they advise customers seeking a diagnosis to obtain it from their medical practitioners. Some come with the blessing of their GP, but many are referred by naturopathic practitioners. Typically, clients come in on their own initiative.

Saul Pasen helped pioneer herbalism in Canada

THUNA HERBALS

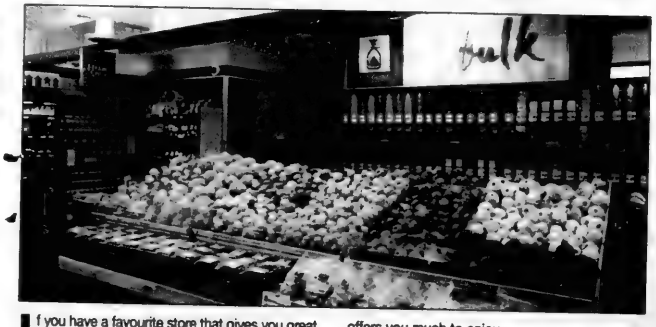
Drawing on their schooling, Dorfman and staff choose from some 2,000 herbs, berries, roots, and leaves the precise combination most likely to alleviate an ailment presented to them. To cite but one example, a formula for bladder infection, or even interstitial cystitis, might include uva-ursi leaves, buchu leaves, parsley leaves, marshmallow root, corn silk, and goldenseal leaves.

Dr. Thuna and his children, including son-in-law Saul Pasen, pictured above, helped pioneer herbalism in Canada.

The current premises stand as a rich reminder of Canadian history. Even if you have only a passing interest in herbalism, you owe it to yourself to visit this Toronto landmark. And who knows — by asking a few questions, you might become further enlightened on this ancient practice.

Big Carrot certified by Ecocert Canada: over 700 products and counting



If you have a favourite store that gives you great service, you tend to keep shopping there — especially when part of that service is the expert advice needed to make an informed purchase. The Big Carrot has become that destination store for an entire generation, and its customers have reciprocated with a level of loyalty unparalleled in the retail food business.

If you shop at The Big Carrot, you'll understand why it doesn't "feel" quite like any other store: it isn't. It's businesslike, but in no way "corporate"; the personal touch is ever-present. Because it's a worker-owned co-op, its members have an all-for-one and one-for-all attitude and never lose sight of the big picture: putting the customer first.

Ironically, in exemplifying the qualities typically associated with a small business, The Big Carrot has gotten bigger. Three separate expansions in the past 11 years have seen it almost double in space. Metropolitan Toronto's largest Canadian-owned purveyor of products for healthy living offers you much to enjoy.

The Big Carrot is really three stores in one: a health food store and market; a holistic dispensary; and an organic juice, coffee and sandwich bar. It caters to a loyal clientele that embraces both its ethos and its products: minimally processed, organically grown, cruelty free, environmentally safe and, increasingly, non-GMO. Many of these products are also Kosher-certified.

Health-conscious customers seek out The Big Carrot for its extensive organic fruit and vegetable department (over 100 varieties at peak season) and its unmatched selection of organic bulk foods, dairy products, frozen foods, and packaged goods. Its extensive body care department boasts Canada's widest selection of personal care products for the entire family, including baby.

On June 30, 2009, the Organic Products Regulations (OPR) came into effect, making the new Canadian Organic Standards (COS) mandatory. The OPR legally requires organic products to be certified according to the COS if they are traded across provincial or international borders or use the long-anticipated Canada Organic Logo. This label is your assurance that the product bearing it has met the Canadian government's regulatory requirements for organic products.

The Big Carrot was one of Canada's first retailers to certify to the new Canadian Organic standard, underscoring its 26-year commitment to good organic stewardship. Ecocert Canada has certified The Big Carrot to process and package over 700 organic products in its juice bar, bulk, spice, cheese and produce departments. The vegetarian deli is in the process of being certified as well.

Retailer certification is not required by the CFIA, but at The Big Carrot it is seen as an important part of preserving the integrity of the entire supply chain. "We see our certification as our responsibility, to both our producers and our customers, to ensure that the hard work of the organic farmer is being preserved," notes Big Carrot Standards coordinator Maureen Kirkpatrick.

For natural and organic pastas, breads, buns, bagels, flatbreads, cookies, muffins, and other wholesome nosherie, no other store — or bakery, for that matter — even comes close. There are literally dozens of choices here, many of them wheat-free, dairy-free, Kosher-certified — or a combination thereof. Rudi's organic Kosher breads have been a hit for their incredible flavour and moisture.

Other Kosher-certified products, to name but a few: Sunflower Kitchen dips, pesto and soups; Imagine Foods Tetra Pack Dairy-Free Soups (the ultimate in convenience); Nature's Path Organic Cereals; Organic Meadow Yogurts & Pressed Cheese; Amy's soups, pizzas and frozen entrées; Enjoy Life Nut and Gluten Free Cereals, Cookies and Snack Bars; and an immense variety of chips and other snack foods.

The Big Carrot houses Toronto's only 100% organic juice bar. There are over 50 choices of juices, blender drinks, nutritional boosts, shakes, and fair-trade organic coffees, as well as sandwiches and other treats. The Deli counter offers more than 50 mouthwatering selections, both hot and cold.

The Big Carrot has remained the leader in an increasingly crowded field by offering products that are as good for the environment as they are for its customers, and by providing a level of expertise and personal service unmatched in the industry. It also demonstrates its environmental friendliness by heating its water tank by solar panels.

Through its ongoing expansion, The Big Carrot has retained the humility and friendliness of its early years. This is a store that's down to earth in every possible sense, and a real pleasure to visit. It's an oasis of calm amid the chaos of everyday life. A visit here isn't just grocery, supplement and cosmetics shopping; it's a balm to the spirit.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Erietta's magic angle on fashion

It's magic.

Nothing else explains how this little bird's nest of a shop gives its customers so much latitude to spread their wings.

Cornering the Carrot Common with uncommonly good taste for 18 years, Erietta ushers in its Chai anniversary the same way it began — radiating a special energy within and without.

To behold its obtuse-angled, picture-windowed frontage is to feel its ethereal magnetism. Those within a 50-foot radius who are possessed of a visual aesthetic are irresistibly drawn to it. From this sunny spot, traffic-stopping window displays are a fresh-daily event.

Even its caretaker — savvy fashion retailer Erietta Gatos — can't fully explain the phenomenon. "I didn't make the window; I just dress it."

Too modest. Did Dégas fabricate his canvasses? No, he just painted them. "And gave wings to his subjects' feet," laughs Erietta — admitting, in the same breath, that she got her start in fashion selling dance shoes. Some 26 years later, with the help of an inspired staff, she's still helping customers take flight.

Sassy dresses from Sweet Chemise; fine knits from ça va de soi; vintage-inspired collections from Free People, including Lisa Brooks jewellery; spirited separates from Dex, Mexx, and others...Erietta's selections make a visual impact without appreciably impacting your bottom line.

To Erietta's coterie of loyal clients, her buying acumen is legendary. "She's a mindreader," says one. "A visionary," coos another. To Erietta, however, her "mystique" is humanistically- and holistically-based.

"A garment is more than a piece of fabric held together by buttons and thread," she says. "It's a living, breathing entity created by an artist, to dress you — not a mannequin. When it's right for you — when you're the woman he envisioned in it — it becomes part of you. It is you. You know it as soon as you lay eyes on it. You just know."

Erietta

Erietta needs to have that "just know" feeling before her customers do. She enjoys her buying forays, but they're working holidays. She's a fashion shadchan, and the matchmaking mojo is always front of mind. "This garment for that client," she smiles. "If I can't see one of my customers in it, I don't buy it."

Speaking of made for one another, no discussion of Erietta Boutique is complete without a mention of Erietta's late husband, Jim, whose passing in a 2007 car accident left a void Erietta still struggles to fill. To meet him once was to be instantly touched by his innate good nature and lack of ego. "He was totally supportive of my ambition and my pamossse," says Erietta. "I honour his memory by continuing to give one hundred percent every day. When I make the shop beautiful for my customers, I'm also doing it for him. I know he's watching."

Inside, clients never cease to be amazed at the expansive aura of this tiny space. "Your surroundings feel as big or as small as the energy you create," smiles Erietta. "A small, bright balcony can be less confining than a dark auditorium." Likewise for the contents of that space: "a handful of the right pieces gives you a better selection than dozens of the wrong ones."

As a fashion retailer, the magical matchmaking of client with garment — and the subsequent spreading of wings — is Erietta's biggest source of pride.

Quality and style at a fitting price in a Blue Shoe Box

That's the store we're talking about; we haven't even slipped on a shoe yet!

Fortuitously, the shoes offered here are the aesthetic equal of the shop that sells them. In 2002 proprietor Eliséo (Tony) Staffiere opened The Blue Shoe Box at 499 Danforth just west of Logan. A second location soon followed at 693 Queen Street West.

The Danforth store occupies a diminutive space, but its design is magical. The elongated, reed-thin premises — conceivably a metaphor for a long, slender foot — have an architectural history. An intricately moulded 120-year-old copper ceiling soars over cappuccino spaccoed walls, exposed red brick, butterscotch oak shelving and a gleaming hardwood floor.

The Blue Shoebox
499 Danforth Ave. 416-289-6727
693 Queen St. W. 416-366-6727
www.theblueshoebox.ca

A background in retail footwear is a prerequisite for any fine shoestore, but Staffiere's background goes one step further. His father and grandfather were both shoemakers in their native Italy, and the considerable knowledge he acquired from them by osmosis was later augmented by his own experience in shoe manufacturing.

That means the quality you buy at The Blue Shoe Box comes with the assurance of a perfect fit backed by years of expertise. From the made-in-Italy Johnston & Murphy shoes for men to Mephisto, Pikolinos, Arche, Born, Josef Seibel and other fine lines for both men and women, the Blue Shoe Box carries quality and quality only.

You expect to pay a premium for these famous brand names, but you won't — at least not at The Blue Shoe Box. "You may pay more in other areas, but not on the Danforth and certainly not on Queen Street," says Staffiere. (The Blue Shoe Box rarely has sales, but when they do you're well-advised to make a beeline for the Queen Street store. "All women want slim, elegant feet; no one, male or female, wants inflated prices", smiles Staffiere.

Today's men and women, he notes, want it all: quality, style, and comfort at reasonable prices. "You wear a pair of shoes more than any outfit. Most people put more miles on their shoes than on their car," he smiles. "All the more reason to be good to your feet."

If the shoe fits, wear it. More and more Torontonians are finding that fit at the right price in a Blue Shoe Box.

Salon takes the slow lane to rapid growth

If you're a client of a hair salon with a small, attentive staff, you might have mixed feelings about it experiencing spectacular growth. Will it still give you the same attention and personal service? Or will you just become a number?

bob + paige SALON

bobandpaige.com

If you're a client of bob + paige Salon, those questions don't even cross your mind. You know they're going to treat you the same way today as on your last visit and on the visit before that: with full attentiveness and full focus.

It's precisely because of how Frank Calandrino, Violet Volovik and staff treat their customers — devoting as much time as it takes to ensure your hairstyle is a work of art — that they've experienced such explosive growth.

"After two years we're at year five of our five-year plan," says Frank. "It's very flattering, and a little scary."

The clientele who followed F and V to bob & paige — and the new clients who've come on board since it opened — enjoy the mix of high energy and relaxed pace in this exquisitely nouveau-retro setting. It's a refreshing alternative to the hair-styling "factories" that dazzle you with pizzazz, noise and loud music, only to assembly-line you through their system and whisk you out the door before you know what hit you — and your hair.

"We're not into the numbers game — never will be," says Frank. Acknowledging that they've received offers to open additional salons elsewhere, he says they will never jeopardize or sacrifice the personal relationships they develop with customers.

Growing and nurturing relationships in the community is also important to F and V, who support a number of local charities and enjoy excellent relations with neighbouring businesses and residents.

Staying in the slow lane means that standard services which are extras elsewhere — like a deep scalp massage before your styling — are still standard. "You don't build by subtracting," says Volovik. Au contraire, new services and treatments are added as they become available and prove beneficial. One example is Keratin Complex, a highly effective hair smoothing and defrizzing technique in which all of bob + paige's stylists are trained. The salon also carries industry-leading hair care products and Ego, the Rolls Royce of blowdryers. (It may be the only Ego you'll encounter in this modest, down-to-earth group).

Bob + paige's visual cachet earned it Salon Magazine's prestigious Salon Interior Design Award. A major renovation synergizes the warmth of exposed red brick and the coolness of steel and slate gray, offset by earthy brown tones and offwhite tiles. But the transformation Calandrino and Volovik made to the premises pales in comparison to what they'll do with your hair — if you'll sit back and let them.

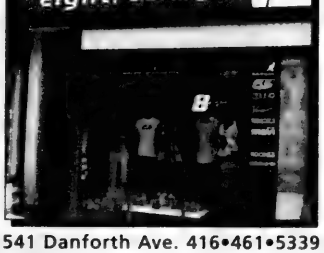
Volovik works best when given freedom to create. Accordingly, many of their customers limit their directions to "make me look beautiful".

Though the salon counts celebrities among its clients, they don't engage in name-dropping, and they treat every customer with the same reverence and respect. You'll never get bumped or lost in overbooking hell, and punctuality's a priority.

Descending these few steps remains an uplifting experience.

Eighth wonder of the fashion world

If your fashion shopping brings you to Eight, you've definitely arrived. The fashions are hot, the music is hip, the service warm and personal. Using a formula that's 20 parts Queen Street urban chic, 40 parts Bloor Street style and 100 parts fashion flair — at très friendly prices — Eight flat-out rocks.



541 Danforth Ave. 416•461•5339

Can a store be stroller-friendly, yet still cater to a mature crowd? Eight does. Here, women and men of all ages coexist and co-shop not just peacefully, but gleefully. Eight short years after Eight's touchdown in GreekTown, fashion shoppers city-wide continue to feel its vibe.

Part of Eight's special energy emanates from owner Karin Kassabian, whose expertise and unassuming demeanour resonate with customers. "We operate on a 100 percent comfort zone, not 99 percent," she says.

This comfort level extends to fitting, where K's keen eyes ensure that you'll look great in whatever garment you try on — or it won't leave the shop with you.

Eight is particularly popular among women in the 25-50 age group, though everyone from 16 to 66 feels at home here. Eight's target market is "anyone who wants to look good and feel good," says K. And anyone who's digitally inclined will enjoy connecting with Eight on their informative and up-to-the-minute Facebook page.

Eight is living proof that high enthusiasm can be combined with a laid-back approach. "Buying clothing is one activity you cannot enjoy unless you're comfortable with the salesperson," says K. "Period."

Though Eight carries scads of hip denim, it's much more than a jeans store. From hot mainstream styles to beyond-the-edge, Eight carries the later-than-latest in casual clothing from Italy, Amsterdam and other European fashion hotbeds — think Milan style meets London swank — as well as carefully selected domestic fashions from promising new designers like Mark Foreman.

Because Kassabian's buying is intensely personal — "I wear what I sell" — you won't find Eight's pieces all over town. This suits K and her clientele just fine. "My taste may take me out on a limb, but lots of people have climbed onto that limb with me."

Her recommendations carry weight. Customers have been know to have a fashion "epiphany" as the result of a Kassabian-recommended outfit they'd never have dreamed of trying on their own.

K buys with a view not only to style but also to transitional value. "If you really love a piece, you'd like it to carry from season to season insofar as possible," she says.

Obviously, Kassabian feeds off customer satisfaction. "I want you to leave smiling," she grins.

We are. Must have been something we eight.

GreekTown on the Danforth: Canadian heritage in the making

More than a tourist area, GreekTown on the Danforth is a community. In the summer, when the trees reach their full green and Toronto's restauranteurs put out their patio tables, GreekTown puts on its Mediterranean face.

Here, when friends and acquaintances greet, you are as likely to hear "Kall' imera! Ti kanis?" as "Hi! How are you?" In the restaurants and cafés, you hear patrons converse in every language of the world.

While the music of Greek polysyllables will appeal to your ears, the most important thing is not the language, but the fact that people do greet each other. Bustling and busy as the community is, everyone — not just tourists, but everyone who lives and works here — is as liable to stroll as to hurry.

There is plenty on the Danforth to woo your senses, and make you want to slow your steps: bright color and exotic decor; the sounds of the bouzouki; the aroma of lamb souvlaki wafting from a grill; and the tastes of exotic foods. It is the restaurants above all — and the atmosphere they help create, at once lively and relaxed — which draw people from all over the city and beyond.

Alexander The Great Parkette at Danforth and Logan: a popular spot to pause, relax, and reflect

Plenty to woo your senses

Many restaurants capture, in their decor, the pleasing colours and terraced style associated with the Greek islands and mountainsides. And while souvlaki is everywhere on the Danforth, its dining establishments take pride in offering the full range and flavours of Greek and other Mediterranean cuisines.

But the Danforth boasts many other fine ethnic restaurants as well. To name but a few, Japanese, Italian, and East Indian cuisine are well represented. And its cafés and dessert houses are unparalleled, both in number and quality.

GreekTown is also home to Toronto's finest natural and specialty food stores and many alternative health practitioners. And it's become a leading fashion destination, with a host of fine specialty boutiques for men, women, and children, as well as European-quality beauty salons and spas.

There is plenty of live entertainment here. At many establishments, audience participation is the rule, though after a fine, full meal, you may feel disinclined to dance on a tabletop.

There are a few other Toronto streets which are wider in actual metres, but the Danforth has an expansive feel about it which you don't find anywhere else. Majestic trees shade well-kept homes; here and there are streetside parks, where you can sit and rest your feet.

If you look closely, you see there is a solid community here. You see not only the tourists, but also the elderly and the children, as they shop, stroll or sit and chat in the cafés and parks. In the restaurants, waiters and bartenders offer everyone prompt, friendly service; there are plenty of regular guests whom they greet by name.

Nor is it just staff who do this. You will see the owners showing guests to their tables, greeting them warmly; in GreekTown, customers are family.

Also here are the institutions that belong in any healthy city neighborhood: schools, houses of worship, clubs, and community centres. People not only work here, they live here; and it is in great part because they keep GreekTown pleasant to live in, that it is pleasant to visit.

If you really want to get to know the community, chat a little with the staffs of different restaurants; you'll find that everyone knows everyone else. There is plenty of competition here, but it is friendly. To thrive, a restauranteur has to cherish the firm conviction that his or her establishment is the best; but in GreekTown, they do so without knocking the competition. If anything, the reverse is true.

A solid community with solid values

It is from this wealth of restaurants that the "Taste of the Danforth" festival was born. This annual event has become so popular that GreekTown is closed to traffic for its duration. It's a great opportunity to sample the Danforth's culinary delights while enjoying its ambience, all in support of worthy charities like the Toronto East General Hospital Foundation.

While the Danforth is a community, it has never been a closed enclave. Saul Korman of Korry's Clothiers, an active member of the Jewish community, is also an enthusiastic promoter of GreekTown. Having been there for half a century — Korry's is now celebrating its 50th anniversary — Korman knows the people of this community, many of whom started as dishwashers and short-order cooks in the '50's and '60's, then opened the first modest Greek restaurants in the '70's. Many of them came here seeking both prosperity and freedom; the late Andreas Papandreou (a recent Prime Minister of Greece) lived in Canada from 1969 to 1974.

Korman shares with the people who live and work on the Danforth their joy in the prosperity and freedom of Canada. If you come to GreekTown, you are breathing, hearing and tasting Canadian heritage — not in a museum, but as contemporary history in the making.

"Friendly Greek" more than a name

One visit to The Friendly Greek should be enough to convince you that the "Friendly" isn't just a buzzword.

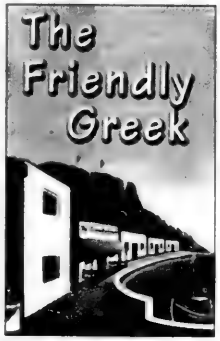
It's "Friendly" as in the way you're greeted when you enter the restaurant. "Friendly" as in the courteous service you receive throughout your visit from servers who really know how to treat you and who understand the menu.

"Friendly" as in the large bowl of superb sesame seed garlic bread that's plunked on your table — no charge! — with your meal selection.

"Friendly" as in the relaxed atmosphere and inviting decor (a colourful panorama of white stuccoed walls painted with seascapes and other Greek scenes).

"Friendly" as in the huge outdoor patio that rubs shoulders with the Danforth.

Last but not least, "Friendly" as in prices. It's really quite incredible what you get here for your dining dollar. In the best Danforth tradition, portions are huge, yet many entrées are priced under $12. Many appetizers are still under $5, and you can order a bottle of wine from the extensive wine list for as little as $19.95. Side orders are so reasonably priced you'll think you're in a time warp.



551 Danforth Ave.

The Friendly Greek exemplifies the qualities the Danforth has become famous for: traditional Greek food, huge portions, and people who serve you as if you were family — because, during your visit, you are.

Included among the entrées are authentic Greek recipes like Loukaniko, a delicious Homemade Wine Sausage (two pieces) served with Greek salad, rice, roast potatoes, tzatziki and garlic bread, all for only $11.95; Ofto Kleftico (roast lamb the Friendly Greek way), prepared oil-free and served with Greek salad, roast potatoes, rice and garlic bread, only $13.95.

For a heavy-duty feast, try another Friendly Greek house specialty: the Hot Piklia For Two, with two pieces of lamb chops, two pieces of quail, one chicken filet, roast lamb, two pieces of seftalia, two pieces of biftekia, served with Greek salad, side order of roast potatoes, rice and garlic bread, all for only $38.95. (Your odds of actually finishing this mammoth platter are about the same as the Maple Leafs going undefeated in 08-09).

You can't go wrong in life being friendly, and you can't go wrong in GreekTown at The Friendly Greek.

Historical flavours come alive at Messini

When visiting most websites, you're tempted to "Skip Intro" as prompted. You want to get to the heart of the matter ASAP.

Visit Messini's website, however, and you'll find yourself engrossed in the historical introduction; at Messini, history is at the heart of the matter.

A sequence of richly-textured, sepia-toned photographs of the southern Greek village of Messini, circa 1930, set the historical stage for the taste treat you'll experience at 445 Danforth.

After 23 years of restauranteuring in Europe, owner Marinos Dafnas opened Messini with the singular goal of elevating gyros preparation to the lofty level it enjoys in Greece. If you know gyros only as meat on a pita, Messini will open your eyes — and your taste buds — to an exciting new dining experience.

So how does the Messini version of gyros rise above the rest?

- Meticulous preparation. Roasted to perfection on a spit, the gyros (pronounced yee'-ros, from Modern Greek gyros, "turning") combines the finest marinated cuts of moist and dry meat to ensure that it retains its juiciness and tenderness throughout the cooking process. Unlike your typical fast-food gyros, Messini's are prepared fresh from scratch: no freezing, no precooking;
- Quality and freshness of trimmings. The tzatziki, red onions, parsely, spices, and French fries (as per Greek tradition), like the meat, are all up-to-the-minute fresh;
- Pita made fresh daily on the premises. As with any fresh homemade bread vs. mass-produced, there's simply no comparison.
- Variety. Messini caters to a wide range of palates and dietary preferences by offering chicken and vegetarian gyros in addition to the traditional meat.

The result: a whole that's greater than the sum of its parts — a sandwich that melts in your mouth with a rich blend of subtly interwoven flavours.

The prices are more than reasonable, with gyros dinner entrées starting from $9.25, lunch specials from $6.50. The menu also includes mainstream Greek selections, but you'll do yourself a disservice if you don't at least try the gyros.

Messini's immaculate interior flanks an open kitchen. Pleasant brown and cream tones — gleaming ceramic tile floor, rich wood trim and comfortable seating — create an aura of casual dining elegance.

The beaches of Peloponessos may seem far away, but at Messini, some of southern Greece's best tradition and culture is right here for the sampling.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Thessaloniki, in northern Greece, is the country's second largest city and the capital of Macedonia. It retained a Jewish majority for centuries and has rich Sephardic origins.

Greeks with a Taste for building something bigger than themselves

Circa 447–432 B.C., the Greeks built the Parthenon. Today, the same tradition of architectural excellence is alive and well in GreekTown, under the watchful eyes of Takis Liris, Adonis Artemakis, and their dedicated crew. The showcase of their efforts is a small, nondescript storefront at 921 Danforth Avenue.

A storefront on Danforth Avenue? A showcase for architectural excellence?

No towering columns? No sculpted statues?

A different kind of architectural renaissance

If the venue seems odd, it's because this team of "architects" specializes in historical reconstruction — not of buildings, but of people. Under their direction, a team of volunteers helps those laid low by alcohol and drug addiction to rebuild their lives and self-esteem and become functioning members of society.

With financial assistance from Employment Ontario and the City of Toronto — as well as funds generated from the sale of clothing donations to the Oasis green bins throughout the GTA — the Oasis Movement acts as an umbrella organization for a myriad of programs designed to assist addicts every step of the way through the recovery process. There's an Employment Preparation Program, a Pre-Employment Personal Life Management Program, a Volunteer Program including participants from Toronto Social Services and the general public, a Job Development and Employment Placement Services Program, Casual Labour Placements, and the Oasis Employment Resource Centre.

Building is nothing new to Artemakis. A fireplug of a man, he has been instrumental in many important initiatives both inside and outside the Greek community. In 1993 he was involved in changing the name of the then Danforth Village to the current GreekTown On The Danforth. The following year, Artemakis and several other key players — including Stephane Abbat, Dr. Andy Syriopoulos, Sue Graham-Nuttier, and Saul Korman — spearheaded the creation of the Taste of the Danforth. The financial support of title sponsors Krinos Foods (1994–2008) and Pilaros International Trading (2009–2010) — plus the ongoing contributions of many others — has enabled the Taste to grow from a small festival with a first-year attendance of some 6,000 to what today is North America's largest street festival with an annual attendance in excess of one million.

Despite his key role in heightening the profile of Toronto's Greek community and its important contributions to the GTA's culture and economy, Artemakis sees the Danforth as "a multicultural community with a Greek character. The beauty of a cultural mosaic is that each culture or "tile" enhances the others," he says. "We have here a dynamic of mutual enrichment that all communities should be proud to be part of."

If the growth of the Taste makes him smile, the work he and Takis Liris are involved in at Oasis makes him positively light up. Says Liris, who founded the Oasis Movement in 1992, "To assist someone who is already on an upcurve is nice. But to help someone who's down pick himself up — now there's an accomplishment. We may think we know what it's like to hit rock bottom, but unless we've experienced it ourselves or seen it first-hand, we really don't know what it's like. When we can reach out to someone in that position and help him or her regain the ability to function, be gainfully employed, mend broken relationships, restore their faith — that's a success story for everybody."

The birth of an area, the Taste, a movement

Continues Artemakis, who's been involved with Oasis since 1992 in a supportive and Advisory capacity, "There's no stage here, no award presentations, no trophies. Everyone who is here is part of something bigger than themselves. People talk of "relationship building". Here, we are helping people rebuild their relationship with themself. No office tower, theatre or concert hall is a greater monument to a person's accomplishment than helping another human being get back on his feet again."

Once upon a time in Vragiana: a modern Greek odyssey

They are unrelated by blood, but consider themselves mispocheh.

Between them, they own four Danforth businesses: three restaurants and one convenience store.

But this story — a modern Greek odyssey — is not about what these establishments are doing or where they're going. It's about where they've come from.

It's not about the business acumen of this "extended family", it's about their family acumen.

It's about a hometown bond so strong that the promise of a better life in Canada was superseded only by the prospect of a better life together.

In the same neighbourhood.

On the same street.

In the same business. (Except for the variety store, which adjoins and, technically, lies within one of the restaurants).

In GreekTown, this story is not atypical. Many Greeks immigrated to Canada in the 50s and 60s, worked hard — not just in GreekTown, but wherever they could find gainful employment — and their family followed. Sometimes blood relations, sometimes hometown friends — but always, family.

Good luck finding Vragiana (last recorded population 124) on a map without a computer

Good luck finding Vragiana on a map if you don't have access to a computer. Situated in the province of Karditsa, some 300 km northwest of Athens, this town — last recorded population 124 souls — was home in the 1950s to Peter Hadjis, Nick Babatsikos, and Alex Antaras. Today — together again, some 8,000 km across the pond — they ply their parnosse a few blocks apart from each other in GreekTown. All that's changed is the country code.

The first to leave was Hadjis, who moved to Athens in 1962. Nick and Eleftheria Babatsikos followed Hadjis to Athens in 1964 and worked with him there in the hotel and restaurant business. Alex and Eva Antaras immigrated directly to Canada in 1967, where Alex found work in Loew's Westbury Hotel.

Hadjis came to Canada in 1965, joining Antaris at Loew's soon after. Nick Babatsikos followed in 1967, and soon opened Dionysus Restaurant.

Lambros and Frank Babatsikos, weaned on the restaurant business since early childhood, took a brief sabbatical from Dionysus to open a café in Athens in 1996, but returned to Canada in 1998. Obviously, they missed home cooking.

In 1983, Hadjis opened the Palace Restaurant on Pape. In 1987 Alex Antaras, wife Eva and son Chris opened Detroit Eatery at 389 Danforth. In 1999, Lambros and Frank Babatsikos opened Café 521 at 521 Danforth, while brother Jim opened Lucky Spot Main at 521a.

The three restaurants are as different as night and day. The Palace Restaurant offers traditional Greek fine dining. Detroit Grill serves breakfast, burgers, and casual food. Café 521 is a bar and café serving light meals.

You expect wonderful food when you come to GreekTown. But more than the food, what draws many Torontonians — and the Jewish community in particular — here is the family values, says Saul Korman of Korry's Clothiers. "We see families working together, families who came here with nothing and turned it into something. In that respect, we see ourselves."

Having worked side by side and developed friendships with all three original Vrgagianans and their families, Korman is considered an honourary member of their fraternity. "We're going to give him the key to Vragiana," chuckles Peter Hadjis, "once the city can afford to make one. Maybe in another 20 years."

Or maybe when the rest of Vragiana's dwindling adult population moves here. Alas, it's an unlikely scenario. As newer generations emerge with a myriad of opportunities their parents didn't have, stories like the Vragiana Connection grow fewer and further between. .

But the children involved are all happy with their lot, and none think in terms of "missed opportunities." Working with his parents came naturally, says John Hadjis. "My parents never forced me to work in this business. I just did it and I enjoy it," he says.

The ongoing hometown reunion that sees these three families greet every new Danforth day in the same neighbourhood is a bond to be celebrated and savoured. "To come from the same tiny place, cross an ocean and wind up a few blocks apart is pretty special", says Lambros Babatsikos. He and wife Vicky are young enough to see the future, but old and wise enough to realize that value of communicating this heritage to their children. "Tradition takes many forms," he says. "This many not meet the classical definition of tradition, but it is tradition."

Brother Jim who with wife Maria is also raising a young family, concurs. "And you can't beat the travel time to your parents' place", he laughs, referring to the omnipresence of Nick and Eleftheria, who are usually on the premises or nearby.

"We're going to give him the key to Vragiana...once the city can afford to make one"

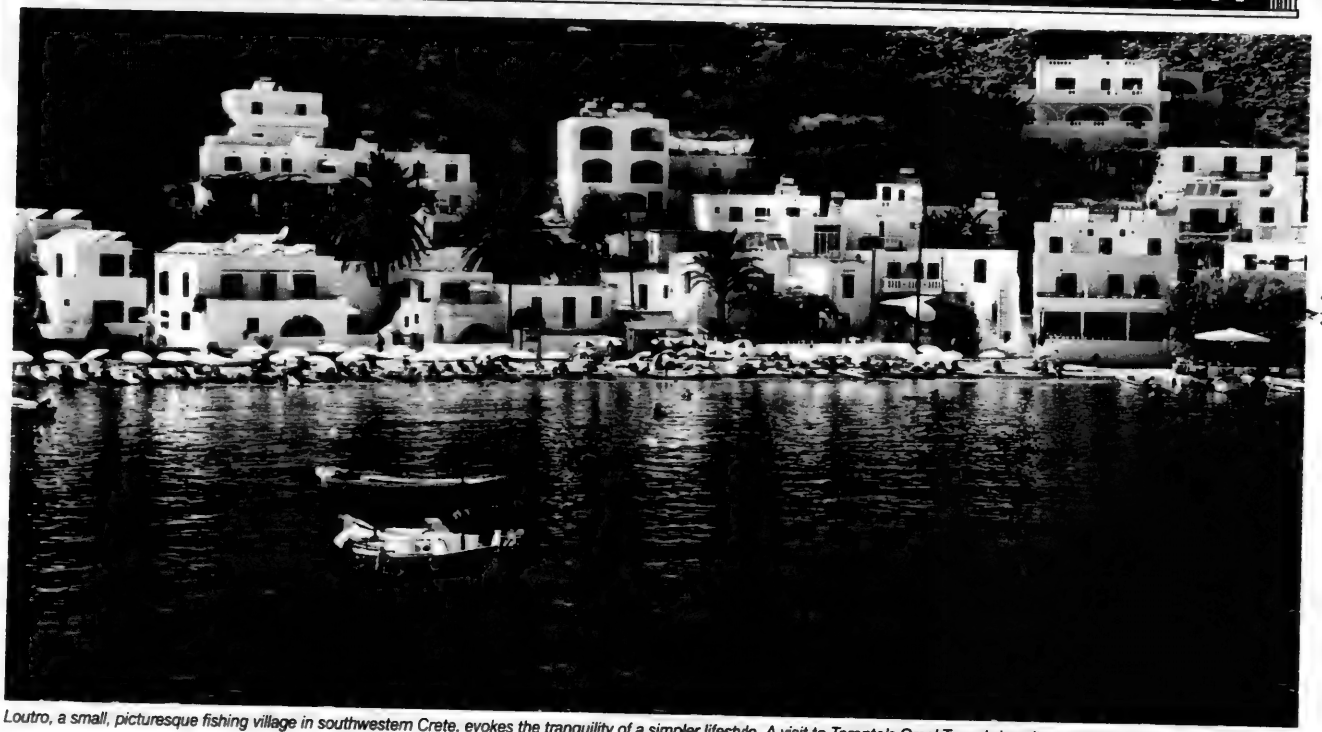
Chris Antaras echoes that sentiment. "I don't need to get in the car or pick up the phone to speak to my Mom or Dad, he says. "I just need to speak. They're often in the same room."

While it's become fashionable for successive younger generations to want to do their own thing, the Vragiana trio saved their children the burden of choosing a vocation, says Frank Babatsikos. "We never saw a career counsellor," he laughs. "We didn't need to. Our career was ready-made."

As these Vragianans show, home is where your mispocheh is. And knowing thyself is knowing the difference between wanting to do your own thing and being a slave to ambition. For what nobler ambition can there be than loyalty to family and friends — for being there for them and with them, whether it means travelling across an ocean or staying exactly where you are?

Once upon a time in Vragiana...

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH



Loutro, a small, picturesque fishing village in southwestern Crete, evokes the tranquility of a simpler lifestyle. A visit to Toronto's GreekTown brings its warmth and values closer to home.

Why good things happen in GreekTown

It's around this time, leading up to the Pilaros Taste of the Danforth, that some Toronto neighbourhoods not named GreekTown start exhibiting symptoms of mild discomfort. This malaise, first observed in 1994 — the year of the inaugural Taste of the Danforth — could best be termed GreekTown Envy.

If you're in business, it's only natural to admire the success of your competitors and attempt to emulate it. And make no mistake about it — neighbourhoods do compete for your shopping, dining and entertainment dollar. There are BIAs (Business Improvement Areas) all over Toronto racking their brains at this very moment in an attempt to attract you to their neighbourhood and secure your patronage.

From the Taste to My Big Fat Greek Wedding, GreekTown's good mojo casts a welcoming net

The resounding annual success of the Taste — Canada's largest street festival — speaks to GreekTown's penchant for making good things happen. It took a few big thinkers to get the ball rolling back in 1994, and it's taken plenty of sponsorship and grassroots support since then to sustain the momentum. Without the collective will of everyone involved, even the biggest of ideas goes nowhere.

Most other neighbourhoods give GreekTown its due. Those that don't — the GreekTown wannabees — will tell you that the Taste Of The Danforth could have happened anywhere.

That's not the point. The point is, it happened in GreekTown. It happened in GreekTown not only because of the energetic forward thinkers who conceived it, but also because of the fertile soil in which they planted their seed. It happened in GreekTown because the welcoming spirit of the restaurants and shops from Broadview to Jones is precisely the kind of environment that allows such an undertaking to flourish.

Street festivals are a source of food, fun, and family entertainment. When you can parlay all that into significant financial support for a community hospital (Toronto East General), you're accomplishing something special.

So, it's no accident that the Taste of the Danforth originated here. Nor is it surprising that the exuberant 2002 hit movie My Big Fat Greek Wedding chose to shoot some scenes here. The festive spirit of a community capable of lavishing affection on its guests — and laughing at itself — attracts positive energy. The area's increasing ethnocultural diversity and cosmopolitan flavour merely enhance its appeal.

It's a big world we live in. Whether you're five or 55, if you dropped everything right now and spent the rest of your days travelling this planet, you'd barely begin to cover it. Even if you confined your travels to a much smaller area — like Greece — you would experience a small part, at best, of its wonders.

You can't know the entire planet, but a visit to GreekTown will get you off to a running start.

In this thouliamou, they don't count the hours

Thouliamou. Parnosse. Livelihood. It's what most of us are lucky to have. And what most of us still complain about in our weaker moments.

The most common complaint is long hours. For many of us, 12- or 15-hour days mean overtime. For the average GreekTown restauranteur, they're standard time.

For most of us, one a.m. and unable to sleep means it's time to take a sedative. For the GreekTown restauranteur, it means it's time to serve another customer.

Long hours? Long days? These people eat long days for breakfast.

In fact, some of their days are so long, they finish up just in time to see their children eat breakfast.

Passing the torch is a metaphor frequently used in GreekTown. Mom and Dad or Dad and Uncle start a business, build it up, and pass the torch to their children. Here, the metaphor's doubly apt because with the hours some restauranteurs keep, that torch could well be a flashlight.

Time was, it was almost automatic for children to take up that torch. Today, less so. Times have changed. Children can now count their options because Mom and Dad didn't count their hours.

Good thing they didn't. How could they? In this business, serving food is just the tip of the iceberg. In order to be able to serve it, you have to first take inventory, buy supplies, bring them to the restaurant, and prepare them. As well as do a few other things like cleaning, washing, maintenance, linens, laundry, cutlery, payroll, hiring, paying bill after bill after bill — a triplication of your bills at home — the list goes on.

Unless you're so successful you can afford hired help for everything, you won't get it all done in eight hours. You might not get it done in ten hours. But in 12 or 15 hours, slowly slowly, you get it all done. Or enough of it to enjoy the few hours of sleep that remain — far more than the eight hours you wouldn't enjoy if you left all those loose ends hanging.

Times change, but values don't. Of the restaurants featured in this section, the vast majority are family businesses. Some have been passed on from parents to children, but in many of them, the parents are still active.

The inability to count can be habit-forming; many of these people don't count the years, let alone hours. Why should they? Why pass the torch when you're having so much fun carrying it yourself?

The children who do take up that torch — because the restaurant business is locked into their DNA — inherit not only a lifestyle but a lesson.

They learn that in this thouliamou, time is a relative concept. It's easier to work the hours than to count them. And it's relatively easier to work them with a relative or two working alongside you.

They learn that the 12- or 15-hour days that Mom and Dad worked — those long hours that might have deprived them of their favourite audience for a hockey game or soccer game or dance class — weren't really too many hours all. Turns out they were just the right number of hours needed to put bread on the table.

They learn that even though it's impossible not to feel enslaved by the business occasionally, it's more often liberating to discover just how much you can accomplish when you push your limits. And how much more time you had than you thought you had when less time is spent sleeping.

Most importantly, they learn that — in this thouliamou at least — long hours aren't the problem.

They're the solution.

Red Cross admits Schalit failure

'We've done everything we can,' official tells The CJN

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Four years after Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit was taken prisoner by Hamas in a cross-border raid, the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) acknowledged all its attempts to provide humanitarian aid to the hostage have failed.

Schalit, who turns 24 later this month, has been held in Gaza in secret while Hamas has refused the ICRC access to him, and even denied access to letters and other communications with his family, said ICRC media relations officer Marçal Izard.

Please see editorial on page 8

The Red Cross has contacted Hamas directly and worked through intermediaries behind the scenes to try to convince the Islamist rulers of Gaza to permit humanitarian contact with Schalit.

"We've had humanitarian diplomacy. I can't go into details so as not to compromise contacts," said Izard, though he acknowledged that so far, the ICRC has been powerless to budge Hamas.

"We've received e-mails from concerned citizens all over the world who want to know what the Red Cross is doing for Gilad Schalit and saying we're not doing enough," he said. "We've answered all the e-mails and explained what the ICRC does. We've done everything we can do to get access to Gilad Schalit."

That view is not universally accepted.

In the July 15 edition of The CJN, columnist Norma Baumel Joseph suggested the Jewish community boycott the Red Cross. She wrote: "Gilad is a prisoner of war and the Red Cross has not seen him once. They have allowed Hamas to bamboozle them with an excuse of non-availability and security! What kind of humanitarian organization is that? Why haven't they insisted on seeing Gilad? If the tables were turned, the world would be demanding access. So now the Jewish world should boycott the Red Cross, demanding access and news of Gilad until he is released. That is our job."

Two years ago, Schalit's father, Noam, was quoted by Israel's Arutz Sheva news service saying he was "disappointed that the ICRC is unable to impose its humanitarian agenda on a Palestinian organization and compel it to comply with the Geneva conventions and international humanitarian law.

"We would like the ICRC to be more assertive, more active and more persuasive. After all, Hamas often relies on the ICRC for humanitarian matters, so we were expecting that, similarly, the ICRC would succeed in getting what it needs and wants from Hamas."

Gilad Schalit's parents, Noam and Aviva, sit in front of a flag depicting an image of their son at a tent outside Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's residence in Jerusalem. Together with thousands of supporters, the Schalits are campaigning for the release of their son, who has been held captive by Hamas for four years. The International Committee of the Red Cross has not been allowed to establish any contact with the captive soldier.

The News in Brief

Canada

Davis Ran N.B. Store

SAINT JOHN — Businessman Abraham (Abe) Davis, who owned a well-known Saint John, N.B., clothing store for almost 50 years, died July 13 in Toronto at 97. A funeral was held in Toronto on July 14 for Davis, who ran Ideal Stores on Union Street with his wife, Goldie, from 1947 to 1994. It was followed by a burial service at Shaarei Zedek Synagogue the next day in Saint John.

Rabbi Goes Full-time

TORONTO — A Chabad rabbi has become the first rabbi since World War II to join the Canadian Forces full time. Rabbi Lazer Danzinger, 54, transferred from the reserves to full-time service July 16. He's been assigned to CFB Borden, 100 kilometres northwest of his home in Toronto. He'll serve students in its training facilities. He tends to all soldiers, regardless of religion. "Soldiers do not often care that I am Jewish. They are in need," he told Chabad.org. "They might need help after they get home from the war, or they need help with their families. They might have nightmares after Afghanistan. They are trying to cope. They have issues."

World

Swedish Shul Hit

STOCKHOLM — A firecracker exploded on the steps of the synagogue in Malmo, Sweden, a day after a bomb threat was taped to the building. The firecracker exploded at 3 a.m. on July 23. The bomb threat that had been taped to the shul the night before was the second such threat in two weeks, and security was increased in response.

Jewish Leader Flees?

CAIRO — The head of Egypt's tiny Jewish community allegedly fled the country after being convicted last month of fraud and ordered to jail. An Egyptian court convicted Carmen Weinstein, 82, and sentenced her to three years in jail, as well as $8,000 in fines and restitution for selling a Jewish community building that didn't belong to her and refusing to return the money. She said documents saying she sold the building were forged. Weinstein reportedly went to visit the United States days before the ruling. She heads a community of a few dozen, mostly women, and rents out a few buildings to raise funds.

Nazi Dies Unpunished

BERLIN — An ex-Nazi SS officer died in Germany last week two months after an investigation into his connection to massacres of Jews was reopened. Erich Steidtmann, 95, who allegedly led Nazi police units that mass murdered Jews in eastern Europe, died in Hanover, where he lived. The Simon Wiesenthal Center expressed frustration he was never prosecuted. The case was reopened in April based on a letter he wrote in October 1943 that placed him in the area of the massacres when they occurred rather than at home on leave as he told prosecutors in the 1960s.

Death Sentence Upheld For Yemeni Killer

SANAA — Yemen's Supreme Court has upheld the death sentence of a Yemeni man who killed a Jewish fellow citizen after demanding that he convert.

The court on July 24 affirmed the sentence of death by firing squad levied by an appeals court on Abdel Aziz Yahia al-Abdi, 39, for the December 2008 slaying of Masha Yaish Nahari, a father of nine from Raydah. Abdi killed Nahari after saying that Yemeni Jews should convert or be killed.

In 2009, an appeals court overturned a lower court ruling that ordered Abdi to pay blood money to the family. The Abdi family appealed to the Supreme Court.

Abdi, who is alleged to have murdered his wife two years before he killed Nahari, is said to be mentally unstable, according to the Yemen Post.

Nahari's children moved to Israel after the murder. His parents, wife and siblings remain in Yemen. Fewer than 200 Jews still live in Yemen, down from 60,000 in 1948.

Heirs Sue Hungary

NEW YORK — The heirs of a Hungarian Jewish banker filed suit in the United States against the Hungarian government and museums it oversees seeking the return of $100 million in artwork that allegedly was confiscated by the Nazis. The heirs of Baron Mor Lipot Herzog are seeking the return of more than 40 works by masters such as van Dyck and Monet, the New York Times reported, calling it the world's largest unresolved Shoah art claim. The heirs have petitioned Hungary for the past two decade, but have been rebuffed.

JVS Toronto helps inner-city youth

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

JVS Toronto wants at-risk youth living in Toronto's impoverished Gabian Way neighbourhood – located in the Eglinton Avenue West and Caledonia Road area – to know that the Jewish community is there to help.

The non-profit agency has been using a $298,584 grant from the federal government to effect change in the city by quietly implementing a three-year pilot project called Circles of Success, which aims to find the best ways to stem youth crime.

The funding covers the length of the project, which began in April 2008 and ends March 31, 2011.

"Crime is high in the Gabian Way. The drop-out rate is high. Murders happen there. We believe in investing in this community… this is tikkun olam," Karen Goldenberg, executive director of JVS Toronto, told The CJN.

"We want [these neighbourhoods] to know the Jewish community cares about everybody."

In a joint announcement last week at JVS Toronto's head office, Goldenberg and Vic Toews, the federal minister of public safety, highlighted the ongoing government-sponsored program.

Circles of Success focuses on giving employment training, conflict resolution training and arts-based programming to at-risk young people "to promote positive behaviours, volunteerism, and connectedness to their community, all of which will help to create strong and healthy neighbourhoods that are resistant to crime," Toews said.

Goldenberg said the project is providing participants "with positive and creative alternatives" to reach their potential.

"We know that, with the right kind of support and empowerment, youth in Gabian Way can and will get jobs and contribute to their community and to Toronto. We believe that we can help youth connect with their dreams and reach their personal goals," she said.

JVS Toronto received the funding after applying to the Ministry of Public Safety's National Crime Prevention Strategy (NCPS), which the ministry gives $40 million annually and describes as a "funding support mechanism for selected projects that help prevent crime and increase knowledge about what works in crime prevention."

Asked how the funding total for JVS Toronto was reached, Toews said organizations submit their own cost breakdowns on their applications to the NCPS.

"The [NCPS] funding usually only covers things like infrastructure and salary costs for a project," he said.

Toews said the government's aim is to try to help "young people to find the right path" and the JVS program fits this mandate.

"Despite the fact we take a hard line on crime, our government believes very strongly that if we can reach out to young people and provide them with skills that will keep them out of a life of crime, that's something we need to do," he added.

Jewish Vocational Services Toronto was founded in 1947 to help Holocaust survivors find employment in Canada and establish new lives. It now provides services to more than 23,000 people each year in the Toronto area.

All Israel was his congregation

A great many people sing well. But only a very few are singers. And of these few singers, only a handful appear every several hundred years or so to bring to the rest of us a better, purer understanding of what Heaven intended for Earth through the creation of song and music.

Cantor Louis Danto was one of that handful.

From the editor's desk...

Had he lived 2,000 years ago and leading the Temple choristers in Jerusalem in Sabbath or holiday hymns, he would have undoubtedly distracted the priests in the performance of the sacrificial rites. They would have interrupted their duties to focus on and enjoy the voice soaring higher than their own supplications on behalf of the people. So stunningly unique was the quality of his voice.

It had a multi-dimensional aspect. Clearly defined like a precise line of light in a dark room, it could sound at once like a joyous proclamation or a tearful cry. Even as a whispered caress, it was authoritative, certain of itself, confident, yet never without the beseeching quality that so defined its matchless sound.

But of course, voice is also a manifestation of character. It was, in truth, from the character of the man that the voice achieved its profundity.

He understood human suffering.

Ten years old when the Nazis rolled into his hometown of Suwalki, Poland, he "lost" his parents and five siblings to the murderers' evil mayhem. His voice, essentially, saved his life. For he was at a special music school when death descended upon his family. (See the obituary "Cantor remembered for musical talent and giving nature" in The CJN, July 29, Toronto edition and online.)

His profoundly personal experience of suffering, however, was not the key distinction of his life. It was a guidepost, a directional vane pointing him toward empathy, compassion and humanity. It informed his every approach to individuals: their stories, their concerns, their plights, their joys, their pettinesses, their magnanimities.

The silvery blue of his eyes were the gentle accompaniment to an invariably frequent smile.

That he cared for people was evident in the way he treated us.

How often we saw him – a maestro of the musical world and acknowledged as such around the globe – guiding a youngster through the boy's first heart-pounding duet with him during the Shabbat or holiday service at the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in Toronto, where he was the cantor for more than a quarter century.

Cantor Danto would stand to the left of and very close to the nervous boy, nearly hugging him with his outstretched right arm, almost enfolding him in the flowing waterfall of his seriously official-looking robes. His right hand always rested on the boy's shoulder, tenderly assuring him through the flow of warmth and strength from his hand, that no shame, no embarrassment would result from the lad's courageous decision to sing before the vast assembly of hyper-critical worshippers and hard-to-please liturgical experts.

Wherever on the staff of the music the boy's tentative first notes happened to fall, the cantor unfailingly secured them in a pleasant musical place with his uncanny ability to underpin the boy's often shaky notes with his own steadier notes, always a perfect, harmonic third away. The joining of the two voices was as sweet as the smile on a young child.

That Louis Danto cared for others was also evident in the way he interpreted music.

He took great pride in mastering the meticulous detail of music. The secrets and the magic of music, he believed, were reachable only through true and faithful rendering of the composer's intentions and hopes for the composition. Indeed, being loyal to the technical demands of a particular piece of music was the maestro's testament of respect and gratitude to the composer for the labour of his art.

The maestro knew that mastering detail and technique did not preclude spontaneous effusions of emotion or sparks of passion from the heart. To the contrary. They were the necessary entry point to music's many-chambered palace of enchantment, enjoyment and pleasure.

Thus, through the uncommon combination of his love of people and his devotion to music, Louis Danto carried us often and always warm-heartedly to that enchanted palace.

Whether chanting the Kol Nidrei or singing Il Lamento Di Federico, he inspired us to reside in the higher places of our soul and to think of the higher purposes that our lives might embrace.

All of Israel was his congregation.

Cantor Louis Danto died in Toronto on July 23 at the age of 81. At this very moment, his soul is likely singing to the angels. Oh, how pleased they must be.

After 18 years, Feldman bows out

'It's time that someone else comes in'

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

After 18 years on both the old North York city council and Toronto City Council, Mike Feldman has announced he won't be running for re-election as councillor for Ward 10 in the Oct. 25 election.

"I figured that I've paid my dues," Feldman told The CJN after his constituents received a letter last week announcing his intentions.

He joined municipal politics at age 62, when he grew "tired of being retired" from his business career, he said.

"You never get a day off when you're retired," joked the now 82-year-old former deputy mayor of Toronto.

But don't expect him to truly retire – he plans to start another business or sit on some boards.

"I've got to have a reason to get up in the morning," he said.

Recalling his time in municipal politics, he described himself as a "capitalist that has concern for people," and he said that while on council, he has positioned himself "on the right, with a social conscience."

His ward stretches roughly from Steeles Avenue to Highway 401, and Allen Road to just east of Bathurst Street, an area that encompasses large swaths of Toronto's Jewish community, including many of its largest synagogues and community institutions.

But he said councillors need to look beyond their own ward boundaries to do what's best for the city as a whole.

Feldman said his vision for the city has been inspired by European traditions, such as the idea of creating bicycle lanes that are truly separated from lanes for motorized vehicles. For example, he favours roads that have sidewalks meant for bikes alongside ones reserved for walking.

He said he visualizes a city in which pedestrians can walk along streets such as Sheppard and Wilson avenues and look through the windows of local businesses, as they can on Danforth Avenue, which he described as the best street in the city for that reason.

He said he tried to push for that vision on Sheppard Avenue between Wilmington Avenue and Allen Road by insisting that the bottom floor of new mid-rise condo buildings, which have been built close to sidewalks, be reserved for shops. Although those spaces currently house mostly offices, he's hoping storefronts will evolve naturally.

"It was a philosophy of mine to create the European model," he said.

Feldman said he also favours building a more extensive subway network. While noting that some people say the city can't afford it, he said Toronto was in no better financial shape in 1954 when the Yonge subway line opened.

One of the accomplishments he's most proud of is the colourful mural on the wall of the 401 at the south-east corner of Bathurst Street and Wilson Avenue. He said he helped raise funds for the $60,000 project, which has been plasticized to avoid graffiti damage.

The painting was completed in 2006, but he said he still receives thanks from the community for it.

He said he sees problems with the way the current council operates, largely because it has too many left-wing members.

"The council was polarized, [with] left, right and a mushy middle," he said. "Since the left were on what they considered to be the side of the god, the mayor [David Miller], he was in total control."

Although he has no problem with the mayor "being in total control," it means "democracy had somewhat left the chamber."

He said he fears city council is evolving to the point where councillors only look out for their own wards.

"As a result, you don't have as many global thinkers as you should have on council," he said.

He proposed a model that involves cutting the number of ward councillors in half and creating four districts (Scarborough, Etobicoke, North York and a central area) with three people elected from across each district. He'd then like to see council's executive committee being made up of those 12 elected district politicians, rather than ward councillors appointed by the mayor, to ensure the mayor can't impose his or her will on the committee.

Mike Feldman

He said working in politics poses unique challenges, such as dealing with people who say they want one thing, then contradict themselves later. For example, he said, people often don't want buses running on their streets, yet they want close, frequent bus service. Or, they don't want a condominium built because it'll bring too much traffic, but then they complain if there isn't enough parking on the condo's property.

Feldman is an active member and past president of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, which honoured him with its Yakir Hakahal – precious to the community – award in 2005 for his "personal commitment to community work and interfaith work," said Pearl Grundland, the shul's executive director.

His retirement is a loss for the community, but he will still be actively involved in local issues and will always be a part of the synagogue family, she added.

"He's been a wonderful councillor. He's very inclusive with everybody in the ward, and in the office, too. Everybody gets treated equally," said Nancy Oomen, Feldman's executive assistant, who has worked with him for over 10 years, who last week was considering running to replace him.

(Even before Feldman's announcement, eight candidates had already entered the race in Ward 10, including local school trustee James Pasternak.)

"He's extremely well connected in the community, and he's been very responsive when people call our office," Oomen said of Feldman. "I wish it could go on, but as they say, all good things must come to an end."

Feldman echoed that sentiment.

"I figure that the ward is better for my having served it, but now it's time that someone else comes in and takes over," he said.

The CJN will begin coverage of the municipal elections in September.

Israeli military analyst sees war on horizon

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

According to Elliott Chodoff, an Israeli military analyst and Israel Defense Forces reserve major, his country's doomsday clock has moved one tick closer to midnight.

Chodoff was in Toronto July 6 to speak at the Beth Tikvah Synagogue and share a message of caution with the 500 people who came to hear him.

His talk was hosted by the Speakers Action Group and the Canadian Jewish Civil Rights Association.

Presently, Israel faces its greatest existential threat since it fought to preserve its newfound independence in 1948, Chodoff said.

Elliott Chodoff

With the looming possibility of a nuclear Iran, increasing signs of a new Hezbollah-instigated war in the north and Turkey now "facing the East," he said, supporters of Israel must brace for a new conflict that could occur at any time.

He said the prospect of a new war with Hezbollah is a "near certainty." Over the last three months, the terror group has been attacking UNIFIL peacekeeping soldiers, "driving them back" from the Lebanese border, a sign the group is preparing to fight Israel again, he said.

"Today, Israel has a de facto border with Iran... it's called Hezbollah," Chodoff said. "Hezbollah today has an arsenal of 8,000 rockets that can reach the Negev. We are also concerned they have chemical weapons," although that intelligence is unconfirmed.

Chodoff said there are two scenarios that could drag Israel into an immediate war. The first, which he called the "nursery school scenario," posits that a rocket from Hezbollah or Hamas manages to land in a school, killing innocent children.

"If that happens, Israel is at war that day," he said.

The second, or the "Imad Mugniyah" scenario – named after the senior member of Hezbollah who was killed by a car bomb in 2008 and whose death is blamed on Israel – would see a senior Israeli diplomat assassinated by Hamas or Hezbollah.

The blockade of Gaza is strategically important

"If they succeeded in doing this, we're at war," Chodoff said. "These are the things Israelis hope they don't wake up to in the morning."

Speaking about the May 31 Gaza flotilla incident, Chodoff led with some gallows humour.

"I like to look at the positive. [Israel] is now the destination of choice for a whole new cruise line," he said to laughter from the audience.

He stressed that the blockade of Gaza is strategically important for two reasons. The first is to prevent Hamas from re-arming. While not foolproof, he said, the blockade is "keeping a lid" on the terrorist organization's weapons build-up.

The second is that the blockade prevents Hamas from transporting captured Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit.

"Hamas wants to get Schalit on a boat to Iran, where Israel would never get to him" and this cannot be allowed to happen, he said.

As for the worldwide effort to delegitimize Israel, Chodoff sees the radicalization of the Turkish regime as one of the worst omens for the Jewish state.

Though Turkey has a huge secular population, he said that "[Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip] Erdogan understands that he can rally people of disparate beliefs by using Israel and Jews as scapegoats" to garner support for his new Iran-friendly policies.

Chodoff then launched into a humour-filled take on Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

"I like Ahmadinejad. I really do," he said. "I like honest murderers. It makes my job as an analyst easier. Because when he says he wants to destroy Israel, he means it. He isn't saying anything the Iranian regime wasn't thinking since 1979. He just has a big mouth."

Chodoff then warned the crowd that what he would say next was no joke. Invoking the spectre of nuclear war, he said Israel would not survive a nuclear strike. "This is the reality. We know it, and they know it."

He said allowing Iran to acquire nuclear weapons is not an option for Israel, since the likelihood of a nuclear strike on the country would become "a near certainty."

"No responsible Israeli government can allow this. Which means unless the world does something – and it won't – the likelihood Israel will strike Iran is high. But Israel wants to be able to say it exhausted every other alternative solution first before attacking Iran," he said.

In closing, Chodoff said he believes Israel is looking "at an immediate future that is very dangerous."

Let's press the ICRC

In her July 16 CJN column, ("Is he really MIA?"), Norma Baumel Joseph urged the Jewish world to "boycott the Red Cross, demanding access [to] and news of Gilad [Schalit] until he is released." Schalit is the Israeli soldier kidnapped by Hamas more than four years ago. He has been held captive by his Hamas tormentors all these years without any international aid, and without any humanitarian or non-governmental organization having been permitted to visit him to see if and how he lives.

"Gilad is a prisoner of war, and the Red Cross has not seen him once," Joseph wrote. "They have allowed Hamas to bamboozle them with an excuse of non-availability and security!"

How painfully and maddeningly true Joseph's conclusions are. It is, therefore, imperative that we not allow the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) to bamboozle us.

The organization's responses to questions about its efforts to date are pathetically meek and self-serving.

"We've done everything we can to get access to Schalit," Marcal Izard, the ICRC media relations officer told The CJN last week, seeming to shrug his shoulders in untroubled resignation at the abject failure of his organization to move the conscience of the Hamas leaders.

In a statement posted on the ICRC's website June 23, Beatrice Megavand-Roggo, the ICRC's head of operations for the Middle East, purports to explain to an inquiring public what the organization has actually done on Schalit's behalf.

"Our efforts [to be allowed to visit Schalit] have lost none of their intensity, despite the fact that Hamas has thus far firmly rejected all of our pleas… We have also been constantly reminding his captors of their obligation under international humanitarian law to protect his life, to treat him humanely and to let him have regular and unconditional contact with his family. Security considerations cannot… justify a refusal to permit the exchange of news between Gilad Schalit and his family," she writes assertively. Her hardest armour against the jabbing accusations of a frustrated, angry public is the following: "On 14 June, however, we said publicly that Hamas, by not allowing contact between Mr. Schalit and his family, was violating international humanitarian law. This was the first time we said this publicly" (my emphasis).

According to Megavand-Roggo, making public the pronouncement that Hamas is violating international law is the sharpest arrow in the ICRC's quiver. And they were finally moved to let it fly. How that public statement must have unnerved Hamas!

Nowhere in its web statement does the ICRC actually condemn Hamas. Nowhere is there even a whisper that Hamas must suffer a consequence of some sort for its violation of international law. Nowhere does the ICRC suggest that it cannot be business as usual with Hamas as long as they mock international humanitarian law and torture the Schalit family.

"What kind of humanitarian organization is that?" Joseph correctly asked. A failed one, we must respond. Let us heed Joseph's call. Let the Jewish world, at least, mobilize to press the ICRC to bring Gilad home to his family and his people.

Israel's two chief rabbis, Sephardi Mordechai Eliyahu and Ashkenazi Avraham Shapiro, said they'd stick to their demand that 10,000 Jews from Ethiopia – who had arrived the previous winter – would have to undergo ritual immersion, a conversion rite. The refusal of some local rabbis to marry Ethiopians who hadn't undergone immersion triggered angry protests.

'Assault' at the Kotel

Kol hakavod to the Israeli authorities for arresting those who would trample all over our sacred laws and beliefs, and make a mockery of some of our most cherished customs ("Activist decries haredi control of Kotel," July 29). More than a century ago, the Reform movement decimated Orthodox Jewry in Germany with an aggressive assault on Orthodox institutions – often in collaboration with the German authorities – and now that assault is directed at the Kotel. Not satisfied to tamper with the Almighty's decrees in their places of worship, they now seek to do so in front of the remains of His house. One can only wonder if these same people would show the same level of disrespect to the traditions – and practitioners – of other faiths. Thank God the Kotel is under the administration of those who protect our beautiful heritage and seek to preserve it according to the mores of our righteous ancestors.

Homosexuality prohibited by Torah law

I am shocked and dismayed. UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) and Canadian Jewish Congress have betrayed the values of the Jewish community and Israel by their endorsement of the recent "gay pride parade" in Toronto. How did the CIC ever decide it was in Israel's best interest to endorse the proclamation "Tel Aviv Is the Gay Capital of the Middle East" through the placement of an advertisement in a Toronto daily newspaper. Talk about a self-inflicted wound. Imagine the joy and laughter this ad brought to our Muslim enemies. Does homosexuality fall within any of their mandates?

Homosexuality is prohibited by Torah law. There are no errors or omissions. We have survived through the ages because of our Torah law and moral precepts, not because of our wealth or numbers. One of the major Jewish characteristics is the quality of sympathy (rachmonis). Homosexuals are no less deserving of such sympathy and respect. Unfortunately, in our time there is great confusion between a "human right" and a "human ill." Tolerance and sympathy for the homosexual is not sufficient grounds for granting full acceptance and status of homosexual behaviour within a Jewish framework.

UJA Federation could do far more good by funding a sex reorientation program rather than by celebrating the homosexual dilemma in a parade. Therein lays a world of difference between a mitzvah (a Torah commandment) and an aveira (a Torah violation).

Praise for home-based shuls

I grew up in a home-based shul. It was my family's playroom table that I set for kiddush. I was also responsible for distributing siddurim to any latecomers, and I was the first person adults turned to when the belt needed to be tied around the Torah or a youthful voice was desired to lead Adon Olam. I always felt I was important to the group, and even though more than 30 years have gone by, I carry so many vivid memories with me of that time. I firmly believe it is these home-based shuls that keep Jewish kids in the Jewish community ("Vaughan takes a look at home-based shuls," July 1).

We blame so many institutions and parts of society for reasons why Jewish kids don't remain Jewish and we invest many dollars into the same. If those "25 to 30 complaints about home-based congregations" that Vaughan Ward 5 Coun. Alan Shefman received were instead statements of praise, I think we'd have the problem solved.

The Mormon church's mission

A spokesperson for the Mormon church, Mark Paredes, stated that there is "99.99 per cent" compliance today with the 1995 memorandum of understanding that was signed between the Mormons and Jewish leaders to stop the posthumous baptism of Holocaust victims ("Baptizing deceased Jews against Mormon policy: spokesperson," CJN Montreal, July 15; "Mormons violate their church policy," CJN Toronto, July 15). They say statistics don't lie, but liars use statistics. It is absolutely true that no more than a few hundred Mormons, out of millions, are violating church policy by baptizing Jews murdered in the Holocaust. But the fact is that the Mormon church knows who these people are and they are doing nothing about it. Why? Because the stated mission of the Mormon church is the salvation of the human race, both living and dead, by offering the Gospel of Jesus Christ to deceased people, including Jews murdered in the Holocaust.

A chance to change universal jurisdiction?

BY ZE'EV SEGAL
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

The British ambassador to Israel, Sir Tom Phillips, who is widely admired in Jerusalem for his erudition and knowledge of the Middle East, has concluded his term and has left the State of Israel a going-away gift.

Over the past four years, Phillips and Israel's ambassadors in London have dedicated much effort to conveying to the British government Israel's strong opposition to Britain's universal jurisdiction rules. These provisions in effect permit any individual to file a petition in a lower court for the arrest of persons suspected of committing "war crimes," without having to produce substantial evidence.

Last month, the British government announced it will soon be introducing new legislation in Parliament barring the issuance of arrest warrants on suspicion of "war crimes" without the approval of the chief prosecutor. The amendment to the existing law seeks to create a balance between the British commitment to ensuring that suspected war criminals are brought to justice, and the requirement that there be solid evidence that justifies limitations on a person's liberty.

Last year, an arrest warrant was issued, and then rescinded, for Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak while he was visiting Britain. Pro-Palestinian activists also initiated such warrants against former foreign minister Tzipi Livni for her diplomatic involvement in the war in Gaza in 2008-09. For this and other reasons as well, Livni cancelled a visit to London, but her case led to pressure on the British government. Meanwhile, senior Israel Defence Forces officers, both past and present, are avoiding visits to the United Kingdom out of concern that their presence will trigger arrest warrants.

It is not only in Britain that problems of this nature have arisen. The United States has shown interest in the subject, and brought about the repeal in Belgium of a law supporting universal jurisdiction after the United States threatened to withdraw NATO command headquarters from Brussels.

In the meantime, through direct contact with the British government, Israel has stepped up its activity on the issue over the past year as well.

The legal situation in Britain is unusual. There, it is a question of invoking universal jurisdiction against foreign nationals who were not involved per se in activities against Britain or its citizens. In 1957, the British Parliament passed the "Geneva Convention" law, which turned the provisions of the convention into concepts anchored in local British law. As a result, anyone in Britain can at present approach the courts and seek to invoke the law in an effort to turn ostensible international war criminals into criminal offenders in violation of British law.

The law in question had not been invoked until it was "discovered" in 2005, when an arrest warrant based on this law was issued for Israeli Maj.-Gen. Doron Almog, who was about to land in Britain. The warrant was premised on allegations involving the destruction of 30 homes in the Rafah area. Decisive action on the part of the Israeli ambassador in London at the time, Zvi Hefetz, prompted Almog not to get off his El Al plane, in response to the instructions of the most senior officials in Israel.

I was in London at that time, and met immediately afterward with the legal advisers to the British Foreign Office, who expressed determination to invoke the law in the future, even though it had been a "dead letter" since it was passed. The British seem to view every piece of legislation as "vintage wine" and vigorously reject Israeli contention that there is selective enforcement of this law when it comes to Israelis, in contrast to a lack of enforcement against other nationals.

I presented their position to the relevant officials in Israel and did not get the impression that they took seriously the prospect that, at the request of any person or organization, high-ranking Israelis would be arrested in the United Kingdom by low-level courts, where some of the judges may not be professionals.

The advent of David Cameron's Conservative government has created the possibility for a change in the law. Indeed, British Justice Secretary Kenneth Clarke has announced that he will introduce a bill in Parliament amending the "Geneva Convention" statute. It should be remembered that no one is talking about repealing the 1957 law that deems that acts involving international war crimes are criminal, as per the British system.

The issue will in the future be thrown into the lap of the chief prosecutor, who is not considered political by nature. He can approve a judicial arrest warrant, but in such a case, the senior Israeli or other official can probably manage to leave British territory on time. That's much better than the current situation, but it's not an insurance policy.

U.K.'s Cameron critical of Israel

By DANNA HARMAN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

ANKARA — British prime minister David Cameron, who has often described himself as a "friend of Israel," harshly criticized Israel's blockade of the Gaza Strip last week, telling a group of Turkish businessmen in Ankara that the strip is a prison camp.

"The situation in Gaza has to change," he said. "Humanitarian goods and people must flow in both directions. Gaza cannot and must not be allowed to remain a prison camp."

While Cameron has made similar remarks in the past in the House of Commons, his decision to repeat them in Turkey – whose relations with Israel have severely deteriorated recently – gave them a more prominent significance.

Cameron's remarks, made on his first official visit to that country, were sure to endear him to his Turkish hosts, but managed to both surprise and anger Israel.

David Cameron

The Israeli Embassy in the United Kingdom issued a response to the remarks, saying that "the people of Gaza are the prisoners of the terrorist organization Hamas. The situation in Gaza is the direct result of Hamas' rule and priorities.

"We know that the prime minister would also share our grave concerns about our own prisoner in the Gaza Strip, Gilad Schalit, who has been held hostage there for over four years, without receiving a single Red Cross visit," the statement continued.

Cameron did not mention Schalit in his speech. However, he did mention the events of May 31, when Israeli commandos boarded a Gaza-bound aid ship and clashed with Turkish activists in a confrontation that resulted in the deaths of nine activists. Cameron said the incident was "completely unacceptable."

The British prime minister called for a speedy and transparent Israeli inquiry into the incident, but stopped just short of calling for an international probe.

In a later press conference, Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan heaped further criticism on Israel, calling Israel's reaction to the incident aboard the Turkish boat an act of "piracy," and comparing Israelis to Somali pirates.

"The pirates are there in Somalia, [but] when a similar situation occurs here... political leaders, who are there to establish a fair life for everyone – they should not remain silent," he said.

Israel was not the only ally of Britain taken aback by the content of Cameron's speech in Turkey, as Cameron went on to encourage the European Union (EU) to accept Turkey's bid to become a member of the union – a move opposed by France and Germany.

Cameron said he was angered by the slow pace of the accession talks, and warned against shutting Ankara out because of anti-Muslim prejudice.

"When I think about what Turkey has done to defend Europe as a NATO ally and what Turkey is doing now in Afghanistan alongside European allies, it makes me angry that your progress toward EU membership can be frustrated in the way it has been," Cameron told the Turkish businessmen. "I believe it's just wrong to say Turkey can guard the camp but not be allowed to sit inside the tent."

He further argued in his speech that a close alliance with Turkey is especially critical now, in light of the new EU sanctions against the Iranian nuclear program. "We need Turkey's help in making it clear to Iran just how serious we are about engaging fully with the international community," he said.

Turkey voted last month against fresh UN sanctions on Iran over its controversial nuclear program.

The EU opened accession talks with Turkey in 2005, but has so far only begun looking at 13 of the 35 policy areas, called chapters, that a candidate country has to successfully negotiate prior to membership, with matters such as Turkey's refusal to open its seaports and airports to Cyprus holding it back. French President Nicolas Sarkozy and German Chancellor Angela Merkel have suggested that Turkey be offered a "privileged partnership" rather than full membership, a proposal that Ankara categorically rejects.

"We know what it's like to be shut out of the club," Cameron told the Turks, referring to Charles de Gaulle's description of the United Kingdom before vetoing its EU membership. "But we also know that these things can change."

My anonymous hero

I don't know my new hero's name. Actually, I've seen her only once, serving coffee at a Second Cup.

But this big-hearted barista had a mission: to put a smile on everyone's face. I had run into her cafe looking for a quick caffeine fix. To be honest, like most other customers, I was a lot less congenial than I should have been. She accepted my order gracefully, and with a few kind words, she managed to make me smile. This hero had offered a moment of uplift and made a difference in my day.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Now, calling this cheerful coffee server a "hero" might seem like an exaggeration, but it's not. Yes, we aspire to live by the Mishnah's saying that "one should greet people with a pleasant face." After all, that's how our mothers raised us. But there's a lot more than manners at stake.

Smiles are in short supply nowadays. People are far busier and stressed than they were 50 years ago, and much more isolated. Most people are unable to name all of their neighbours. People may live next door to each other, but they aren't next-door neighbours. We have retreated into well-insulated cocoons, entertained by the illuminated screens of the electronic age, communicating virtually with virtually everyone, but truly knowing virtually no one. True community spirit has disappeared.

Along with the collapse of community has come the collapse of civility. There's no time left to chat with anyone. After all, we have to get down to business. E-mail is even worse. It has the linguistic ambience of a fast-food order. Greetings are omitted, leaving only blunt requests demanding us to "CALL JIM NOW."–We're stretching the social fabric a bit too thin and experiencing an epidemic of grumpiness.

And grumpiness makes a difference. I was stunned when a former MP told me that governments are deeply affected by the moods of their leaders. A prime minister arrives in a foul mood because he had a fight with his wife, and all of a sudden, initiatives are upended and ministers demoted. Grumpiness is not just a mood. It can change history.

Much like the famed "butterfly effect" (that a butterfly flapping its wings can change the course of the weather), a lack of civility can have far-reaching consequences as well.

And that's why this barista is my hero. By putting smiles on the faces of her customers, she has pushed back against the impolite and impersonal. And with her cheerful countenance, she has made a difference. After all, even one smile can create a hurricane of kindness.

Cotler keeps up the pressure on Iran

MP Irwin Cotler, the globe-trotting lawyer, professor, legislator and human rights activist, is at it again. While many people around the world ignore the abuses and dangers emanating from President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's Iran, or at best make symbolic gestures of opposition, Cotler has relentlessly opposed what he calls "the toxic convergence of four distinct – yet interrelated – dangers."

Gil Troy in Montreal

While UN sanctions, finally, offer at least some response to the nuclear threat, Cotler notes, the international community has ignored the other three "clear and present dangers": "the genocidal incitement threat; state-sponsored terrorism; and the systematic and widespread violations of the rights of the Iranian people."

Recently, on the anniversary of the murder of the Iranian heroine Neda Agha-Soltan during justified protests against Iranian electoral fraud, Cotler once again tried to rally the international community to make the punishment fit the crime, to respond proportionately to the disproportionate evils of Ahmadinejad and the mullahocracy.

Flanked by Neda's fiancé, Caspian Makan, and the beauty queen turned anti-child-death-penalty crusader Nazanin Afshin-Jam, Cotler released his "Responsibility to Prevent" petition, endorsed by 100 leading scholars and activists, pleading for some serious action. In fact, toothless sanctions and limited responses can be even worse than inaction – they give the illusion of action, lulling us into a false sense of security – as the oppression of Iranians and the threats to world peace metastasize.

The world's blind spot regarding Iran is stunning. How could it be that campuses did not come alive last year when Ahmadinejad was stealing an election in broad daylight and slaughtering his own people in the streets? How could it be that Iranian expatriates, Jews and human rights activists haven't come together to launch the modern successor to the civil rights, anti-apartheid and Soviet Jewry movements in response to Ahmadinejad and his Revolutionary Guard goons?

The passivity on the Iran issue reflects a broader blindness to evils that fester among Islamist regimes particularly, and the Third World generally. It's a doubly destructive form of political correctness. The West is increasingly threatened by this unchecked menace, and it's a form of liberal condescension that ultimately reveals contempt toward others when we fail to hold them to the high standards of behaviour we have for ourselves, and for those who look and act like "us."

Just consider the table of contents to Cotler's report. Here are the sub-headings to one aspect of his four-pronged indictment, regarding Iran's massive mistreatment of its own people. The report details: "The widespread and systematic violations of the rights of the Iranian people, including: the beatings, execution, killing, torture and other inhumane treatment of Iranians," as well as "the systematic and widespread oppression of a minority – the Baha'i" in particular, the "exclusion of, discrimination and violence against, religious minorities," the "exclusion of, discrimination and violence against, ethnic minorities," the "assault on women's rights," the "repression of freedom of speech, assembly and association – a war against students, professors, activists and journalists – and against fundamental rights and those who would exercise them," the "crackdown on cyber dissidents," the "assault on labour rights," the "imposition of the death penalty for juveniles," the "denial of gay/lesbian rights," the "murder of political dissidents," the "failure to provide a system of justice – show trials, forced confessions, denial of due process, [and the] absence of an independent judiciary and impunity of the Basij militia" and the Revolutionary Guards.

Proof that we're dealing with a form of post-modernist decadence comes from Ahmadinejad's visit to Columbia University in September 2007. His antics there stirred minimal outrage, until he denied there are any gays in Iran. This homophobia crossed the line, just as the most recent sexist threat that a pregnant Iranian Maryam Ghorbanzadeh might be stoned to death for adultery generated lots of press.

The selective indignation is troubling, although having some indignation at least marks an improvement. Cotler should stop being a lonely prophet – not because he stills his voice, but because finally, belatedly, but justifiably, millions start heeding his call to conscience, and his warnings to act collectively against Iran, before it's too late.

Museum Jews

My great-grandmother Shifra left her home in Vienna and moved to America where her daughter – my grandmother – was born as a "real American."

While my grandmother had many "yekkie" characteristics, she didn't speak German and didn't consider herself Viennese. My own very American mother never spoke of Vienna, and in fact, none of my relatives ever went "back" to visit.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein in Jerusalem

I had the opportunity to be in Vienna in June as part of an interfaith women's conference, but while I enjoyed the beauty and basked in the music and took interesting tours, I cannot say I felt at home in the way one would expect when going back to their ancestral ground.

Perhaps the most difficult moments for me were the "Jewish tour highlights"– the Holocaust memorial, two Jewish museums and one synagogue. They just didn't move me, weren't all that beautiful or engaging, and didn't really recognize Austrian complicity in the Holocaust. They seemed underutilized and underloved. The Holocaust memorial is a stark, cold, grey building that on sunny days is used by shoppers stopping to sit and have a coffee.

The only time we saw real, live Jewish life in Vienna was on Shabbat when we joined the Reform community on Friday night and the Orthodox community on Saturday. I am sure there must be a vibrant Jewish life in Vienna, but we didn't feel it at all through the museum experience.

Before going to Vienna we visited Prague. Though we have no personal connections with that city, it is totally charming, romantic and sweet, but once again, on the "Jewish tour," we had the feeling that we were real live dinosaurs visiting museums of our dead dinosaur relatives. I've never seen so many non-Jewish tourists being herded around old non-functioning synagogues.

Every single general city tour included "Jew-town" and the six sites that constitute "The Jewish Museum." Every single tour group hears the story of the Maharal's golem, turned into a kind of Frankenstein story, with the golem still "mysteriously" trapped in the attic of the altneuschul. They then traipse through the old Jewish cemetery to see the Maharal's grave. Tacky trinkets line the street, everything from touristy chanukiyot from Israel to miniature golem statues (thou shalt not make a graven image?) The Jewish Museum is listed as a "must-see" in Prague.

There is even a famous kosher restaurant that Michelle Obama visited (with her quote and picture prominently on the front window) and, as in Vienna, there are a few functioning shuls on Shabbat. But also as we did in Vienna, we had the feeling that we were visiting museum Jews.

Of course, these images stand in stark contrast to our just having spent a year in Israel, where every tourist stop is an interactive experience of then-and-now, and every day is the reality of active, breathing Judaism as a lived experience. Even Yad Vashem, the Holocaust museum par excellence, ends with the triumph of Jewish viability in present time. Yet, once in awhile, at some ancient site even in Israel, I had the odd feeling that people were looking at their own history as if at relics, curious and quizzical as if they were seeing Aztecs long-gone from this world.

So how does an ancient people acknowledge its long history, speak its pain, document its challenges, and equally meet its vibrant present? How do we treasure our past while not turning it into just another tourist stop on the route? And how do we share our past with others, not overly romanticizing or overly dramatizing it?

As Jews, our history and our present are always inexorably intertwined. As we enter the period of reflection before the Days of Awe, we need to ask ourselves if next year we'll be travellers on a living Jewish journey, or docents of a lovely but frozen and forgotten past.

The Kirshner File

Letter from Mississippi

During the 1960s civil rights era, when African-Americans and their white allies risked life and limb to abolish segregation in the South, Mississippi, a bastion of diehard resistance, was invariably in the eye of the storm of that historic struggle.

Freedom Riders from the northern states converged on Mississippi to register disenfranchised African-Americans and desegregate white-only public facilities. U.S. marshalls accompanied James Meredith to the campus of the leafy University of Mississippi in Oxford, thus enabling him to become the first African-American student to enrol at Ole Miss.

Sheldon Kirshner in Jackson

Jackson – the state capital whose attractions range from Eudora Welty House to the Mississippi Museum of Art – was caught up in the spiralling turmoil.

Medgar Evers, the leader of the Mississippi branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), was murdered by a Ku Klux Klan member, Byron De La Beckwith.

Rabbi Perry Nussbaum, the Toronto-born spiritual leader of Beth Israel Congregation, Jackson's only synagogue, which serves about 230 families today, was awoken from his sleep when a bomb planted by the Klan exploded in front of his home. He had incurred the wrath of white supremacists – not to mention some of his own rattled congregants – by aligning himself with the cause of equal rights. The Nussbaum incident occurred about two months after Beth Israel was damaged in a bombing perpetrated by the KKK and condemned by a coalition of clergymen.

One of Beth Israel's congregants, Beatrice (Bea) Gotthelf, now 90, remembers that dark epoch quite vividly.

"It was a frightening time," she said in a recent interview conducted in the office of the Goldring/ Woldenberg Institute of Southern Jewish Life, which supports congregational religious schools, provides rabbinic and cultural services and maintains a web-based archive on Southern Jewish communities.

Gotthelf, who was born in Jackson and whose ancestors from Alsace settled in Mississippi in the 19th century, was not a firebrand like Rabbi Nussbaum.

"My husband and I were not actively involved in promoting civil rights," said Gotthelf, whose father was president of the Rotary Club and chair of the Chamber of Commerce and the school board. "Nor were my friends and acquaintances involved. That would have been too large a step to take. We couldn't put our lives and that of children in jeopardy. The Klan was after the blacks and Jews."

Intellectually, however, the Gotthelfs were in total sympathy with the aims of the civil rights movement, believing that integration was morally the right path to follow.

"Bea is a real hero to the Jackson Jewish community today," said Stuart Rockoff, the director of the history department of the Goldring/ Woldenberg Institute of Southern Jewish Life. "She, along with a handful of other members from Beth Israel, worked to bring about peaceful change in a time of tremendous fear and violence."

He added, "Hers was a minority view perhaps, as most Jackson Jews feared the repercussions of speaking out."

Much as in apartheid era South Africa, the southern states, though having lost the U.S. Civil War over slavery, were committed to preserving Jim Crow laws, regulations and customs (under which African-Americans were denied the most basic services and freedoms) and were resolutely opposed to civil rights and desegregation.

Bea Gotthelf

To liberal Americans who abhorred white-supremacist doctrines, Mississippi seemed to be the archetypical southern state.

In 1946, Theodore Bilbo, a U.S. senator from Mississippi, declared, "I am calling upon every red-blooded American who believes in the superiority and integrity of the white race to get out and see that no blacks vote." And in a suggestion rife with visions of KKK members burning crosses, he said ominously, "The best time to do it is the night before."

Stuart Rockoff

Mississippi's small Jewish community – which consisted of 6,420 individuals at its height in 1927 but which has declined to 1,500 people today – was keenly aware that white supremacy was an article of faith among many whites and quietly complied.

As Rockoff has written, "During the civil rights movement, many Jews shared the prejudices of their white gentile neighbors, although others spoke out in favour of racial equality and integration."

Craving acceptance, Jews assimilated into Southern culture, embracing its values. Some Jews, including an anonymous writer of a pamphlet titled A Jewish View of Segregation, were dyed-in-the-wool supporters of the racist status quo.

Published in 1956 under the auspices of Citizens' Councils of America, a white supremacist group formed after the 1954 U.S. Supreme Court decision calling segregated schools unconstitutional, the pamphlet was essentially a defence of segregation and a critique of national Jewish organizations, such as B'nai Brith, that supported desegregation.

The still-unidentified Jewish author wrote, "I am wholeheartedly in favour of the advancement of the coloured people of the State of Mississippi. I am wholeheartedly opposed to the thinking of those who claim it can be achieved by integration." In an impassioned plea, he urged white Southerners, both Christians and Jews, to "maintain segregation."

Gotthelf and her late husband, Harold, a shopkeeper born in Vicksburg, Miss., disagreed with these bald sentiments. Harold, who died in 1987, aroused the indignation of the Citizen's Council by attending a meeting at Tougaloo College, a historically African-American institution in Jackson. Several of its students had been arrested for trying to read books in the "white only" public library, and as a result, Tougaloo College was carefully monitored by the Mississippi State Sovereignty Commission, a state-funded agency that staunchly opposed desegregation.

In November 1962, one of its investigators, A.L. Hopkins, filed a report saying that Harold Gotthelf had been present at a meeting at Tougaloo College, thereby unmasking him as a race "traitor."

Gotthelf's father-in-law, the proprietor of a dry-cleaning store at which her husband helped out, was in trouble, too, having refused to abide by a Citizens' Council order to fire a worker who was trying to desegregate schools in Jackson. "You will lose business," he was warned. "You better watch out." The warning turned out to be nothing more than a bluff, said Gotthelf, a spry woman.

She is of two minds about Rabbi Nussbaum, who served Beth Israel from 1954 to 1973 and moved to San Diego, Calif., after his retirement. "He was unbelievable," she said. "He put his life on the line. His congregation was not too happy. But he had an unfortunate personality. He could be abrasive, argumentative and self-centred. He didn't have a personality that drew you to him. But I agreed with him politically."

At one point, she and her husband considered leaving Mississippi, but shelved the idea after concluding that racial progress was partially dependent on people like herself and her husband. "I was afraid that nothing would change," she explained. "I felt a responsibility."

Although she has lived long enough to have witnessed the dawn of a new age in racial relations in Mississippi, she thinks that many whites still hew to white supremacist beliefs.

Yet times have changed. Jackson, whose population is predominantly black, has an African-American mayor, and its airport is named after Medgar Evers, the martyred African-American civil rights leader.

Hazzan Louis Danto ז"ל

Painting by David Nemtzov

The Cantors Assembly mourns the passing of its legendary member, Hazzan Louis Danto. Without question, he was one of the most gifted pulpit artists of the second half of the 20th century. He became internationally recognized for the rare beauty and purity of his voice; its mastery, power and control, and for his breathtaking emotional expression. New York Times reporter Allan Rich wrote, "A voice of great beauty, clear and true... breathtaking, radiant, as though from another world." He performed solo recitals throughout the world including Carnegie Hall. And, for a quarter century, completing his synagogue career, he served Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in Toronto with great distinction.

We convey our deepest condolences to his wife, Rouhama, and to his children, Annette Danto, Denise Lash and David Danto, as well as his grandchildren.

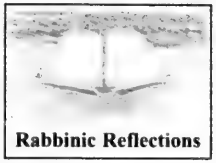
Will we learn from the BP oil spill?

By RABBI LESLIE LIPSON



Rabbinic Reflections

For approximately three months, we watched as BP, scientists, politicians and engineers have tried to repair the hole at the bottom of the Gulf of Mexico. For approximately three months, we watched as this hole in the bottom of the ocean continued to spew tens of thousands of barrels of oil per day.

Now we watch and wait to see if the current cap will contain the pressure, while hoping that no leaks spring from the bottom of the ocean floor as the pressure spreads elsewhere.

From a spiritual perspective, this environmental tragedy is a result of mankind's arrogance and hubris. Leaders of industry and of nations assume we can drill holes in the earth without attention to potentially deadly and catastrophic consequences. Our frustration and ensuing sense of helpless-ness is a manifestation of our spiritual awareness that perhaps we crossed a spiritual boundary – we meddled where we had no business meddling, and perhaps we eternally harmed God's creation.

Mankind's arrogance and hubris is nothing new. It's as old as the Tower of Babel and as recent as our presumption that we can create openings and cavities in God's creation without concern for potential damage. While this hubris and arrogance abounds, it's reassuring that in the fourth century, Rav Abbayei introduced a prayer for use upon leaving the washroom that appears in the Talmud (Masechet Brachot) and is known as Asher Yatzar.

This brachah remind us of our own limitations and God's ingenuity regarding creation, and that God's creation is truly wondrous. We thank God for fashioning man with wisdom and creating within him openings and cavities. We acknowledge that if one of these openings or cavities were to be ruptured or blocked, it would be impossible to survive and stand before God.

The blessing concludes by praising God, "rofeh chol basar umafli la'asot," who heals all flesh and acts wondrously. The Beis Yosef (Rabbi Joseph Caro) comments that "acting wondrously" is the delicate balance of all the organs working in concert to function as they're supposed to.

Some 1,600 years ago, our sages appreciated the wonder of pipes and tubes that allowed the human body to function normally. With this acknowledgment came the humility that a human being, a microcosm of creation, is a delicate balance of God's wisdom, so the same may be said of our global environment. Tragically, we have ruptured the earth. Instead of fulfilling the mission of "l'avodah u'leshomrah," to work and guard (Gen. 2:15) and behave wisely in regard to our environment, arrogance, hubris and a lack of wisdom have left an entire chunk of North America catastrophically damaged for many decades to come.

It's safe to assume that Rav Abbayei and the rest of Chazal didn't anticipate mankind's creating holes miles below the earth and placing tubes in these opening in order to release the earth's energy. Now that we have demonstrated the capability to do that, perhaps we should have an even greater sense of awe at God's wonder and creation, and all the pipes and tubes that are part of it.

May we have the wisdom to quickly fix this man-made rupture and clean up the polluted coastline, and may we be wise enough to learn from this.

The choice is ours

Midrashic Moments
By Rachael Turkienicz

It's still the middle of summer, a beautiful summer with sunshine and breezes. Just as we begin to relax and enjoy all of it, the month of Elul is upon us and we start the preparations for Rosh Hashanah.

It always seems to come early or late. I've never heard anyone express that Rosh Hashanah has arrived just on time. People are either excited by the new beginnings that the holiday brings, or they're stressed by the technical preparations and the clock ticking. It seems the holiday is enjoyed less than a beautiful summer day is enjoyed. It seems that the holidays have become heavy for us to carry.

Interestingly, there is a similarity between these feelings about Rosh Hashanah and the Torah text that informs the prayers of Elul. Many times throughout the month of Elul, as well as the High Holidays, we'll be reading of God's Thirteen Attributes, the list God reveals to Moses on Mount Sinai that reflects God's manifestations into the world. It's the text surrounding the Golden Calf incident. We study the beautiful intimacy between God and Moses as we study the ultimate betrayal by the Jewish nation. The two extremes of the Jewish experience have now been set at the same moment.

The entire Sinai experience revolves around the offering and receiving of the Covenant. The relationship between the Jewish People and God will find its expression through the language of mitzvot, commandments. Our souls can express their inner vision through the actions of our bodies governed by the parameters of Jewish commandments. It's how we all recognize a mensch when we see one.

In this way, the commandments carry us. We rely on them to challenge our thinking and push us to ask fundamental questions of free will and expression. No one can force me to obey a Jewish commandment. It must be the choice of my heart. At the same time, I've been commanded to understand my choices, so I must involve my brain as well as my heart. But I'm forbidden to explore the soul of anyone else, which will keep me from judging another person's spiritual choices. Guided by these principles, the Jewish commandments carry each person while broadening their vision and empowering their free will.

If we strip them of their power to carry us, they'll become dead weight. The moment a mitzvah is more burden than growth, it can become the prison that locks us in – the opposite of a living Torah. The difference doesn't lie in the commandment, but in our interaction with it.

This difference is the crux of how the midrash sees Moses' breaking the tablets at Mount Sinai. According to the midrash, the writings on the tablets – God's handwriting – had life within them, and they carried the weight of the stone. When Moses carried these tablets down the mountain and the Golden Calf came into view, the letters chose to return to God and left the tablets. Now what was previously carried by spirituality became dead weight in Moses' arms and he could no longer carry them.

Elul is the month we believe Moses returned to Mount Sinai to rewrite the commandments. His arms knew what it felt like to carry commandments that empower versus the burden of dead rock. Rosh Hashanah is the first holiday of the Jewish year. How we encounter it still remains our choice.

Ancient inscription found in Jerusalem

Past Forward
By Alex Gropper

I have written a number of columns about the discovery of written materials in ancient Israel. Much was made of a recent discovery of an inscription with strong biblical overtones dated to the 10th century BCE from the Elah Valley, west of Jerusalem. What made this inscription biblically relevant was its strong moral undertone, since it supposedly dealt with the protection of widows and orphans. The 10th century BCE also happens to be the time in which many scholars place David and Solomon.

The saying "it never rains, it pours" appears to be holding true for biblical archeology as well. My friend Elat Mazar, with whom I worked at the City of David Excavations in Jerusalem in the late 1970s and early 1980s, has found a small inscription that dates to the 14th century BCE in excavations she heads in Jerusalem. The inscription is about 600 years older than any previous inscription that has been found in Jerusalem.

Mazar's archeological pedigree is impeccable. Her grandfather, Benjamin Mazar, was one of the first Jewish archeologists working in Israel, even before its independence in 1948. He was also president of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem in the 1950s. But his greatest claim to fame came from directing excavations around the Temple Mount immediately after the Six Day War in 1967.

It is just to the southeast of her grandfather's excavations that Mazar is now excavating. Her dig is at the highest part of the ancient City of David, the Ophel, where archeologists have found evidence of Jerusalem's earliest habitation going back to the dawn of civilization in the Near East some 5,000 years ago.

The recent inscription is not the first headline-grabbing information that has emerged from Mazar's dig. She has found evidence of a huge monumental structure that some claim may even be the remains of David or Solomon's palace. It's beneath this 10th century BCE structure that the inscription was found. It has been tentatively dated to the 14th century BCE, a period known as the Late Bronze Age (circa 1550 to 1200 BCE), which was called the First International Age by the renowned American Orientalist James Henry Breasted, founder of the University of Chicago's famed Oriental Institute.

It was to this time period in the 14th century BCE that one of the greatest international archive, the Amarna Letters – which was found in Egypt at the end of the 19th century – has been dated to. The letters belonged to the court of the heretic pharaoh, Akhenaten.

Both the Amarna Archive and the recently found Jerusalem inscription share another important trait. They were written in Akkadian using cuneiform script. Both Akkadian and cuneiform were the lingua franca of the time. In other words, this was both the language, and script, of diplomatic correspondence during the Late Bronze Age.

Cuneiform is considered to be the oldest form of writing, having been invented in Mesopotamia at the dawn of civilization some 5,000 years ago. In fact the invention of writing is one of the most important things that defines "civilization" in a scholarly sense.

The significance of the Jerusalem inscription is that it shows the city to have been a centre of scribal activity, even before its conquest by David. Indeed a number of documents in the Amarna Archive are from Jerusalem and its king, IR-heba.

Significantly, we now have even more evidence showing that writing was used in ancient Canaan. This discovery provides more ammunition to use against those who maintain that literacy was not practised in ancient Israel and that the Bible was composed quite late.

As Elul approaches

"Ani LeDodi VeDodi Li."

"I am to my Beloved and my Beloved is to me." – Song of Songs 6:3

Although this beautiful phrase has adorned many ketubot and wedding rings, it takes on special significance at this time of year. The first letters of "Ani LeDodi Ve Dodi" also form the Hebrew acronym "Elul," the special month of repentance that proceeds Rosh Hashanah and begins next Tuesday.

As for "Ani LeDodi," the two lovers in this case are the Jewish People and God. During Elul, they solidify their relationship as the Jewish People address their beloved and repent for any wrongs done. God, in turn, returns the gesture and forgives His beloved. [http://bit.ly/elul01]

Jewish & Digital

There are many other metaphors used for that special relationship during this month. Mystics refer to Elul as "the time the King is in the field." Before Rosh Hashanah, the King, God, leaves his palace to survey all His workers in the fields. And that makes Him particularly approachable to our requests for the coming year. [http://bit.ly/elul02]

If you want to get practical about getting into shape for the New Year, check out Aish HaTorah's Growth Worksheet. Rabbi Shraga Simmons lists 50 questions to make you think about how you have led your life and assess where you are going.

- Is there any mistake that I commit habitually to the point that it no longer bothers me?
- Have I ever betrayed the trust of a friend?
- Do I view events in my life as random occurrences or as powerful spiritual messages? [http://bit.ly/elul03]

Sometimes trying to answer a list of questions can be a bit daunting. In Breaking Bad Habits, Shira Markowitz suggests that tshuvah, repentance, must be a slow and steady process. If you try too much, you are just setting yourself up for failure. She points out that there are 40 days between the beginning of Elul and Yom Kippur, the perfect period for self-improvement using the Personal Tshuvah Chart. [http://bit.ly/elul05]

Although we should remember to make the most of Elul, sometimes a reminder doesn't hurt. To help out, Craig Taubman has created JewelsOfElul.com. Every Elul, subscribers receive a daily e-mail with a thought or story about the month touching on repentance, forgiveness, growth and discovery. Or as Taubman calls it, "Guilt-free inspiration for the High Holy Days."

You can look over five years' worth of thoughts from mostly Jewish contributors, including movie producer Jeffrey Katzenberg, reggae musician Matishyahu, writer Naomi Ragen, Rabbi Harold Kushner and singer Neshama Carlebach. In his entry, Israeli singer-songwriter David Broza writes how, many years ago, success also brought with it conflict, distrust and a breakup of relationships. Twenty-five years later, Broza reached out to the estranged players to attend a gala event marking their original success.

"One particular partner asked me over to his house to meet his family. The intimacy of that meeting led us to sit down and try to catch up with each other. What reappeared was the old affection and trust. Before we parted, our eyes locked and the inevitable question came up, 'What happened 25 years ago that caused this long rift?' There was a blank space. It was a moment of forgiveness. Now with a little less of a load in my soul, I can confront new dreams."

$7 million fraud at Claims Conference raises questions

By JACOB BERKMAN
JTA

NEW YORK — After discovering $7 million in fraudulent payments, the Claims Conference is facing questions about whether it will recover the money and how extensive the fraud actually was.

Officials at the Claims Conference, which acts as a pass-through to distribute more than $400 million per year from eastern European governments directly to survivors, discovered last year that it had paid out at least $7 million in pension payments dating back as far as 1980 to 202 imposters who used fraudulent documents to file claims for payments.

The Claims Conference notified the recipients earlier this month that their payments were being suspended and that they had 90 days either to return all the money they had received or appeal the suspension. Some 40 people have responded, with about half saying they wanted to return the money and half asking for appeals, according to the Claims Conference.

It's not clear what, if any, criminal charges they'll face.

"Criminal activity is not a matter for the Claims Conference," Gregory Schneider, its executive vice-president, told JTA. "We reserve the right go after them in civil court for the return of money."

Claims Conference officials first noticed last November that several claimants had falsified information to receive payments from the Hardship Fund, an account established by the German government to give one-time payments of roughly $3,000 to those who fled the Nazis as they moved east through Germany.

A further internal investigation revealed that more fraudulent claimants received payments from the organization's Article 2 fund, through which the German government gives pension payments of roughly $375 per month to those who spent either six months minimum in a concentration camp or at least 18 months in a Jewish ghetto in hiding or living under a false identity to avoid the Nazis.

Conference officials said they immediately notified the FBI and the U.S. Attorney's Office, and discussed the matter in meetings with the German government. The Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Claims Conference are continuing to investigate the matter.

> Officials immediately notified the FBI and the U.S. Attorney's Office

"We are determined to get to the bottom of this," Schneider said. "We have worked very closely with law enforcement, and on a regular basis they are in touch with us."

In total, the Claims Conference has made pension payments to more than 160,000 people in 78 countries on behalf of the Germans since the start of the Hardship Fund in 1980 and the Article 2 fund in 1995. The organization is now reviewing each of the recipients, comparing the information it has from the fraudulent claims, such as where the claims were made, to all other claims, going case by case through all their case histories.

The 202 suspects come from reviewing "thousands" of recipients, according to a Claims Conference official, but it expects to find more as the organization reviews the entire caseload.

Payments are made from Claims Conference's offices in Frankfurt, Tel Aviv and New York, but thus far, all of the suspected fraud was processed through the New York office. The discovery led to the firing of two case workers and one supervisor in that office. Schneider wouldn't comment on whether the former employees are under criminal investigation.

The fraud was reported in the New York Jewish Week just before the Claims Conference board of directors held its annual meetings in New York last month.

At the meetings, the board approved a $500,000 reserve fund "as a contingency to cover potential expenses associated with investigating the fraud and recovering the funds," according to a Claims Conference spokesperson.

The board has also spent money on public relations services from the high-profile firm Howard Rubenstein, but Claims Conference chairman Julius Berman called the sum "minimal."

The Claims Conference makes several kinds of payments. Most of the money it handles is in the form of pass-through payments from the German government to Nazi victims. The organization handled about $418 million in such payouts in 2009, and some $4 billion since 1980 from agreements negotiated between the German government and the Claims Conference acting as the representative of Nazi victims and the Jewish people. This is where the $7 million fraud was discovered.

In addition, the Claims Conference decides on how to distribute money each year from the sale of heirless Jewish property in the former East Germany. That money is distributed using a formula in which 80 per cent goes to organizations that aid survivors and 20 per cent to programs involved in Holocaust education, documentation and commemoration.

Over the past few years, however, as the Claims Conference upped the payouts from this fund – in 2010, the organization is set to distribute $136 million – the Holocaust education portion was capped at $18 million. The Claims Conference has about $1.16 billion from this fund earmarked for future payments.

The organization also distributes other funds negotiated from European governments for such issues as home care for needy, ailing survivors. The Claims Conference will distribute about $80 million in such funds this year, officials said.

"The Claims Conference has a 59-year history of working with the German government," Schneider said. "During this time, the Claims Conference has continuously negotiated for the rights of Holocaust victims, establishing compensation funds and obtaining expansions of existing programs."

He added: "While all understand that money can never truly compensate Holocaust victims for their suffering, the German government has assumed responsibility throughout the decades and acknowledged its obligation to survivors. The Claims Conference believes that the German government will continue to honor this obligation as long as Nazi victims remain alive."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Fund established to continue soldier's legacy

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Avi Schaefer was nine when he first lived in Israel. He was 18 when he left his home in California to serve as a lone soldier in the Israel Defence Forces. He was 21 when he started reaching out to Palestinian and Jewish students as a freshman at Brown University in Providence, R.I.

And he was 21 when he died.

But he's still changing the way Israel is viewed on campus. His family is making sure of that.

Schaefer, who was killed by a drunk driver in February this year, spent most of his freshman year at Brown working to create a dialogue between Israeli and Palestinian students and dispell misconceptions about Israel.

Using his charismatic personality and IDF background, Schaefer helped to humanize the conflict in the Middle East by sharing his story and his hope that, while he fought in the Israeli army, his children wouldn't have to.

A primary aim of the Avi Schaefer Fund, an organization created by his family, is to continue Schaefer's work in trying to promote peace.

"That's what Avi was doing," said his father, Rabbi Arthur Gross-Schaefer, in a phone interview, explaining that, at Brown, Schaefer joined a student group called Common Ground, whose stated goal was to open a dialogue about the Middle East. Instead, it focused mainly on the Palestinian perspective.

"He said [to them], 'You're not being fair. You're not being honest…' His goal was to say, 'I'm an Israeli soldier, look at me, hear [my story], I'll hear yours,'" Rabbi Gross-Schaefer said.

"With that type of approach, it's hard to say, 'I'm not going to listen to you because you're so terrible.' That's why we're trying to create the Avi Schaefer Fund."

The fund plans to sponsor fellowships for IDF soldiers studying at colleges or universities in North America. The former soldiers would be trained to continue with Schaefer's role as what his family calls a "soldier of peace" and would receive a stipend.

Although the rabbi and his family are starting to reach out to Jewish organizations, the fund is currently in its early stages.

It also hopes to ultimately facilitate conferences that would bring together Jewish and Palestinian students, as well as to work with universities to integrate both Israeli and Palestinian perspectives into the curriculum.

"I've been a professor for 30 years and a Hillel rabbi at different campuses. Part of the problem is that a lot of campuses I've been exposed to… have become very unfriendly to discussions about Israel," said Rabbi Gross-Schaefer, who is a professor at Loyola Marymount University, adding that, at this point, the fund is run on private donations, many of which are received internationally through PayPal.

Avi Schaefer, who was killed by a drunk driver in February, joined the IDF as a lone soldier before attending Brown University.

Rabbi Gross-Schaefer hopes to start working with schools in Canada and the United States by this fall, and to have former IDF soldiers on campuses by next year.

These soldiers will go through a screening process and basic training in how to open positive dialogues on campus.

For Schaefer's twin brother, Yoav, who currently lives in Israel, the fund is a way to continue a legacy that started during their childhood.

"We lived in a Zionist household," Yoav, 22, said, adding that the family spent a year living in Israel during their father's sabbatical.

"We decided Israel was a place we wanted to have a connection with. Over the years, it became more of a serious endeavour," he said.

The two brothers joined the IDF together, hoping not for war, but for peace.

"We really felt we were fighting to create a lasting peace," Yoav said. "It was clear to us when Avi passed away that we would create a tangible way to continue his life and legacy. We realized that Avi had already shown us the project we would do."

Noah Kochman, the advisor for communications and government relations for the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students, knew Schaefer from various Jewish conferences. Kochman sees the fund as an important step towards a better campus environment.

"I think the message of Israeli soldiers coming to campus to talk about their perspectives or a two-state solution will help to mitigate some of the stereotypes, and I think some of the lies and mischaracterizations of young people in Israel," he said.

Conversion wars undermine Israel and its image

Jewish unity must be affirmed

JTA

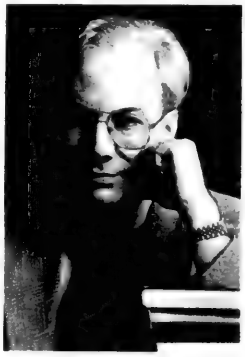
Who won the latest round of the conversion wars? No one. In these wars, everybody loses.

To be sure, a broad-based coalition of North American Jews, anchored by the federation system and the Reform and Conservative movements, succeeded in convincing Israel's leaders to delay a vote on a controversial new conversion bill in the Knesset. This was a monumental accomplishment, averting the disaster that was certain to ensue if the legislation had been adopted.

Nonetheless, there is no reason for satisfaction.

At this moment, Israel should be mobilizing her friends to confront the dangers posed by Iran. She should be responding to the outrageous anti-Israel actions of the United Nations. She should be working with the American government to advance the cause of peace.

Instead, Israel has spent several months engaged in an ugly battle with North American Jewish leadership. North American Jews committed to Israel's welfare had no choice but to join a public lobbying effort aimed at Israel's government.



By Rabbi Eric Yoffie

The confrontation included new levels of nastiness. The sponsor of the legislation, David Rotem, was quoted in the New York Times as referring to American Jewish leaders as "absolute idiots." Worse yet, if history is any guide, we will learn nothing from this experience and repeat the disastrous scenario next year or the year after that.

What's going on here?

Israeli leaders vastly underestimated how sensitive North American Jews remain about religious matters in the State of Israel. The first conversion crisis was in the 1950s, and it was assumed in Israel that the most recent dispute was nothing more than one more round in a long battle.

Yet conversions in North America are far more frequent now than they were a generation ago. Jews by choice are to be found in every community, and Jewish leaders are infuriated by legislation in Israel that they see as challenging the status of so many North American Jews.

In addition, North American Jews dislike religious fundamentalists who attempt to impose their will on others. The danger of religious extremism throughout the world is endlessly discussed in the media. North American Jews share the distress of all North Americans that Israel, a democratic ally, has created a coercive religious monopoly that limits the religious freedom of its citizens.

When U.S. senators and members of Congress expressed their concerns about the bill, Israeli representatives here began to understand just how dangerous the situation had become. American lawmakers rarely speak out on internal Israeli politics, and if they were doing so now, it could only mean deep concern on the part of their constituents.

Israeli advocates of the bill attempted to convince American Jews by confusing them. The legislation was very complicated and changed frequently. But a patronizing "You don't understand" approach did not work this time.

True, few North American Jews comprehended the bill's intricacies. But one thing about this legislation was truly important: it fundamentally altered the religious status quo by granting significant new powers in the realm of conversion to Israel's Chief Rabbinate. Such a change would reignite battles over conversion both in Israel and throughout the Diaspora. North American Jews understood this very well and remained firm in their opposition.

It would have been preferable had Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu opposed the bill in the spring, sparing the Jewish world the sorry spectacle of the past few months. Nonetheless, his decision last week to cast the bill as disastrous for the Jewish people was welcome. The prime minister was wise, too, in calling on Natan Sharansky, the chairman of the Jewish Agency for Israel, to devise an acceptable compromise.

No one should harbour any illusions. The Israeli religious parties are intent on gaining absolute control over conversion, both in the State of Israel and in matters that relate to the Law of Return. Any arrangement that gives them less than full control will never win their support.

Still, I believe that a reasonable compromise is not out of reach.

As a Reform Jewish leader, I would like to see Israel's religious monopoly swept away. I will need to accept that such a change for now is simply not possible. I do expect that additional support will be provided to Reform and Conservative schools and synagogues, but I recognize that this will have to happen within the confines of the existing structure.

At the same time, the leaders of three major non-Orthodox parties in Israel – Likud, Kadima and Labor – will need to agree that they will oppose conversion legislation and any other significant change in the religious status quo demanded by the religious parties or their allies.

Comment

Such an understanding should have been reached 30 years ago, of course, but each of the major parties has been reluctant to cede ground that might be exploited by its rivals in future coalition negotiations.

What is different this time is the terrible experience that we have just had. At a time when Israel is especially vulnerable, she has suffered through a period that has tarnished her image, upset her supporters, gladdened her enemies, played out in the general media and even reached the U.S. Congress, causing dismay to all who love the Jewish state.

Perhaps Israel's political leaders will finally understand: religious extremism must be rejected, the sensitivities of world Jewry must be respected, coalition politics must be transcended and Jewish unity must be affirmed. Neither the Jewish people nor the State of Israel can afford the heavy price of these ongoing religious crises.

Immigrants need proof of Jewishness to marry in Israel

By RAPHAEL AHREN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Immigrants applying for marriage licences are being asked by local rabbinical courts to produce ritual wedding contracts from their parents, grandparents and great-grandparents or other often unattainable documents to prove their Jewishness, Ha'aretz has learned.

One rabbi close to the affair called the new process "unprecedented humiliation," and said it was the direct consequence of new guidelines to prove Jewishness the Chief Rabbinate recently implemented.

"During the last few weeks, we've seen a dramatic increase in calls from people who fundamentally have a strong Jewish identity but have their Jewish identity challenged," said Rabbi Seth Farber, the head of Itim, a non-profit group helping Jews navigate Israel's religious bureaucracy. "They came on aliyah and are shocked that as far as the [rabbinical court] is concerned they're not Jewish... This is the first time in Jewish history that people are being asked in an unprecedented manner to prove their Jewishness. And there are no standards for proving it."

Rabbi Farber pointed to the absence of clear criteria in the new guidelines as to which documents would suffice.

"Every time [the rabbis in the local court] ask for something different, it's complete chaos," he added. "Sometimes they ask for three [generations of] ketubot, another time they ask why your birth certificate doesn't state that you're Jewish. They have no clue that in America, birth certificates don't contain such information."

One woman was told to undergo a conversion process because the rabbi in the religious council questioned the authenticity of her paperwork "without even asking the most basic questions" or making any other efforts to assert her Jewishness, Rabbi Farber added.

The Rabbinate responded that it had not received specific complaints but is ready to adapt its guidelines if Rabbi Farber's claims are substantiated.

Israel lacks any framework for civil marriage, forcing couples to either go through the Rabbinate or marry abroad. Couples have long complained of the difficult process of convincing the Rabbinate's marriage department of one's Jewishness, forcing many immigrants to produce hard-to-obtain documents or letters from overseas rabbis recognized by the Rabbinate.

Rabbi Michael Melchior

But the new guidelines – which automatically send marriage candidates whose parents did not wed in Israel to a local rabbinical court to attest their Judaism – make the process even more distressing, according to Rabbi Michael Melchior, an Orthodox former Labor member of the Knesset and chief rabbi in Norway.

Rabbi Melchior, too, received many complaints from distressed couples, he said, relating the story of one immigrant woman who has four Jewish grandparents.

"Nobody ever doubted this, but she can't satisfy what they want from her," he said. "They don't accept the letter from the [Scandinavian] rabbinate anymore, even a very Orthodox rabbinate doesn't count anymore. The [rabbinical court] said there's nothing wrong with the letter but it doesn't count for anything, we need birth and death certificates for three generations."

Rabbi Melchior says he understands a rabbi's need to demand some kind of proof in certain cases. "But that people have to have birth and death certificates for three generations – I don't know anybody who has that," he said.

Progressive Jewish groups say they plan to fight the new regulations, opening another front in their battle against what they see as an attempted takeover of religious life in Israel by haredim. The leaders of the Reform and Conservative communities in Israel and in North America have harshly condemned a bill that would effectively give the haredi-dominated Rabbinate sole authority over conversions to Judaism.

Rabbi Seth Farber

The local Reform movement's Israel Religious Action Center (IRAC) told Ha'aretz it approached the State Attorney's office and Justice Minister Yaakov Neeman demanding the cancellation of the new rules when they were issued in May.

"These regulations were written without jurisdiction. Regulations that have legal implications can only be issued and signed by the minister," said Nicole Maor-Center, who directs IRAC's legal aid centre for new immigrants.

IRAC sent two letters to the Rabbinate's legal adviser, asking him to revoke the new regulations. If no one responds to the communication within one week, the group will petition the High Court of Justice, she said yesterday.

Avi Blumenthal, an assistant to Chief Rabbi Yona Metzger, told Ha'aretz that legal advisers had looked into the matter and concluded the Rabbinate has the right to establish procedural guidelines.

The Rabbinate says the new rules were instituted to protect brides and grooms-to-be from corrupt private individuals or organizations that often charge large amounts of money to attest to someone's Jewishness. In the past, several local rabbinates had sent couples to such people, who also often have stringent demands, Blumenthal said. Now, only certifications by recognized rabbinical courts are being accepted, he added.

Blumenthal denies the new rules made life more difficult for candidates. They do not require proof of Judaism for three generations, he said, adding he was unaware of cases where this was asked.

"If one [local] rabbi did something improper and didn't follow our regulations we'll invite him" to discuss the matter, he told Ha'aretz. "If there are specific instances [of excessive demands] and we find the claims to be justified, we will discuss them and we will find a solution."

However, a handful of couples that recently filed for a marriage licence told Ha'aretz their interaction with the Rabbinate was burdensome, with one person calling it "complicated and ugly."

One American-born woman, who filed for a marriage licence two weeks ago and now finds herself struggling to document her Jewishness, told Ha'aretz she hesitates to reveal to certain people she's having issues with the Rabbinate.

"Perhaps some of them might think I'm not legitimately Jewish. That is a weird feeling," she said. "It's alienating."

She says she considered marrying overseas to circumvent the Israeli system, "But that's just not the way I imagined my wedding," she said.

Eran, who was born in Israel and moved to New Jersey, has a birth certificate stating he is Jewish. Yet when he filed for a marriage licence earlier this month – he is marrying an Israeli in Israel and is considering moving back to Israel – the Rabbinate questioned his Jewishness.

"My family is not observant, and since I taught Judaism for so many years, they jokingly call me the family rabbi," Eran, 39, said. "For someone to say to me, 'Prove that you're Jewish,' is chutzpah."

Since his parents came to Israel from Communist Poland, they no longer have their ketubah, he says, adding that he is currently struggling to think of another way to demonstrate he's a Jew. "It's impossible to prove these things, but I shouldn't even have to prove them."

For many Jews, their wedding is the first time they interact with the Rabbinate. Rabbi Melchior said. "It should be a meeting that brings them to feeling uplifted, to a feeling of a Judaism that can be important to their lives," he said. "Instead it becomes a nightmare. And it's totally unnecessary, that's what's so absurd. It's as if we're asking new immigrants not to come to this country."

> 'People have to have birth and death certificates for three generations – I don't know anybody who has that'

Immigrants from western countries have been hit especially hard by the Rabbinate's new guidelines, according to Rabbi Farber. As opposed to immigrants from the former Soviet Union – where birth certificates indicated a person's religion – western newcomers are often at a loss about what additional papers to give a rabbinical court to prove their claim.

"There is an enormous gap between the expectations of the Rabbinate and the window they have on the landscape of American or British Jewry," said Rabbi Farber, who was born in New York and now lives in Ra'anana. "Rabbis serving in the rabbinical courts think that there are records there like there are here, but there are no official rabbinical courts in America. And the vast majority of Jews are not affiliated with the Orthodox community. There is no one in the Rabbinate who is an expert on North American Jewry who can help people navigate the system."

Rabbi Farber thus considers calling on the Rabbinate to appoint a "troubleshooter" for North Americans who do not know how to prove their Judaism. He also believes there should be a review of the guidelines, as currently they are not clear about what constitutes conclusive evidence of one's background, he said.

Blumenthal told Ha'aretz that if Rabbi Farber can show his claims to be true, the rabbis would consider issuing new guidelines specific for U.S. Jews.

"We don't barricade ourselves, we are not obstructive. On the contrary, we are happy when people tell us about problems," he said.

Criticism of Israel: a line must be drawn

In the July 19/26 issue, in a letter to the editor, one of The Nation's prominent columnists, Eric Alterman, who writes on the media, rebuked the magazine over its stridently anti-Israel editorial "Free Gaza" (June 21) which dealt with the flotilla saga.

While claiming up front that he "strongly oppose[d]" Israel's blockade of Gaza, Alterman held nothing back about the magazine's extreme one-sidedness: "There is no notion at all that any sane person in Israel or Egypt or the West Bank would ever have a problem with anything Hamas has ever done or have any reason for concern if it ruled the country on its borders and had the power to kill whomever it liked by whatever means it liked. You'd never know, either, that it is a regressive, totalitarian, anti-Semitic political movement opposed to liberalism in all its forms, particularly as it relates to women. This editorial, like most Nation editorials, assumes Israel is 100 per cent at fault in this conflict and that whoever opposes it is 100 per cent correct. It is the mirror image of the right-wing Zionist viewpoint it attacks. As such, it can have no relevance to the views of anyone who takes the complications of the conflict seriously in hopes of finding a solution that might one day be acceptable to the country The Nation consistently demonizes."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Whether Alterman's days with the magazine are numbered (as happened years ago when a more famous previous columnist, Chris Hitchens, quit in protest) remains to be seen. Unlike Hitchens, Alterman has not moved to the right. And it cannot be ignored that Alterman himself has indulged occasionally in unfair, one-sided censure of Israel. But it is significant that he has – finally – stood up against the increasingly widespread bankruptcy of the far left that, like the far right, seeks only to delegitimize Israel in cartoon-like fashion.

At least among some within the left, who care about intellectual honesty and fairness as an inherent part of their concern for social and political justice, there is a growing recognition that a line must be drawn between legitimate and illegitimate criticism of Israel.

Shira Herzog addressed this important subject in her July 14 Globe and Mail column, "What does pro-Israel mean?"

It's unfortunate that Herzog drew an over-simplified contrast between those within the Jewish community who defended Israel's stand in the flotilla incident and those who criticized it. She depicted a fundamental divide between traditional organizations and "liberal" ones. However, Herzog failed to note that there are numerous liberal-minded Jews within traditional organizations who, though far from jingoistic, maintain that much criticism, including that of the flotilla operation, is so extreme and rampant – to the point of dangerous – that it needs to be countered.

Herzog in fact went on to acknowledge this concern when she drew attention to a study done by the Tel Aviv-based Reut Institute about what it calls "the delegitimization network." She explained that this network is a "disparate, largely viral coalition [that] links European and North American radical left NGOs and fundamentalist Islamic groups in rejecting Israel's legitimacy. In other words, they don't distinguish between Israel and its continued occupation of Palestinians and territory. They're focused not on resolving the Palestinian issue through a two-state deal that would respect Israel's territorial integrity and Jewish majority alongside a Palestinian state, but on branding Israel as a pariah internationally. (The loose network includes the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement.)"

She continued: "This heightened vulnerability leads many pro-Israel advocates to reject expressions of 'critical support' because insidious efforts to delegitimize Israel gain credibility when Jewish voices rally against its policies."

Space does not allow for a more detailed examination of Herzog's nuanced account of what distinguishes valid critics from "delegitimizers." But the discussion is important, and her views should be considered when confronting those who cross this line.

Israel's Delek and Shell Canada revive talks on refinery sale

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL – A U.S. subsidiary of Delek Group – one of Israel's largest conglomerates, whose roots are in the gas station business – last week restarted talks with Shell Canada to buy the oil company's refinery in Montreal's east end.

"This is the final attempt," Shell spokesperson Larry Lalonde said last week.

The apparently last-ditch effort to hammer out a deal came after Shell and Delek-U.S. appeared to bow to political pressure from a House of Commons committee to renew talks in order to save jobs.

Before the committee convened, Delek-U.S. reportedly declared it was no longer interested in buying the facility, which Shell has said it wants to convert to a fuel terminal that would require a fraction of the refinery's workforce if a sale doesn't go through.

Shell cites high operating and upgrading costs, which have been estimated at between $600 million and $800 million, as reasons for wanting to sell or convert the plant.

A reported 500 jobs – most of them unionized – are directly at stake, and 400 others indirectly, at the 77-year-old refinery. Another 2,500 jobs outside the facility depend on it.

Delek-U.S. and Shell Canada restarted talks in the more-than-year-long sale process after Shell gave the Israeli-owned company 48 hours last week to reconsider its decision to walk away from the table in July.

The middle of August is the outside deadline for crude oil to be delivered to the refinery – Shell Canada's largest of three in this country – if renewed talks to sell it to Delek-U.S fail.

A view of Shell Canada's east-end refinery from Sherbrooke Street East.

Although other companies initially expressed interest in buying the facility, they bowed out, and Tennessee-based Delek-U.S. Holdings Inc., reportedly became the only viable contender.

If the sale doesn't proceed, the refinery would stop accepting oil mid-month, and on Sept. 10, a court injunction blocking Shell from dismantling the facility would expire. The injunction had been sought by the union that represents workers at the plant.

In November, the process to convert the refinery into an oil distribution terminal would begin, but that facility would employ only about 40 people.

The sticking points in the sale appeared to be the price and "changeover" issues such as maintenance costs. According to news reports, Shell said it would be willing sell the refinery to Delek-U.S. for the "offer sheet" price of up to $200 million, plus an additional $400 million in working capital and $500 million in capital investments, such as maintenance and upgrades.

In the deal, Delek-U.S. would also acquire a 19 per cent stake in Portland Pipe Line Ltd., putting the total price tag at more than $1 billion.

But as of last week, Delek-U.S., had not made a formal offer and was reportedly balking at picking up the high cost of upgrading and maintaining the facility, which could require a shutdown until next spring.

Rumours were also afloat that as part of any deal, Delek-U.S. was hoping to acquire a share of Shell's network of 1,600 branded stations in Canada, and had a particular interest in its Quebec and Maritimes gas stations.

CBC reported last month that Shell Canada rejected a $420-million offer from Delek for the refinery plus Shell's gas stations in Quebec and Atlantic Canada. Sources said it was Delek's third bid, but Shell was holding out for $500 million.

The Montreal refinery processes 130,000 barrels of oil daily. Shell Canada has two others, one in Sarnia and the other in Edmonton.

Delek-U.S. currently runs a 60,000-barrel-a-day refinery in Texas and a network of convenience stores in eight American states.

Jewish Heritage Centre cuts staff in restructuring

BY MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada (JHC) is in the process of restructuring its operations, with a resulting reduction in staff.

Fran Barrett, executive director for the past four years, Carla Divinsky, the Holocaust education organizer for nine years, and Ava Block-Super, researcher and archival assistant, have all been given notice. Stan Carbone, director of programs and exhibits, will remain in his position, and a part-time office manager has been hired for the summer.

President Dan Stone said the cuts are a result of a number of special grants running out, not a shortfall in the centre's annual operating budget.

Measures a result of special grants ending

"We have been very busy over the past few years with the reconstruction [and downsizing] of our office space [at the Asper Jewish Community Campus], setting up our corridor displays and publishing Coming of Age [the prize-winning history of Winnipeg's Jewish community by Allan Levine]," Stone said.

"We had received special grants for these projects and expanded our operations. Now that we are in a quieter period, we are restructuring our office staff to better reflect our actual financial realities. We have no major projects planned for the next year."

Stone said the JHC's normal operating budget is about $250,000 a year, with much of that coming from the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and endowment funds from the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba.

He added that he very much regretted having to cut dedicated staffers.

Despite the cutbacks, Stone promised that it will be business as usual at the JHC, with a new exhibit dedicated to Jewish war veterans slated to open in August and the second Switzer Cooperstock Prize Lecture a go for Oct. 3. The speaker this year will be Prof. Lynne Marks from the University of Victoria talking about the interplay between ethnicity and religion.

The JHC's Holocaust education programs will also continue as usual.

He said the JHC board will be meeting in the near future to determine staffing needs for the fall.

Israeli campers enjoy a Maritimes summer

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

BARSS CORNER, N.S.— Thirty-one Israeli have had a Nova Scotia camp adventure at Camp Kadimah this summer, and along the way, they've learned about a new country and their counterparts in it.

The 2010 camp season was a little more than two weeks old in mid-July when five of those campers gathered to discuss life in their new surroundings and talk about people they had never met before who have quickly become lifelong friends.

"I made friends the first day," said Noy Hemon, 16, a counsellor-in-training from Yesod Hermaala in the Upper Galilee. "I found everyone so very friendly and open."

Camp Kadimah is located 100 kilometres from Halifax, in Barss Corner, N.S. Now in its 67th year, Kadimah has more than 225 campers, plus 90 counsellors, programming and administrative staff. It draws children from the Atlantic provinces, across Canada and throughout the United States.

There are six Israelis in the counsellor-in-training program (ages 16-17), 18 in Kadimah's Machar group (14-15 years of age) and seven in Kochot (12-13). There are also three staff members, one a chaperone who travelled with the young people from Israel and is a CIT, and two on head staff – one as head of song and dance and the other leading drama programs.

The Israelis were partially funded by a scholarship program supported by Canadian alumni of Camp Kadimah. Six children received backing from the P2K partnership between northern Israeli communities and Canadian cities.

Camp director Joanna Wexler said donations are still being accepted to offset the campers' expenses, estimated to be about $6,500 per camper, including airfare.

"The benefit of [bringing Israelis to camp] is the relationship it creates between the Israelis and Canadians. The Canadians can leave camp with Israel being alive to them – not just propaganda, but having met real people. And the Israelis leave knowing they are not alone and isolated, that there are kids their age who know of them and care about them."

Tom Talsmith, 13, from Gadot, in the Upper Galilee, said each Canadian is different but he's found that all the kids love Israel. "I didn't know it would be like that."

Hemon nodded his head in agreement. "Many kids now want to go to Israel, or, if they've been there, want to go back."

Hemon and the other CITs had just returned from Halifax a day before (July 15), where they attended a Halifax Jazz Festival concert featuring Israeli guitar-tuba trio Boom Pam. "Everyone loved it. It was a lot of fun, especially when they did Hebrew songs."

One of the goals of the Israelis is to improve their English.

"I try to speak English all the time," Talsmith said, although others admitted they speak Hebrew to each other when they're together.

Maya Kahalani, 16, of Kiryat Shmona, in the Upper Galilee, said the Israelis "have to speak English if we're going to learn. Some of the Canadians try to speak Hebrew to us, and we encourage that so they can learn, but our aim is to improve our English."

Shon El-Yam, 15, of Kibbutz Urin, near Sderot, 15, has enjoyed new activities he'd never experienced in Israel. "Water skiing is a lot of fun.

Eli Arliuk, 16, of Kibbutz Ayelet Hashachar in the Upper Galilee, has taken to softball, while Noy enjoys canoeing and social nights.

Thirty-one youngsters from various areas in Israel enjoyed camping life at Camp Kadimah in Nova Scotia this year. They were supported by funding from Jewish agencies and Kadimah alumni. Among those going home with fond memories are, back left and right, Noy Hemon and Maya Kahalani, and front, from left, Shon El-Yam, Eli Arliuk and Tom Talsmith.

Wexler, in her fifth and final year as director, has seen Israeli children attend camp for several years.

"We're lucky with this group," she said. "They've integrated so well. They've said they feel like they've been here for years and want to come back," although, with the demand and desire to create exposure for different youngsters, the program doesn't allow return visits.

Wexler said some programming has been geared to making the Israelis feel at home. "At our Oneg Shabbats, we have more contemporary Israeli music. We're even doing an immigration project focusing on Pier 21 [in Halifax], and the Israelis have been contributing."

Assistant director Jared Goldlust, who will become director next summer, said Israelis arrive at Kadimah with the misconception that young people around the world don't support them.

"When they leave here, they've met 300 new people who care about them," he said.

Israeli consul visits Camp Kadimah in N.S.

Atlantic Correspondent

BARSS CORNER, N.S.— The eyes of Avraham (Avi) Lev-Louis and his wife Batia were opened wide and their jaws were dropping in amazement as they toured Camp Kadimah last month.

"Magnificent." "Wow" "Everyone is so happy" – these were only a few of the remarks from the Israel's consul for Montreal and Eastern Canada and his wife, who were making their first official visit to Atlantic Canada since he assumed his role last September.

Guided by camp director Joanna Wexler, assistant director Jared Goldlust and camp committee co-chair Michael Pink, they spent several hours July 16 watching campers enjoy their activities. Avi also spoke for about 20 minutes, in Hebrew, to 31 Israeli kids currently attending Kadimah, and he briefly addressed the entire camp during lunch in the mess hall.

Avi has a a strong understanding of Canada and Canadian Jewish camping, having spent many of his formative years in Montreal before returning to Israel at age 27 to do army service and join the foreign diplomatic corps. He has spent consular time in Dublin and Prague, plus Ottawa and Toronto, before accepting his most recent posting.

He and Batia were awed by the artwork of current and former campers on a mural near the outdoor sport field, a project funded by the New York-based Foundation for Jewish Camps. Later, Avi photographed a mural of a large map of Israel, created by the camp's CITs in 2007, and joked, "Israel seems larger here."

Casually dressed in a short-sleeved dress shirt and jeans, Avi was excited about the integration of Israeli programming and the emphasis on the links between Israel and the Diaspora.

While speaking with the Israeli campers, he sensed their excitement at being in Canada. Each camper introduced himself or herself and said where they lived in Israel.

Avi stressed that Israel isn't a "war country" but one of culture and education and peace, and he spoke to them with pride about the wonderful inventions and health advances that have come out of Israel.

Speaking to the entire camp, he noted that his role as consul is to identify shared values between Israel and Canada. "The favourite part of the job is the cultural aspect, but my job is also to explain Israel's political position. I'm very proud to speak of Israel's accomplishments in the world that have helped society as a whole."

He mentioned the millions of people integrated into Israeli society from places such as Russia, Ethiopia and, many years ago, from Europe after the Holocaust. He also noted that times are challenging for Israel, with the constant threat of terrorism and the anti-Semitism that just won't go away.

"I hope you will be inspired to help Israel so there will be peace and prosperity, there and in the entire world," he told the campers.

In appreciation for the lunch he and Batia enjoyed, Avi presented camp cook Anne Joudrey with The Book of Jewish Food by Janna Gur.

While in Halifax, Avi and Batia attended the Halifax Jazz Festival, thoroughly enjoying a Thursday-evening concert by Israeli guitar-tuba trio Boom Pam.

"The Halifax community, both Jewish and non-Jewish, was very welcoming to Boom Pam. There were no demonstrations, just appreciation of great talent," he said.

He also addressed the congregation of Shaar Shalom Synagogue at Shabbat services Saturday morning July 17.

"This is my first trip to Nova Scotia and the smaller communities. [The consular office] doesn't get to the Maritimes often enough, and we should be here more. It's important, but there is a lot of work in the Montreal office, too," he said.

Obituary

Bandleader Nat Raider dies

By DAVID LAZARUS

Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — For decades, if you went to a wedding, bar mitzvah or party in town and saw that the Nat Raider Orchestra was playing, you knew you were in for something special.

As was noted by many following his death from cancer on July 24, just 10 days shy of his 81st birthday, Raider was more than just a Montreal or Jewish community institution. He was also an accomplished musician in his own right, a devoted family man and soft-spoken gentleman of the highest order, and a man who lived an "amazing, joyous" life, his daughter, Barbara Teplitsky, said.

Raider also showed prescient business acumen as the driving force behind Nat Raider Productions, which grew from the mid-1960s onward into a leading all-inclusive "special event" coordinating company.

During his orchestra's heyday before it disbanded more than a decade ago, the dashing Raider, an imposing six-foot- three and sporting trademark whiskers, was instantly recognizable, deftly wielding his baton or playing his trumpet before hundreds at Jewish and non-Jewish events.

He liked to refer to himself as "Bandleader to the Stars," a 1989 CJN profile said, for producing show music and accompanying countless performers and singers over the decades.

Raider, who was semi-retired for the last number of years, was "one of the most recognized and appreciated bandleaders of his time," noted veteran Jewish community chronicler Joe King.

According to the CJN profile, Raider, born in Montreal to parents, Annie and Harry, began to play trumpet as a child and had already formed his first dance band for parties while in high school in the mid-1940s.

Business was brisk, and by 1960, the profile noted, Raider and his band of five players were gigging at almost 250 functions a year – to a significant degree the Jewish wedding and bar mitzvah circuit.

Music always remained the closest thing to Raider's heart. As a younger man, Teplitsky noted, he had a scholarship at Tanglewood with the legendary conductor and composer Leonard Bernstein as his mentor, adding that her father played in bands on radio and television shows, nightclubs, social events and concerts.

Raider's band, she noted, also accompanied classical and contemporary artists. He recorded five albums for the Canadian Talent Library.

Raider always seemed most at home and in his element, his family seemed to suggest, on the bandstand itself, conducting, blowing his horn or sitting in for a set with other musicians.

For the occasion of his 80th birthday, the family produced a book – A Man and His Trumpet – in his honour, and gave away dozens of copies.

Raider is survived by his wife of 57 years, Beatrice Mager, daughters Barbara Teplitsky and Cindy Woolman, and siblings Rennie and Alec.

Spice of Life

Blueberries for breakfast, lunch and dinner

BY EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Everyone seems to be blueberry crazy these days. Lots of communities have festivals, and the Internet abounds with sites that offer everything from recipes to online ordering of anything blueberry (preserves, dried and wild). Just in case you can't make it to one of the festivals or websites, here are a few recipes you can try that will let you take advantage of the affordable bounty that's in the grocery stores right now.

BLUEBERRY CAKE

This is a classic recipe that no self-respecting chef should be without

1 pint fresh blueberries
1 stick margarine or butter
2 cups sugar
3 eggs
1 cup milk
3 cups flour
1 tsp. (rounded) baking powder
1 tsp. vanilla

Preheat oven to 350. In a mixing bowl, cream the margarine and sugar until fluffy; add the eggs and beat well. Add the vanilla, milk and flour and mix well. Add baking powder and stir until blended. Gently fold in blueberries. Bake in a tube pan (angel food or bunt cake pan) for 1 hour. Cool in pan on a cake rack; invert onto rack while warm (but not hot). When cool, drizzle with a glaze made of softened butter, powdered sugar and milk (play with quantities until you achieve "drizzle" consistency). Serves 8 to 10.

CHEATERS' BLUEBERRY BANANA BREAD

2 cups Bisquick
2/3 cup sugar
1/4 cup milk or non dairy substitute
1 cup blueberries, fresh or frozen, (drained if frozen)

3/4 cup quick-cooking oats
1 cup ripe banana, mashed
2 eggs

Preheat oven to 350. Grease bottom of a 9x5-inch loaf pan. In a mixing bowl combine all of the ingredients except the blueberries and stir until mixed very well, about 1 minute. Gently fold in the blueberries and pour the batter into the pan. Bake 44-55 minutes (toothpick test it to see if it's done). Cool on a rack for 10 minutes then run a knife around the sides to loosen. Remove from loaf pan and cool completely before slicing. Serves 6.

BLUEBERRY OATMEAL BREAD

2 cups flour
1 cup quick-cooking oats
3/4 cup sugar
2 tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. lemon peel, grated
1/2 tsp. baking soda
1/2 tsp. salt
1 1/4 cups skim milk or non dairy substitute
1/3 cup oil
2 tsp. vanilla
2 eggs, slightly beaten
1 cup blueberries

Preheat oven to 350. Grease bottom only of 9x5-inch loaf pan. In large bowl, combine flour, oats, sugar, baking powder, lemon peel, baking soda and salt. In small bowl, combine milk, oil, vanilla and eggs and mix well. Add the wet ingredients to the dry ingredients. Stir just until dry ingredients are moistened. Gently fold in blueberries. Pour into greased pan. Bake for 50 to 60 minutes or until toothpick inserted in centre comes out clean. Cool 10 minutes, and then remove from pan. Cool completely. Wrap tightly and store in refrigerator. Serves 8.

CHICKEN BREASTS WITH BLUEBERRIES

1 lb. chicken breasts, skinned and boned
1 tbsp. salad oil, or use spray oil
1/2 cup apricot jam
3 tbsp. Dijon mustard
1/2 cup frozen unsweetened blueberries
1/3 cup white wine vinegar

Heat oil in frying pan over medium high heat. Add the chicken and brown on both sides. In small bowl, combine the jam and mustard, mix well. Spread the jam mixture over browned chicken in the pan and sprinkle the chicken with blueberries. Reduce the heat to medium-low, cover and cook till the chicken is no longer pink in thickest part, about 15 minutes. With a slotted spoon, take out the chicken and blueberries and keep warm. Add the vinegar to the pan, bring to a boil and cook, stirring occasionally until sauce thickens and is reduced by a third (about 5 minutes). Pour sauce over chicken and serve. Serves 4.

GRILLED CHICKEN WITH BLUEBERRY BBQ SAUCE

Making your own barbecue sauce, especially one with a unique flavour such as this one, immediately establishes you as a serious grilling aficionado.

6 chicken breasts, bone in
2 cup fresh blueberries
1/4 cup balsamic vinegar
3 tbsp. honey
3 tbsp. ketchup
1/2 tsp. garlic powder
1/2 tsp. ground ginger

In a saucepan, combine the blueberries, vinegar, honey, ketchup, garlic powder and ginger. Bring the mixture to a low boil. Reduce the heat, and simmer for 10 to 12 minutes until the sauce thickens. Remove from heat and allow the sauce to cool. Pour the barbecue sauce into a blender and blend until smooth. Put the chicken breasts and 1/3 cup of sauce into a zip-top bag and coat well. Marinate in the refrigerator for 30 minutes to an hour. Reserve the rest of the sauce for serving. Grill the chicken over medium high until cooked, 7-8 minutes per side. Top the chicken with the sauce and serve. Serves 6.

TV writer learns to deal with failure

Jeff Detsky writes for Call Me Fitz, a show about a morally corrupt car salesman and his conscience.

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Everything went Jeff Detsky's way for the first 20 years of his life. Then he became a TV writer.

"I was this kid from Forest Hill [Collegiate Institute]. I went to Ryerson... then you go out in the workplace and it's pretty shocking," Detsky, a writer for a new series called Call Me Fitz, which follows a corrupt car salesman and premières on The Movie Network in the fall, said. "It's not easy to deal with failure, but that's the nature of the business."

Detsky first got into writing during a high school creative writing course. Initially, his goal was to work in film, but he soon realized that the best place to write in Canada is in TV.

"The TV industry is thriving," he said. And, for Detsky, it was a good fit.

"I watch a lot of TV. I grew up on The Simpsons and Seinfeld... I love the format [of the scripts]," he said.

Detsky, 27, took Ryerson University's radio and television arts program, where he learned about the technical side of the industry.

"[Ryerson] teaches you more the technical stuff, which I wasn't that interested in, but it had writing courses."

This is where he met James Nadler, a Ryerson professor and creator of the YTV show Family Biz.

"He gave me my first break," Detsky said, adding that he worked as a teacher's assistant for the professor.

In 2008, Nadler invited Detsky, a newcomer to the industry, to pitch an episode for Family Biz, a sitcom about a businessman-turned-stay-at-home father who starts running his family as he would a business.

"[The pitch] was a pretty horrifying experience... that was the first professional meeting I ever took," he said. "I tend to make myself more nervous than I should. I spent the week coming up with three pitches."

The show eventually chose one of these pitches, which turned into an episode about starting a garage band. But it wasn't an easy process.

"For five agonizing months, you're waiting for the network to approve you," he said, adding that this was because of his lack of experience.

"I was a nobody. I was a kid," he said. "Kids' programming is a little more lenient. They take chances on younger people."

Detsky spent the next month and a half rewriting his pitch before getting the go-ahead to start writing drafts of the script.

"It's hard, but it's not that hard. You have to be patient and get used to everyone saying no," he said. "This was a rare instance. The story department was one guy, James Nadler. He had 26 episodes."

Although Detsky completed the script on a freelance basis, he soon realized that this didn't mean much.

"The show didn't get a second season. My network of contacts was one guy, and he wasn't working the next year. I realized I couldn't rest on the laurels of one show," he said.

So the writer applied to the Canadian Film Centre, a school devoted to the film and television industry.

"Ten years ago, they started the TV program, now 60 to 70 per cent of the industry comes out of there, especially the junior-level writers," he said. "It's way more specific [than Ryerson]. It's just TV writing, it's all about professional development."

But the centre's biggest attribute was its contacts.

"What they really do is you meet everyone," he said of the five-month program.

Because of these contacts, Detsky spent several weeks working with Epitome Pictures, a production company, and helped develop a series that was never picked up.

Through his experience, Detsky learned that talent isn't the only thing that matters in the writing world.

"About half of this business is getting people to like you. You spend a lot of face time together. Half of it is having the chops and half is being likable," he said.

After working with Epitome, Detsky contacted a former Ryerson acquaintance who was developing the show Call Me Fitz.

"I had just come out of the film centre, and she was looking for a junior person," he said.

Detsky, who started working on the show around a year ago, is a story editor and helps with the script-writing process.

The show, which premières in September and stars Jason Priestley, has already been approved for a second season.

Call Me Fitz follows a morally corrupt car salesman who enjoys drugs, drinking and fellatio.

Richard (Fitz) Fitzpatrick, played by Priestley, has an easy, consequence-free life until he meets Larry, a fellow salesman who claims to be his conscience. Or, as phrased in the trailer, "The last good sliver of your soul."

For Detsky, the show could mean big things.

"It's a show I would watch. There's only so many Seinfelds out there, and I feel like this show could be a hit," he said.

For this show, Detsky works with a group of writers and production staff, who spend about five weeks coming up with story ideas.

"It's eight people sitting in a room trying to make people laugh," he said of the writing process. "On this show, it's about shocking people. It's coming up with the most outrageous idea you can think of. Usually, it doesn't work."

Developing story ideas and scripts is a collaborative process, he said.

"Even if it's your idea, it's not actually our idea. You throw an idea out there, it's like a beach ball. People bat it around until it turns into a story."

While Detsky has been told "no" many times in the industry, he's happy with his career choice.

"I couldn't imagine doing anything else. Mainly because I have no other skill sets," he said.

Arab League supports direct talks

By NATASHA MOZGOVAYA
and BARAK RAVID

WASHINGTON D.C. — The United States said last Thursday it was "encouraged" by signs of Arab support for direct peace negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians, after the Arab League declared that it would support the Palestinians if they decided to enter into such face-to-face talks.

"We're encouraged by what we've heard today coming out of Cairo," State Department spokesperson Philip Crowley told reporters, adding that U.S. President Barack Obama's administration is hopeful talks will resume soon.

Crowley said Qatari Prime Minister Sheikh Hamad bin Jassim al-Thani, acting on behalf of an Arab peace initiative, had sent a letter to Obama outlining ideas about how to move the process forward.

Qatar heads the Arab League committee on the peace process.

"We will, of course, be evaluating the ideas contained in that letter, and we'll be consulting further," Crowley said.

Meanwhile, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Defence Minister Ehud Barak also welcomed the Arab League announcement.

Netanyahu said he'd be willing to enter into "direct and honest peace talks" within days, adding that "by way of direct negotiations, a speedy peace agreement can be achieved."

Barak, who was in Washington for a series of meetings with top administration officials, said last Thursday that "only direct negotiations can bring a peace agreement and a solution of two states for two peoples."

"Negotiations will require difficult and brave decisions from both sides," Barak added. "I hope that the Palestinians understand that."

Earlier last Thursday, the Qatari prime minister announced the Arab League's decision, saying that the Arab League would support Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas if he decided to enter direct talks with Israel.

Asked whether the league would back direct talks, Jassim said: "Of course, there is agreement, but agreement over the principles of what will be discussed and the manner of the direct negotiations."

It would be up to Abbas to decide whether to hold talks, based on whatever conditions he sees fit, Jassim said.

Jassim added that he was "full of doubts" about Israel's seriousness regarding final status negotiations.

Abbas was in Cairo last Thursday, attending the Arab League meeting aimed at deciding whether to add the organization's weight to U.S. and Israeli pressure for face-to-face talks.

Abbas is under strong U.S. and European pressure to restart direct talks that were frozen in 2008. For the last few months, the United States has been mediating indirect negotiations between the two sides, but the Palestinian leader said he would only enter direct talks if Israel agrees to a complete halt in settlement construction and accepts a Palestinian state in territories seized in the 1967 Six Day War – the West Bank, Gaza and east Jerusalem.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas is still equivocating on the resumption of direct talks with Israel. [RNS photo]

"When I receive written assurances [about] accepting the 1967 border and halting the settlement [building], I will go immediately to the direct talks," Abbas was quoted as saying in remarks reported by Egypt's state-owned news agency last Thursday.

Meanwhile, the Islamist Hamas movement that controls Gaza and is a rival of Abbas' Fatah movement, rejected the Arab League's conditions for direct Israeli-Palestinian peace talks, calling them a "cover."

"We reject any cover for the resumption of the direct talks with the Zionist occupation," Ismail Radwan, a senior Hamas leader in Gaza said. "This committee is not authorized to make concessions over the rights of our people."

In a letter addressed to the Obama administration, the Arab League said it needed a clear time frame, specific reference terms and a monitoring mechanism in order to support direct talks.

Two months ago, as the anniversary of Schalit's capture approached, the Israel-based International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists wrote to ICRC president Jakob Kellenberger asking him to make a personal appeal to the heads of state in Syria, other Arab states and Iran asking that they exercise their influence with Hamas to ensure Schalit's "basic rights" are enforced.

The ICRC replied, in part, by saying, "We have repeatedly asked to be allowed to visit him or at the very least to facilitate the exchange of personal messages with his family. This request was made again in recent talks at the highest decision-making level. In addition, we have been constantly reminding his captors of their obligations."

Since then, the ICRC has released additional statements online. One, Izard said, "is quite a strong statement on Gilad Schalit and Gaza. We don't do this every week. But when we do, people listen."

The statement is largely devoted to the situation of Gazans. It calls on Israel to lift its blockade, saying, "The whole of Gaza's civilian population is being punished for acts for which they bear no responsibility. The closure therefore constitutes a collective punishment imposed in clear violation of Israel's obligations under international humanitarian law.

"The closure is having a devastating impact on the 1.5 million people living in Gaza," said Béatrice Mégevand-Roggo, the ICRC's head of operations for the Middle East. "That is why we are urging Israel to put an end to this closure and call upon all those who have an influence on the situation, including Hamas, to do their utmost to help Gaza's civilian population. Israel's right to deal with its legitimate security concerns must be balanced against the Palestinians' right to live normal, dignified lives."

One paragraph is devoted to Schalit. In it, the ICRC notes, "Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit is about to enter his fifth year in captivity. Hamas has continued to rebuff the ICRC's requests to let it visit Gilad Schalit. In violation of international humanitarian law, it has also refused to allow him to get in touch with his family. The ICRC again urges those detaining Gilad Schalit to grant him the regular contact with his family to which he is entitled. It also reiterates that those detaining him have an obligation to ensure that he is well treated and that his living conditions are humane and dignified."

A later, second statement on the ICRC website – a question-and-answer piece with Mégevand-Roggo – focuses exclusively on the Schalit issue.

"We are continuing to do everything in our power to be allowed to visit [Schalit] or at least to see to it that he is authorized to correspond with his family. Our efforts have lost none of their intensity, despite the fact that Hamas has so far firmly rejected all of our pleas. It is unacceptable to hold a soldier captive without allowing him contact with his family, as required under international humanitarian law," Mégevand-Roggo said.

"I would like to say again how acutely aware we are of the anguish and frustration of Noam and Aviva Schalit, Gilad's parents. We have been meeting them regularly to update them about our efforts. Since we don't have access to their son, however, we unfortunately cannot provide them with any first-hand information on his condition."

"We have stepped up our contacts with the Hamas authorities, for example at high-level meetings held recently in Gaza and Damascus. We have requested access to Mr. Schalit and tried to obtain information about his condition. We have also requested that Hamas hand over to Gilad Schalit thousands of letters and greeting cards sent to him by various organizations, as well as by schoolchildren and other individuals. We deeply regret that all these requests have been rejected. We have also been constantly reminding his captors of their obligation under international humanitarian law to protect his life, to treat him humanely and to let him have regular and unconditional contact with his family.

"As a general rule," Mégevand-Roggo continued, "the ICRC works discreetly behind the scenes, which we believe is the approach most likely to achieve results. This is what we have been doing since the very beginning. On June 14, however, we said publicly that Hamas, by not allowing contact between Mr. Schalit and his family, was violating international humanitarian law. This was the first time we said this publicly."

Izard said the ICRC has very little leverage with Hamas.

"We don't like to point fingers," he said. The ICRC "prefers to talk to warring partners in a confidential way. That's the way we work, and it's the same way we work in other contexts."

He said the ICRC operates in 80 countries and is the only organization with such broad access to prisoners. It maintains working agreements with the 80 jurisdictions, including the Palestinian Authority.

Izard rejected suggestions the ICRC should put pressure on Hamas – perhaps by limiting ICRC services in Gaza. "We can't withhold services to Hamas-controlled lands. We visit detainees in Israeli prisons [300 according to the online document; the ICRC visited another 450, apparently incarcerated by Hamas, "in places of detention throughout the Gaza Strip"] and we do not want to deprive them of our assistance because on the other side there's no access to Gilad Schalit… We won't punish other victims of the conflict when it's not their fault."

Soldiers die in copter crash

An elite Israel Defence Forces unit identified and collected body parts of the seven military personnel killed in the crash of an Israeli military helicopter in central Romania. The search-and-rescue unit on July 28 also collected pieces of the crashed helicopter, which will aid the investigation into the cause of the July 26 accident, in which six Israeli soldiers and a Romanian liaison officer died. A Romanian official said July 27 that all seven bodies had been located. The IDF and the Romanian army held a memorial ceremony last Thursday afternoon at the nearby military base from where the doomed helicopter took off. Israeli Air Force investigators suspect human error stemming from poor visibility caused the crash of the CH-53 helicopter during joint military exercises between the Israeli and Romanian militaries. All possibilities are being investigated, the Air Force said, including the chance the helicopter had a technical problem. Its black box was found at the site and sent to Israel for inspection.

Cdn. air force head visits

Canada's air force commander, Lt.-Gen. Andre Deschamps, was recently in Israel on a four-day visit. He held discussions with his Israeli counterpart, Gen. Ido Nechushtan, and other senior Israeli Defence Forces staff. The generals discussed intelligence matters, strategic challenges and the operational experience of the Israeli Air Force.

Israelis, Cdns. equally happy

Israel was tied for eighth among the happiest countries in the world, according to a new survey. In a Gallup World Poll of 155 nations, the Jewish state tied with Canada, Switzerland and Australia. Forbes, which posted the list July 29, said the richest countries were by and large the happiest. Scandinavian countries dominated – Denmark, Finland, Norway, Sweden and the Netherlands took the top five spots. The United States ranked 14th, three spots ahead of Britain, in a survey that asked thousands of respondents to give a "life evaluation" score from one to 10. The survey, taken between 2005 and 2009, catalogued their daily feelings to decide what percentage of people in each country were "thriving, struggling or suffering." African nations fared poorly, with Sierra Leone, Comoros, Burundi and Togo ranking in the bottom five. They were joined by Cambodia as the unhappiest countries on earth. Israel finished well ahead of its neighbours in happiness, with Jordan ranking 52, Lebanon 73, and Egypt and Syria 115. The Palestinian territories ranked 88th.

Rape appeal keys on deception

An Arab man convicted in a Jerusalem court of rape by deception after posing as a Jew has appealed his sentence to Israel's Supreme Court. Saber Kushour, 30, who was sentenced last week in Jerusalem District Court to 18 months in prison as part of a plea bargain, appealed July 29 to the High Court of Justice, the Jerusalem Post reported. His conviction and sentencing has made international headlines, and the Israeli legal system has been accused of racism. Both were noted in the appeal by Kushour's defence. Kushour, a married father of two from eastern Jerusalem, does not deny that he had a one-time sexual encounter with a Jewish woman, who was identified as Maya, but says he did not misrepresent himself as being Jewish in order to sleep with her. The woman filed a complaint after realizing that Kushour wasn't Jewish. The court ruled that the consent for sex was obtained under false pretenses.

New Iran sanctions from Australia

Israeli media reported that Australia approved new sanctions against Iran in a bid to halt its nuclear program. The new sanctions, announced by Foreign Minister Stephen Smith, follow similar restrictions issued by the United States, the European Union and Canada. For the first time, the sanctions include restricting business dealings with Iran's oil and gas sector.

Israeli lawyer balances scales for women worldwide

By KARIN KLOOSTERMAN
Israel21c

NEW YORK — Doors seem to swing smoothly open in the career path of Prof. Ruth Halperin-Kaddari from Israel, the youngest female member of the United Nations Committee for the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW).

Since the late 1990s, the 44-year-old mother of four – who has more children than other committee members – has been working with the UN in the realm of women's rights. She started out reporting on the status of women's rights in Israel for the UN, on behalf of the government. In 2007, she tells Israel21c, her 10-year dream came true, when she was elected to the elite, predominantly female UN committee that analyzes reports submitted by the 192 UN member countries.

Recently, at UN headquarters in New York, Halperin-Kaddari was elected for a second term. She didn't expect to win this time around, she said, because most of the UN's Muslim and Arab states tend to automatically vote against Israeli candidates, regardless of their credentials, and in addition, the vote took place shortly after the Turkish flotilla incident, which resulted in the deaths of nine Turkish citizens and several injured Israeli soldiers. She had anticipated that the incident would have an adverse effect on her chances.

But despite the politics and negative press for Israel, Halperin-Kaddari received 103 votes and was elected, beating out contenders from countries such as Chile, Bahrain and the Republic of Cameroon. "Happily, the success in this campaign was a lot of hard work coming together with respect for professionalism," she said.

Ruth Halperin-Kaddari

CEDAW was established in 1982, and Halperin-Kaddari, who practises family law, is one of the 23 experts who review reports on the status of women submitted by UN countries once in four years. The committee meets three times a year for three-week sessions that are held in either Geneva or New York.

Halperin-Kaddari, a Yale University graduate who lives in Shoham near Israel's international airport, said that through her specialty, family law, she's been able to provide the committee with information about women's rights in marriage and divorce, information that was previously not discussed in UN conventions. She teaches family law at Israel's Bar-Ilan University, as well as publishing about her field of expertise.

The CEDAW is one of the most prestigious and highly valued UN committees, and Halperin-Kaddari said she is thrilled to be a member. "It's a very special experience. It gives me a perspective I couldn't achieve anywhere else and makes me feel that we are doing something very important – the women I work with on the committee, the United Nations and Israel."

Born in the Tel Aviv suburb of Ramat Gan, like most young Israeli women, Halperin-Kaddari served in the Israel Army at age 18, in her case in an intelligence unit. She earned her first degree at Bar-Ilan University and her doctorate of law, a doctor of the science of law degree, at Yale University. Then she worked as a law clerk for Justice Aharon Barak, who was president of Israel's Supreme Court from 1995 to 2006.

She easily landed a faculty position at Bar-Ilan U. Soon after, the Ministry of Justice and Foreign Affairs commissioned her to write a report for the UN on women's issues in Israel.

"The truth is that I wasn't quite aware of what I was taking upon myself, and it was done during my post-doctoral period. Fortunately, I had the time to work on it," she said.

That was in 1996, and in 1997, she went to the UN as part of the Israeli delegation that presented the report. "I remember it quite well," she says, reflecting on the opening speech she heard. "I said to myself, 'One day I'd like to be one of these [UN] experts who hears those reports.' Ten years later, I closed the circle."

Halperin-Kaddari was involved in women's rights issues in Israel as well as international women's rights in the late 1990s, when Rabbi Emanuel Rackman, the chancellor of Bar-Ilan, who was then 90 years old, asked her to help establish a centre for women's rights at the university. The result is the Ruth and Emanuel Rackman Center for the Advancement of Women's Status. While she feels that "it came at a stage a bit too early in my academic career… it was an opportunity that couldn't be missed," Halperin-Kaddari said. The centre enhanced her status at the UN, and it's still the base from which she champions women's rights in Israel.

Particular challenges that women in Israel face, she said, are the problems associated with marriage laws, and the fact that they're governed by religion and not the state. This is an ominous situation for both the Muslim and Jewish populations in Israel, she continued, with each religion having its own interests in preserving control over laws pertaining to marriage. Also, the ongoing political conflict in the region trickles down and affects every woman, regardless of her religious or socio-economic group, she added.

"It's very frustrating that the conflict that we live in is all-inclusive and includes all venues of life. It's almost inescapable," she said. "Whatever you challenge or you try to face [parts] separately, you go back to the key issue – the almost eternal conflict and existential conflict for Israel."

At the UN, Halperin-Kaddari deals with international issues, while drawing on her local experience. Over the 15 years that she's been involved, changes have come about. Although they aren't radical changes with respect to the status of women in countries such as Afghanistan, for example, she has effected change with respect to the law, she said.

"In the most extreme cases, we cannot be effective [in Afghanistan]. But where we can be effective is in the in-between cases – for example, Egypt," Halperin-Kaddari said. "Egypt has enacted a law that prevents female genital manipulation, and countries in Asia or Africa or the former Soviet Union, countries have enacted comprehensive laws and schemes working to combat gender-based violence of women – or the prevention of polygamy."

Halperin-Kaddari is happy working in two worlds – both locally in academia and internationally at the UN – and is convinced that it is possible to engender change in the second one. "I have a strong belief in the connection between the academic world and social change, and using research from academia to make these changes in the real world," she said.

Many east Jerusalem Arabs want to stay in Israel

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — Although few would say so publicly, many Arabs in eastern Jerusalem have said in conversations that they would rather live under Israeli sovereignty than in the Palestinian Authority under PA President Mahmoud Abbas.

For example, Asam a shopkeeper in the Old City of Jerusalem, said, "I would rather live under Israelis than under Abbas. Abbas is a thief like [Yasser] Arafat was."

When asked why he prefers to remain part of Israel, Asam responded: "At least here I can say what I want. In Syria, if you say what you want, you can go missing forever. In Jordan too. And under Abbas, too. It is chaos there. Abbas can stay in Ramallah and stay out of Jerusalem." His Palestinian friend in the shop nodded in agreement.

A younger man, who works in west Jerusalem, said he is part of a family clan of 30,000 east Jerusalem Arabs who live "in Beit Hanina, Shuafat and the Mount of Olives." He also said he would rather remain in Israel than live under the PA. "Most of the people in my family clan think the same way I do. Why should I have to live under the PA and starve?... I live in Israel. I have paid my taxes all my life. We aren't going to the PA."

A middle-aged man living in the Mount of Olives area acknowledged that before 1967, his family was living in Jordan, and if there were to be a Palestinian state with a capital in east Jerusalem, the Mount of Olives would presumably be in that state. But he said adamantly, "I don't care if years ago we were under Jordanian rule. We want to stay in Israel"

Akram, a taxi driver in Wadi Joz echoed those sentiments: "Abbas, he should stay in Ramallah and not come to Jerusalem. We don't need him here... They [the PA] are all mamzerim [bastards] and corrupt. I want to be Israeli. I have my Israeli identity card and I want to get my bituach leumi [national insurance benefit]. Who knows what it would be like to live under PA rule? But I don't want to try it."

Moussa, an east Jerusalem taxi driver waiting outside the Western Wall in the Jewish quarter of the Old City, was equally definite that he doesn't want east Jerusalem to be the capital of a Palestinian state. "It's a balagan [chaos] there in the West Bank [under Abbas]. I would keep my Israeli identity card."

A waiter in a hotel and his friend concurred. "There are lots of those in east Jerusalem who want to live in a Palestinian state, but I am not one of them," the waiter said. "And there are lots like us."

When asked whether he has taken opinion polls to see whether east Jerusalem Arabs would prefer to live under Israel or the PA, Khalil Shakiki, a Palestinian pollster said, "I do not have polls only of the opinions of east Jerusalem Palestinians. My statistics don't relate to East Jerusalem only." For the last 16 years, Shakiki has been publishing results of polls on Palestinian public opinion with Yaacov Shamir, a professor at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, who simultaneously polls Israeli public opinion.

When asked how he would explain the fact that many east Jerusalem Arabs want to stay under Israeli rule, Shamir responded, "You should ask Khalil Shakiki about this, not me." But when pressed as to whether he was surprised that east Jerusalem Arabs had indicated they would rather remain in Israel than become part of a PA state, he said quietly, "No this does not surprise me.

"Look, Arabs in east Jerusalem watch Israeli TV and see Israeli media. It's a very open society where people can express their opinions freely, and they like this. They also get benefits like Israeli national insurance and other benefits, which they would not want to give up."

Anti-Semitic incidents at 'troubling' level, ADL says

JTA

WASHINGTON — The number of anti-Semitic incidents in the United States remained at a "sustained and troubling" level, according to the Anti-Defamation League's annual audit.

The 2009 audit of anti-Semitic incidents, released July 27, recorded 1,211 incidents of vandalism, harassment and physical assaults against Jewish individuals, property and community institutions across the United States last year.

The number fell from the 1,352 incidents reported in 2008, but some of the decline was likely because of revised methodology for reporting and tracking incidents that was unveiled in the 2009 audit, the ADL said.

In the latest audit, the incidents include 29 physical assaults on Jewish individuals, 760 incidents of anti-Semitic harassment and threats, and 422 cases of anti-Semitic vandalism, according to the report.

Some incidents that occurred in 2009 weren't tallied under the new methodology, which takes a more conservative approach to counting certain types of incidents, including graffiti and swastikas.

"We know that the swastika has, for some, lost its meaning as the primary symbol of Nazism and instead become a more generalized symbol of hate," ADL National Director Abraham Foxman said. "So we are being more careful to include graffiti incidents that specifically target Jews or Jewish institutions as we continue the process of re-evaluating and redefining how we measure anti-Jewish incidents."

The states with the highest number of incidents were California, with 275 incidents; New York, 209 incidents; New Jersey, 132 incidents; and Florida, 90 incidents.

Smoking a habit not an addiction, study concludes

Israel21c

TEL AVIV — Everyone has assumed for years that smoking is an addiction, but compelling new research from Israel suggests that smokers find it hard to quit because it's a habit, not because it's an addiction.

In a new study, Dr. Reuven Dar of Tel Aviv University (TAU) found that the intensity of cravings for cigarettes had more to do with the psychosocial element of smoking than with the physiological effects of nicotine as an addictive chemical.

"These findings might not be popular with advocates of the nicotine addiction theory because they undermine the physiological role of nicotine and emphasize mind over matter when it comes to smoking," says Dar, who published his findings in the Journal of Abnormal Psychology.

Today, about 1.35 billion people in the world smoke – that's about 20 per cent of the world's population. In the United States alone, one in five Americans dies of smoking-related causes, according to the World Health Organization (WHO). Worldwide, someone dies from tobacco use every eight seconds – about five million people annually.

Dar and his colleagues based their conclusions on two landmark studies. In the most recent study, the researchers monitored the smoking behaviour and craving levels of in-flight attendants working at the Israeli airline, El Al.

Each participant was monitored during two flights – a long one of 10 to 13 hours, from Tel Aviv to New York, for example; and a two-hop shorter trip from Israel to Europe and back, each leg lasting three to five hours. Using a questionnaire, Dar and his team sampled craving levels of the attendants throughout their flights.

The researchers discovered that the duration of the flight had no significant impact on craving levels, which were similar for short and long flights. Moreover, craving levels at the end of each short flight were much higher than those at the end of the long flight, showing that cravings increased in anticipation of the flight landing, whatever the flight's total duration.

Dar and his team from TAU's department of psychology concluded that the craving effect is produced by psychological cues rather than by the physiological effects of nicotine deprivation.

In an earlier study done in 2005, Dar examined a group of Orthodox Jews who smoked, but are forbidden to smoke on the Sabbath. Dar asked them about their smoking cravings on three separate days: the Sabbath, a regular weekday, and a weekday on which they'd been asked to abstain.

Participants were interviewed at the end of each day about their craving levels during that day.

Dar found that cravings were very low on the morning of the Sabbath, when the smokers knew they would not be able to smoke for at least 10 hours, but gradually increased as the day wore on and participants anticipated the first post-Sabbath cigarette.

Craving levels on the weekday that these people smoked as much as they wanted were just as high as on the day they abstained, showing that craving has little to do with nicotine deprivation.

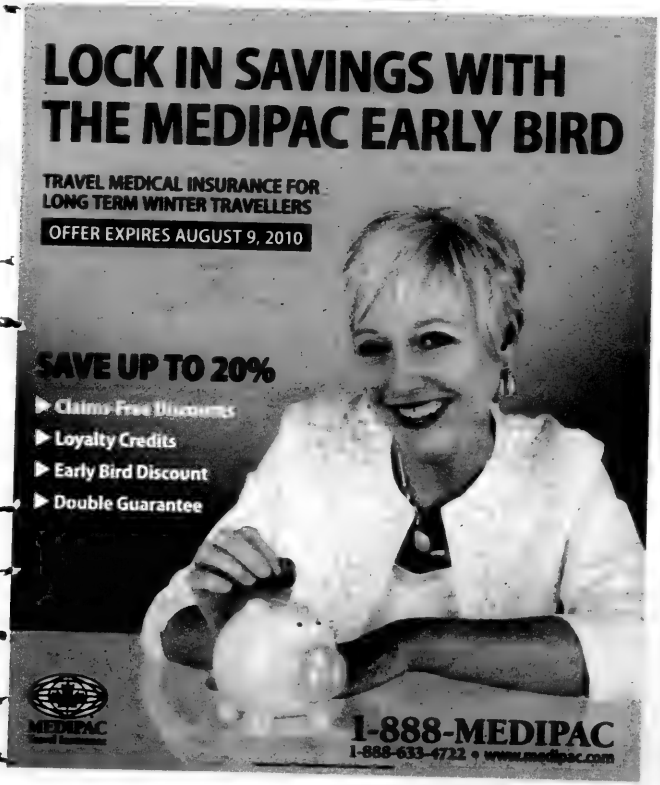
Lighting up is psychosocial, not physiological, a new Israeli study suggests.

Dar's studies suggest that nicotine is not addictive as physiological addictions are usually defined. While nicotine does have a physiological role in increasing cognitive abilities such as attention and memory, it's not an addictive substance like heroin, which creates true systemic and biologically based withdrawal symptoms in the body of the user, he claims.

Dar believes that people who smoke do so for short-term benefits like oral gratification, sensory pleasure and social camaraderie. Once the habit is established, people continue to smoke in response to cues and in situations that become associated with smoking.

He feels that by understanding that smoking is a habit, smokers and health authorities can now look for new kinds of treatment that will be more effective than traditional remedies. Smoking cessation techniques should emphasize the psychological and behavioural aspects of the habit and not the biological aspects, he suggests.

With about 15 billion cigarettes sold daily worldwide, a massive 10 million every minute, according to WHO, this is one habit that people must learn to break.



FEDERAL MINISTER VISITS BAYCREST: Diane Ablonczy, Minister of State (Seniors), visited Baycrest last Wednesday to learn about the centre's innovations in aging to help Canadians age better. She met with seniors at the end of her tour, including Reuben Cipin and Monty Mazin, who walked over from Baycrest's life-lease condominium to greet the minister, and Mildred Klagsbrun, president of the Residents' Council at Baycrest's Apotex, Jewish Home for the Aged. Actor re-invents herself as an abstract artist

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

Not every artist can claim credits in Anne of Green Gables, The Jetsons and Cheers. Nor can every artist claim to have written a novel and hosted a radio show.

Then again, not every artist is Marilyn Lightstone – a successful actor, author, painter, photographer, radio host and musician.

Although Lightstone, 70, spent much of her life as an actor, she always wanted to paint.

"I thought I was going to be an artist when I was a kid," she said. "I thought I was going to be a painter, but I became an actress instead."

In addition to guest roles on television, Lightstone wrote a novel, Rogues and Vagabonds (Stoddart), in 2001 and currently hosts a radio program on Classical 96, a Toronto radio station owned by her husband, Moses Znaimer.

Despite taking the acting road, she says she always knew she would eventually come back to visual art, and in the late 1990s, she started thinking about it seriously and began to take photographs again – not specifically as artwork, but as a preface to her return to art, to sharpen her eye and sense of composition.

She played around with watercolour, gouache and oil paints before discovering that acrylic paint was the medium for her because she likes to work quickly and layer colours.

Lightstone says experimenting with different media and styles are steps that she would have gone through as she grew as an artist if she had focused on visual art as a child. The fact that she brought visual art to the forefront of her life as an adult simply means she goes through the stages much faster, she adds.

Part of the Homage to an Ancient Culture series

Her first paintings were still lifes, but she grew bored and moved on. Although she never thought of herself as a lover of abstract work, she found herself involved in abstract paintings and jazz, which some people consider an abstract form of music.

"I came in one night, and instead of listening to one of my CDs, I got a canvas ready to paint, and I tuned into the jazz radio station," Lightstone says. And then, some time after that, as she prepared another canvas to do a landscape in oils, she decided to do a red wash on the canvas.

"Then it was like I was hit by lightning," she says. "It was one of those extraordinary moments where I kind of looked at the squiggles and figures I'd made on the paper with my squeeze bottle of acrylic paint, and I said, 'What's that? How did that happen?' and I thought, 'Well, I'll do it again,' and I ended up painting my first abstract painting."

Suddenly, she understood abstract painting and what it meant to her, and she really never went back to figurative painting again.

"To me, abstract art was a journey into the unknown, whereas when you do representative things, you know where you're going to end up," Lightstone says.

Her studio walls are covered with her work, oil and acrylic paintings and some that incorporate photography.

In some of her abstract paintings, she uses mixed media, integrating her photography with the paint. In her Homage to an Ancient Culture series, she used both photographs of totem poles and paints to create red and black paintings.

One series of photographs plays with lights; bright lights over dark backgrounds, often together with other coloured lights, create abstract photographs.

"I had to find ones that would talk to each other," Lightstone says.

Her art pieces display a wide range of styles, including abstract images, landscapes and straight photography.

One element comes through all of her work – the use of bright, bold colours.

People often tell her that her work looks like 10 different artists could have done it, she says.

"I like the idea of evolving rather than repeating myself," she says, and her work clearly displays this attitude.

Lightstone likes to photograph aged, ruined walls and wrecked buildings, which she says provide the most interesting shots.

"It's not in the glamorous that really has the most appeal," she says.

Her photography has taken her around the globe. Lightstone has photographed people and places in India, Myanmar (formerly Burma) and Mongolia. She says she is a firm believer in the philosophy that the purpose of life is to experience, learn, and expand your horizons and perspectives, and the best way of doing that is through travel.

"You have got to see everything you can before you leave this earth," she says. "If you see the same things every time, you take things for granted, but when you're in a new situation, you see things afresh."

Marilyn Lightstone in her studio [Cara Stern photos]

The places she goes to photograph are not conventional tourist destinations, but she says she likes to take "the beaten track a little bit – or a lot, if it's safe."

Although some people have told her to avoid taking photos while on vacation and instead fully immerse herself into the experience, Lightstone has found this to be untrue, and describes herself as having stupidly fallen into this idea on many of her travels. The trips she remembers most vividly are the ones she spent photographing, she says.

She has researched the subjects she photographs. For example, she is aware of the lifestyles of the nomadic people of Mongolia.

"I like to think of myself as a citizen of the world," Lightstone says. "That's only true to a certain extent, I know, but I try my best."

Free speech threatened by Islam radicalism, author claims

BY SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Bruce Bawer, a foe of Islamic radicalism, gets to the point in short order in his tough-minded polemical book.

"We in the West are living in the midst of a jihad, and most of us don't even realize it – because it's a brand of jihad that's barely a generation old."

In Surrender, Appeasing Islam, Sacrificing Freedom (Doubleday), Bawer, an American cultural critic, claims that a combination of fear and political correctness has led politicians, religious leaders, intellectuals and journalists in the United States and elsewhere to mollify Islamic fundamentalism at a terrible and unjustifiable cost: free speech

In his view, Islam's incompatibility with western freedoms was sharply exposed when, in 1989, the first spiritual leader of revolutionary Iran, the Ayatollah Khomeini, issued a fatwa against the life of British novelist Salman Rushdie, the author of the supposedly subversive and insulting The Satanic Verses.

He suggests that Khomeini's fatwa, or religious edict, reflected an unsettling reality: Islam and freedom of speech are at odds. "The Rushdie fatwa," he observes, "marked the beginning of a new era of pressure and intimidation designed to bring down western freedom of speech, and, with it, freedom generally."

Bawer further claims that Islamic intolerance is aided and abetted by what he describes as "the pernicious doctrine of multiculturalism, which teaches free people to belittle their own liberties, while bending their knees to tyrants."

To Bawer, multiculturalism is a politically correct concept that bridles at critical thinking with respect to non-western cultures, particularly Muslim and Arab cultures. He blames the late Palestinian American scholar, Edward Said, for this lamentable situation.

In his 1978 book, Orientalism, Said all but dismissed western scholarship on the Arab and Islamic world, claiming that the scholars in question viewed their subject through racist and condescending eyes.

Said thereby convinced some western intellectuals, as well as a generation of students, that their views of the Muslim world were invalid because they were informed by centuries of western colonialist prejudices and stereotypes. As a result, they were duty-bound to "slavishly echo" Muslim accounts of Arab history.

Said's interpretation of multiculturalism, he notes, encourages self-censorship, while jihad exploits multiculturalism and political correctness.

Bawer says it took the Arab terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, in New York City, plus the Madrid and London bombings in 2004 and 2005 respectively, to alert Americans to the ongoing jihadist war on the West.

On a related topic, Bawer says that the mass influx of Muslims into western European cities has caused a demographic transformation, a phenomenon that goes almost entirely unreported in the European and U.S. media.

In many cases, these Muslim newcomers hew to Islamic fundamentalist beliefs and values that are frankly irreconcilable with western democracy. Europeans who broach this subject usually do so at their own peril, warns Bawer, pointing to the murder of the Dutch politician Pim Fortuyn in 2002.

"Fortuyn's murder can be recognized, in retrospect, as marking the resumption of the jihadist campaign to silence criticism of Islam that had begun with the Rushdie fatwa," he writes.

Two years after Fortuyn's death, a like-minded Dutchman, Theo van Gogh, was murdered by a Dutch-born Moroccan Muslim who objected to his film, Submission, a telling critique of Islamic attitudes toward women.

In response to van Gogh's demise, "an extraordinary number" of European artists, actors, professors, politicians and journalists deplored his "insensitivity" to "Muslim feelings." To Bawer, their reaction was nothing less than chilling.

The chill on free speech, as exhibited in the Van Gogh case, assumed a new and ominous form when Denmark's largest newspaper was condemned by Muslims for printing pictures of the prophet Mohammed. Expressing outrage over this affair, Bawer writes, "Most of the pictures were pretty tame. A couple were provocative in the way editorial cartoons are supposed to be."

In his opinion, the Danish cartoon crisis, not to mention the murders of Van Gogh and Fortuyn, have had a profound effect. As he puts it, "Motivated variously by fear, misguided sympathy and multicultural ideology, more and more individuals at every level of western society have allowed concerns about what Muslims will think and do to influence their actions."

Citing an example, he says that teachers and political leaders in Europe have advised Orthodox Jewish students to leave their yarmulkes at home so as not to incite Muslim students.

Claiming that there is no such thing as "moderate or liberal Islam," Bawer defines open-minded Muslims as people who have distanced themselves from the strict tenets of their faith. He lumps the Muslim Canadian writer Irshad Manji into this category.

It is a source of deep regret to Bawer that moderate Muslims all too often remain conspicuously silent in the face of Islamic extremists. "The silent majority of Muslims in the West are and will continue to be the passive allies of the active minority," he concludes in a sombre assessment.

Bawer, in his appraisal of the 2005 urban riots in France, mistakenly characterizes them as "assertions of Muslim authority over Muslim neighbourhoods" rather than as outbursts of frustration over "economic injustice" (the high rate of joblessness among Muslim youth).

Bawer is quite critical of the European media, especially the BBC.

"For years, the BBC has regularly served up some of the most egregiously anti-American, anti-Israeli and anti-capitalist reportage in the business while promulgating apologetics for Islam."

Bawer is livid that, while Muslim politicians, clerics and teachers spew out "abominable lies and calumnies" about the West, the United States, Israel, Jews, Christians, Hindus, homosexuals and democracy, only a tiny fraction of their slander is ever reported in the western media.

He is similarly concerned that universities, on the pretext of free speech, provide jihadists with a forum to spread their venom, while denying one to those who criticize Islam.

Accusing Hollywood movies and television shows of tiptoeing around or whitewashing jihad and sharia law, Bawer says that films that dare to highlight "the jihadist threat" are the exceptions to the rule.

Judging by some of the films I have seen in recent years, Bawer is overstating this argument.

In general, though, Bawer is more or less right about a lot of things in Surrender. He lets the chips fall where they may.

Interactive guide provides a book-club experience

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

Since 2002, Marilyn Herbert has been giving book lovers the chance to experience a book club without leaving home.

Her company, Bookclub-in-a-Box, produces a series of "interactive discussion guides" that aim to entice readers to think critically about novels.

The guides are designed to help readers figure out where to start a discussion on novels, from the classics to contemporary works.

"It gives the individual reader a chance to broaden their perspective on a particular book," she says. "But the original intention was to make it easier for groups to get together."

For example, in the discussion guide for The Time Traveller's Wife, by Audrey Niffenegger, Herbert picks out passages that clearly describe the themes, symbols and writing style of the story, suggests discussion questions – such as, in which characters do you see Niffenegger? – and describes the significance of each character.

In addition to these guides, Herbert hosts her own book clubs. She began hosting them at home more than 10 years ago.

But last February, she moved her business to 875 Eglinton Ave. W. in Toronto.

Members generally read the books ahead of time, and she leads them in a discussion. Even with the new centre, she still runs some meetings in her house.

"The centre was opened as a literary community centre, but it has evolved into so much more than just a literary venue," she says. In addition to book talks, the programs now include film, writing and drama, and she has expanded to incorporate online book clubs.

The guidebooks are available in hard and soft copies, and the discussions have begun to include YouTube videos.

The soft copies are in PDF format and can be downloaded immediately after purchase. With the ease of downloading these files and the expansion to include worldwide vendors, the books are circulating the world. Herbert says she has seen purchases from France, Germany, Dubai and Australia, among other countries.

But she still loves to lead discussion groups closer to home.

"The Toronto part is a whole separate thing because that's the part where I am the facilitator," she says.

She shares her love of books with the members, she says, explaining that any book she writes about is a book she loves.

"I've been accused of never reading a book I don't like," Herbert says, laughing.

She describes herself as a fiction fanatic, but she invites guest discussion leaders to book club meetings to present non-fiction works such as memoirs and biographies.

She's a teacher by training, which she says contributes to her desire to teach others about the books.

Although she doesn't teach formally anymore, she spent 13 years teaching at an elementary school, three years as a librarian and 13 years teaching basic skills in the adult upgrading program at Seneca College.

But the Bookclub-in-a-Box activities are not classes, Herbert says. "That's too academic."

Rather, they're programs based around reading, writing, discussing, or viewing, she says.

The goal is "to make lifelong readers," she says. "Just come and relax and learn something new."

Herbert will host an open house on Sept. 7 for anybody interested in seeing the centre. New programs beginning in autumn include kids programs, talks about plays and writing classes.

Jew is a disorienting, surreal novel

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

If Yann Martel, the author of Beatrice & Virgil, believes that the Holocaust should be represented more often as fiction, he has to look no further than D.O. Dodd's Jew (Exile Editions).

This strange and confusing short novel begins with a man emerging naked and alive from the middle of a pile of dead human bodies, 15 feet high. Flies buzz around and rats dig into and out of the pile. This book is heavy with vivid, graphic descriptions.

The man has no idea who he is and what he was doing in that pile of bodies. He presumes he is supposed to be dead, but he has no idea why.

He finds a building nearby, and inside it, a uniform – "a black shirt, black trousers, a jacket with shimmering insignias on the sleeves." He puts on the uniform, complete with boots and gun holster.

In another room he sees a man in bed with a woman. This man looked remarkably like him and could be his twin. Using the other man's gun, he shoots the man in the bed and assumes his identity.

Confused? This book seems to be intentionally confusing. None of the characters are named, and are all identified as "The Younger Soldier," "The Balding Officer," "The Black Haired Woman From The Bakery," etc. The reader is as bewildered as the main character who has no idea who he is, or why he looks like the man he shot, and why that man wanted him dead.

The man assumes the role of his would-be assassin, a commander of some kind of einsatzgruppen-like commando unit, as he tries to determine what his role is in this Holocaust-style genocide.

Is this a Holocaust novel, or isn't it?

Throughout the book we are shown scenes reminiscent of eastern Europe in World War II. Roadblocks, men in uniforms, roundups, piles of dead bodies, people hiding in basements and wanton executions. It certainly feels like a Holocaust novel.

Yet if this is a Holocaust novel, it seems to have the roles reversed. Are the Jews the perpetrators of this madness? And, other than the one-word title, there is very little overt Jewishness. Is this some sort of futuristic, alt-history book, perhaps?

Words such as "Kafkaesque" are used to describe this novel, which is another way of saying that Jew is a disorienting, surreal novel that leaves the reader asking questions.

Dodd, a Canadian writer with two previous books, is a master at graphic descriptions. One scene has the main character digging through a room full of discarded household items, as if he is swimming in them, much as he earlier dug through the pile of bodies, and the description is so vivid you can sense his exact geometric orientation in this cluttered room.

His (or her – the author's gender is unknown) writing style is probably intentionally confusing and at times can be hard to follow. The violence and sexuality is frequently rather graphic, and is probably not to everyone's tastes.

Like Beatrice & Virgil, Jew takes Holocaust literature into another dimension, although unlike Martel's book, this one doesn't have a lovable monkey and donkey as its protagonists.

Maury Chaykin 'saw life through the eyes of a child'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Award-winning veteran character actor Maury Chaykin died last week at Toronto General Hospital on his 61st birthday, July 27.

He was reported to have been suffering from kidney problems.

A native of Brooklyn, N.Y., Chaykin was a dual citizen of the United States and Canada, born to an American father and a Canadian mother.

Obituary

He studied drama at the State University of New York in Buffalo and has been based in Toronto since 1974, when he moved here for work.

Chaykin's father, who died in 2007 at age 94, was a CPA who taught at City College, and his mother was a nurse who was born in Winnipeg and moved at age three to Montreal. Chaykin used to visit his grandparents there as a child. He also had an uncle in Toronto, he told The CJN in a 1999 interview.

Maury Chaykin was a prolific stage, screen and television actor who played a mentally unstable cavalry officer in Kevin Costner's 1990 movie Dances With Wolves. It turned out to be his breakthrough performance.

"Because of the success of the film, it put me out there in a way that I had not been before, even after playing major roles in films that had not been nearly as successful," Chaykin told The CJN in 1999.

More recently, he completed filming the second season of HBO Canada's Less Than Kind, on which he played Sam Blecher, the patriarch of a dysfunctional Winnipeg Jewish family. Chaykin was also well known for playing overbearing studio executive Harvey Weingard – said to be a parody of real-life film mogul Harvey Weinstein – on the popular HBO series Entourage.

In 1986, he won a best actor Actra award for Sweetheart, The Saga of Hal Banks, followed by three Genie awards, one in 1994 for his lead role as an agoraphobic rock star in Whale Music, and the others for a guest appearance on La Femme Nikita (1997) and the TV miniseries At The Hotel (2006).

As well, he appeared in supporting roles in The Mask of Zorro with Antonio Banderas, Anthony Hopkins, and Catherine Zeta-Jones; Entrapment, with Sean Connery, and in a number of Atom Egoyan films, most notably The Adjuster.

Chaykin is known for originating the title role in The Golden Spiders: A Nero Wolfe Mystery, an A&E television movie, which went on to become a popular series.

Chaykin's colleague and friend Sheila McCarthy, who appeared with him in a 1991 children's film called George's Island, told The CJN in an e-mail, "Maury was a muse for me… He saw life through the eyes of a child. That's how he attacked his profession. He was free and crazy, and I adored him. No one will be able to fill his shoes, but thankfully there are over 100 movies to watch of his brilliant work. And I have precious home movies to watch where the man behind the clown is there always with a twinkle and a secret. Maury was a genius."

Chaykin is survived by his wife, actress Susannah Hoffman, and their daughter Rose.

A memorial service is being planned.

SUMMER LITERARY COLUMN, PART II: SHOLEM ASCH RECONSIDERED

Eighty years ago, as Yiddish writer and playwright Sholem Asch celebrated his 50th birthday in 1930, he seemed to be riding on top of the world. His newest book, Fam Mabul, was a critical and popular success among Yiddish readers – it would soon become vastly more popular in its English translation as Three Cities – and his various plays were doing well both in Poland and the United States. In birthday celebrations in Paris, Warsaw, Vienna and other cities, he was toasted by the writers Franz Werfel, Stefan Zweig and other famous friends, while Albert Einstein and Chaim Weizmann cabled their congratulations.

Asch, it was said, was the first Yiddish writer able to support himself and his family solely through his literary earnings. He always travelled first-class, was a regular contributor to the New York Daily Forverts, and was arguably the most celebrated and popular Yiddish writer of his day. Three Cities was so highly regarded that in 1933, Asch was nominated for a Nobel Prize in literature – some 45 years before I. B. Singer became the first and only Yiddish writer to actually win that prize.

After his first book of stories, In a shlekhter tsayt (In a Bad Time, 1902), established him as a wunderkind of the Yiddish literary renaissance, he wrote books and plays prolifically, all drawn from the Jewish world, present and past. Among Jewish readers, his popularity seemed unshakable. Not even his controversial 1909 play God of Vengeance, which was closed down on Broadway because of its explicit depiction of a lesbian relationship, could seriously harm his base of adoring fans.

Yet little more than a decade later, his standing among Jewish readers suddenly dropped precipitously, never to recover, as a result of his controversial decision to write three novels about Jesus and Christianity. In the ominous year of 1939, Asch brought out The Nazarene in English after editor Abraham Cahan utterly refused to publish the Yiddish original in installments in the Forverts as he had done with most of Asch's previous works. The book was an "indescribable mistake, and much worse than a mistake," Cahan railed. "It will remain a disgusting stain on Yiddish literature. There cannot be two opinions about this."

For many, Asch's subsequent publication of The Apostle (1943) and Mary (1949) only added salt to the deep wound of what many saw as his callous betrayal of Judaism. True, many literary reviewers hailed these novels as artistic triumphs, and The Nazarene, at least, climbed impressively up the New York Times bestseller list. Asch defended himself by explaining that, as a Jewish writer, he wanted merely to reclaim Jesus as a Jewish figure and thereby reconcile Christians and Jews. But his attackers did not relent in their angry assertions that he had abandoned the Jewish world just when he was needed the most, and could have better exerted his influence combating Nazism.

Sholem Asch

"His Jewish readership could not comprehend a Jewish author writing in Yiddish who turned from his traditional preoccupation with Jewish life to the origins of Christianity as a focus for his writing," observes literary critic Nanette Stahl. "The fact that these novels appeared during the Second World War as the Nazi annihilation of European Jewry was unfolding did not help his cause."

Cahan led a vituperative campaign against Asch in the Forverts and even wrote an entire book to denounce his alleged apostasy. He also began referring to some of Asch's earlier works as "shund" or artless trash. Taking up the sword, Forverts writer Herman Lieberman wrote a highly antagonistic piece claiming that Asch's novel could serve to "lure Jewish children into worshipping foreign gods." Stung beyond words, Asch saw Lieberman at a public gathering and rewarded him with a resounding slap across the face.

Ironically, The Nazarene did so well commercially that it gave Asch a new level of financial security, but what profiteth a man to gain the world and lose his popular base of support? Neither The Apostle nor Mary did as well commercially. By the time Mary was ready for production, Asch's longtime translator, Maurice Samuels, wanted nothing more to do with the books and refused the assignment. In 1951, Asch published Moses, his grand novelistic retelling of the Exodus saga, but his status as the author of The Nazarene and his other Christian books seemed only to undercut his authority in Jewish eyes.

As Asch's grandson, David Mazower, pointed out in a 2000 essay, had it not been for Asch's foray into the forbidden realm of Christology, he might, upon his death in 1957, have had a legendary funeral of the sort that had been reserved for only a few Yiddish greats before him. "Had he died 20 or 30 years earlier, his passing might have attracted the sort of mass crowds that packed Warsaw to pay tribute to [I.L.] Peretz in 1915 and accompanied Sholom Aleichem's hearse from the Bronx all the way to Brooklyn the next year," Mazower wrote. Instead, only a handful of relatives and mourners attended the funeral in a cemetery in the Golders Green section of London.

Is it time to resurrect Asch's damaged reputation? That was the question that brought together an international group of scholars 10 years ago for a conference on Asch at Yale University. The conference resulted in the publication of Sholem Asch Reconsidered, a thoughtful book of essays edited by Stahl with contributions from more than a dozen writers.

Among other conclusions, the essays demonstrate Asch's towering influence in the world of Yiddish letters. In the essay Sholem Asch and I. B. Singer, Montreal writer David G. Roskies itemizes Singer's great debt to Asch. Singer's The Family Moskat was written in response to Asch's Three Cities, Roskies contends, just as Shadows on the Hudson was Singer's reply to Asch's East River, his 1946 novel about New York City life.

It was Mazower who noted Yiddish poet-essayist Melech Ravitch's prophetic remark that "a true assessment of Asch's work will have to wait for future generations – perhaps 70 years from now, not less." Some three-quarters of a century later – right on cue, it seems – critics are just beginning to sift through the ashes of one of the hottest controversies to blaze through the Jewish literary world over the last century.

Mississippi town is a mecca for Faulkner fans

William Faulkner

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

OXFORD, Miss. — The town of Jefferson, in Yoknapatawpha county, looms large in the fiction of William Faulkner, a son of Mississippi and a revered Southern writer.

In truth, Jefferson is modelled after the real town of Oxford – the home of the University of Mississippi, or Ole Miss, as it's known – while fictional Yoknapatawpha county stands in for Lafayette county.

Faulkner, a Nobel Prize laureate and a National Book Award winner whose works are set in his native state, was born in nearby New Albany in 1897 and moved to Oxford with his family when he was four years old.

After dropping out of Ole Miss in 1920 after only three semesters, he turned to serious writing, publishing a succession of novels and short stories. Novels such as The Sound and the Fury and Light in August and short stories ranging from These 13 to A Rose for Emily solidified his reputation as a master of the English language.

Although he travelled far and wide, Faulkner maintained his residence in Oxford, which is about an hour's drive from Memphis, where the rock legend Elvis Presley lived. In 1930, Faulkner bought Rowan Oak, an antebellum house set on a densely wooded property, and resided there until his death on July 6, 1962.

A picturesque and sophisticated town distinguished by antebellum buildings in the Northern Preservation District, Oxford is built around a scenic square and named after the British university town. It is also the home of best-selling author John Grisham, a graduate of Ole Miss.

Much to its chagrin, Oxford gained instant notoriety during the civil rights era in the 1960s, when the state governor, Ross Barnett, and Ole Miss officials tried in vain to prevent James Meredith, an African-American, from integrating the staunchly segregated institution.

The confrontation pitting the forces of progress against reaction took place at the university's administrative building, the Lyceum, which now faces a statue of Meredith striding forward purposefully.

Obviously, times have changed in Mississippi. The first U.S. presidential debate of the 2008 campaign, featuring African-American candidate Barack Obama, was held at Ole Miss.

Faulkner, who died on the eve of the university's federally enforced desegregation, directly drew on Oxford for inspiration, at least in one instance.

Oxford's stately, white-washed, 19th-century Lafayette county courthouse, which has been designated as a National Historic Landmark, figures in one of his novels, Requiem for a Nun. Finished in 1873 and refurbished in 1981, it is a stunningly magnificent building.

On its southern side is a tall limestone statue that honours fallen Confederate soldiers. An inscription reads, "They gave their lives in a just and holy cause." The statue was erected in 1907, just 17 years after Mississippi enacted a constitution that virtually disenfranchised African-Americans and established the Magnolia state as a hardcore bastion of Jim Crow discriminatory laws.

Mississippi, alternately claimed by France, Spain and Britain before joining the United States as its 20th state in 1817, was always a redoubt of the deep South. Having seceded from the Union in 1861 in hopes of preserving its slave-based economy, based mainly on the cultivation of cotton on plantations, Mississippi was effectively a battlefield during the four-year Civil War. Indeed, Oxford was virtually burned to the ground by federal troops in 1864.

A year into that extremely bloody conflict, Ulysses S. Grant, a Union general and a future American president, wrote one of the most infamous orders in U.S. history from his base in Oxford.

After president Abraham Lincoln prohibited commerce with the Confederacy – whose first attorney general, and later its secretary of war and secretary of state, Judah P. Benjamin, was Jewish – Union generals were charged with the responsibility of enforcing the edict.

With some traders and merchants flouting Lincoln's edict, Grant issued Order No. 11 on Dec. 17, 1862, in which he singled out Jews as the main culprits and expelled them from his military department in the region. Shortly afterward, due to Jewish protests, Lincoln rescinded the unprecedented order.

To a visitor seeking out places in Oxford associated with Faulkner, the county courthouse is not the only destination of choice.

A statue of Faulkner holding a pipe can be found near the J.E. Neilson department store – supposedly the oldest such emporium in the South – and Square Books, one of the finest independent book stores in the country.

You can also stop at Duval House, Faulkner's first home after his marriage to Estelle Oldham and where he wrote Sanctuary and several short stories, and at Faulkner's childhood home on Lincoln Avenue.

Faulkner's 1948 novel, Intruder in the Dust, was made into a Hollywood film, and it was partially shot on the first and second floors of a local building known as Jennie's Hallmark.

The J.D. Williams Library on the campus of Ole Miss contains Faulkner's collection of books and manuscripts and his Nobel Prize (which he won in 1949).

The university's post office, Fraser Hall, is where Faulkner worked as a clerk starting in 1921. He hated the job. "I refuse to place myself at the beck and call of every S.O.B. with the price of a two-cent stamp," he is reputed to have said.

Rowan Oak, however, is the piece de resistance of any tour linked with Faulkner's life in Oxford.

A primitive Greek Revival home originally constructed in the 1840s by an Irish immigrant planter, and now the property of Ole Miss, Rowan Oak was purchased by Faulkner after his novel, As I Lay Dying, was published.

Faulkner named his residence after both the rowan tree, a symbol of peace and security, and the oak tree, which is emblematic of strength. "Rowan Oak was Faulkner's private world, in reality and imagination," says its official publication.

Approached by an imposing alley of high cedars, Rowan Oak is a simple dwelling in terms of its relatively muted architecture and plain furnishings.

The library contains shelves that Faulkner himself built and is graced with a painted portrait of the great man above a fireplace mantle. The parlour is dominated by French Provincial furniture and a grand piano. The dining room has a table and chairs and a china cabinet.

In Faulkner's office, the plot outline of A Fable is written on the wall in his own hand. The pantry is where Faulkner received word that he had won the Nobel Prize. In the kitchen are a deep freezer, an electric oven and a refrigerator.

Upstairs, on the second floor, are the mostly unadornerd bedrooms of Faulkner, his wife and children.

If you're an admirer of great writers, Oxford is definitely the place to visit.

Oliver Stone apologizes for anti-Jewish remarks

JTA

LOS ANGELES — Oscar-winning director Oliver Stone apologized for saying in an interview that the Jewish lobby controls Washington's foreign policy and that Hitler's actions should be put "into context."

In an interview late last month with the Sunday Times, Stone also said that "Jewish domination of the media" has prevented an honest discussion about the Holocaust.

"In trying to make a broader historical point about the range of atrocities the Germans committed against many people, I made a clumsy association about the Holocaust, for which I am sorry and I regret," Stone said in a statement released the day after his remarks were published in the British newspaper.

In the article, written by Camilla Long, Stone said that Jews were dictating U.S. foreign policy and that the Jewish lobby "are hard workers."

"They stay on top of every comment, the most powerful lobby in Washington," he said, adding that Israel has "f---ed up U.S. foreign policy for years."

Stone retracted that statement in his apology. "Jews obviously do not control media or any other industry. The fact that the Holocaust is still a very important, vivid and current matter today is, in fact, a great credit to the very hard work of a broad coalition of people committed to the remembrance of this atrocity – and it was an atrocity."

Stone, the winner of three Academy Awards, including as best director for Platoon and Born on the Fourth of July, has a Jewish father. He also directed such films as Wall Street, JFK and Nixon.

On Hitler, Stone said that the German leader "did far more damage to the Russians than the Jewish people, 25 or 30 million. Hitler was a Frankenstein, but there was also a Dr. Frankenstein – German industrialists, the Americans and the British. He had a lot of support."

Stone recently completed a documentary on Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez and is working on a documentary series about American history.

Caesarea golf course listed among world's top 1,000

Compiled by CJN Staff

The Caesarea Golf Course in Israel has broken into the top ranks of international golf facilities with its recent inclusion in The Rolex World's Top 1,000 Golf Courses.

The guide, produced by French golf pioneer Gaetan Mourgue D'Algue in conjunction with Swiss watchmaker Rolex, was based on the views of more than 200 recommenders, golfers, pros, amateurs and reporters.

The recommenders were asked to write about a course according to strict guidelines, including quality of the course, architecture and maintenance. Other relevant information, such as nearby restaurants, hotels and tourist attractions, were also considered. Each course has a map of the area and of the course itself.

Of the 1,000 recommended golf courses, 362 are in the United States, 282 are in Europe, 237 in Asia and Australia, 118 are in other locations and one is in Israel.

In a news release, Caesarea Golf Club acknowledged inclusion in the prestigious publication by noting, "We have a great course that was designed by Pete Dye, the maintenance is very high and we are near the Caesarea National Park, which offers spectacular beaches, a wide range of restaurants, cafes and galleries."

The guide found that Turkey is developing golf tourism and has opened many golf courses. Russia has joined this trend and is in the process of opening 24 new golf courses. China is leading the golf expansion in Asia and had 40 of its courses included in the guide. According to D'Algue, golf will soon become a hot trend in India.

Israel's first international golf course in Caesarea reopened recently after an extensive 18-month renovation by Dye, a renowned golf course architect.

The original vision of British benefactor James de Rothschild, the Caesarea Golf Course was designed by Fred Smith in 1961 with the support of the Rothschild Foundation. The remodelled course includes longer fairways – almost 330 yards have been added – and offers a new, challenging design to meet international golf course standards.

The Caesarea Golf Club features an 18-hole course, spacious training ranges, skilled instructors, a golf academy for children, a pro shop and a gourmet restaurant.

The club is located in central Caesarea and is a short drive from the Caesarea National Park, which boasts a Roman amphitheatre and Crusader ruins.

Hoops star seeks Jewish roots

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — American basketball star Amar'e Stoudemire is on his way to Israel for a voyage of discovery after learning he has Jewish roots.

"On the flight to Israel. This is going to be a great trip," the 6-foot-10, 249-pound power forward announced via the microblogging site Twitter.

According to an Army Radio report, Stoudemire, who plays in the NBA for the New York Knicks, plans to spend time in Israel learning Hebrew, because he says he recently learned his mother is Jewish.

"The Holy Land. Learn about it," he wrote, adding, "Ze ha'chalom sheli" – Hebrew for "This is my dream."

News of Stoudemire's trip quickly had Israeli basketball fans buzzing with speculation that they might one day see him playing alongside another Jewish NBA star, Israel's Omri Caspi, on the national team. Stoudemire was the 2003 NBA rookie of the year, a five-time all-star and a bronze medal-winner with the 2004 U.S. Olympic team. He signed a five-year, $99.9-million (US) deal with the Knicks on July 8 after playing eight seasons with the Phoenix Suns.

So far there is no indication as to whether Stoudemire is in Israel to stay – although for the moment, Israel seems to be getting along just fine without him, beating Great Britain 86-82 in a training game last week.

Stoudemire was born in Lake Wales, Fla. His father died when he was 12 and his mother, Carrie, 54, has had numerous run-ins with the law.

Her most recent incident involving police occurred in May when she was arrested in Arizona for driving a car without an Ignition Interlock Device. The device prevents a car from starting until the driver's blood alcohol concentration is measured.

Bonding over the TV

NEW TO CANADA
By NINA SHENHAV

We bought our family's fourth TV set for our daughter. After all, it was only fair. Our son has one in his room, we've got one in our room, and the flowerpots have one in the living room.

"Would you like to have a nice TV set in your room?" Meir asked the girl sweetly.

"No, Daddy, I'd like to have a bicycle," said his little ungrateful one.

Of course, at our house, the kids don't get to call the shots. So we bought the TV. Besides, did I have a bicycle at her age? I did, but that's beside the point.

A week later, we put the heavy device in her room and called her in to watch it. She finally came after a few hours – the neighbour was teaching her to ride her new bike – and sat purposefully, if reluctantly, in front of the machine.

Little by little, she became attached to the illuminated instrument, and after a few days, they were inseparable. (So what if she missed a few days of school. Do you know how educational daytime TV can be?)

But then a strange dynamic began to develop in our home during the evenings. Before, all four of us had gathered around the TV in our bedroom, watching, arguing, fighting, hitting and shouting during the commercials breaks. We bonded.

But after we got the new TV, because the girl watched in her room, the boy also became independent and stayed in his room, so Meir and I found ourselves alone, just the two of us, in our room.

To tell you the truth, it was creepy.

"So," coughed Meir, "what, what did you do today?" I felt a bit nervous. "Um, I went to buy some cucumbers," I replied quickly. "Really?" said Meir, trying too hard to look interested. Then the commercial break ended – thank God – and we were good again.

Trembling, we met again at the second commercial break.

"So what kind of cucumbers did you buy?" he asked hesitantly. After slowly taking a sip of my pop, I answered, "Well, the green ones." And then I shouted at my shocked kids, who sat immobile in their respective domains, "Clean up your rooms!" (or something like that).

They gave me some attitude, which, thank God, killed another five minutes.

After a few days, things were becoming horrible. Meir noticed that I was developing a new pimple on my chin, and I discovered that his eyebrows are growing wild.

Honestly, I didn't know how much longer I could take it (after the cucumbers discussion, we naturally slid into the "Do you still love me?" debate, and from then on, the sky was the ugly limit).

But, God does exist, and miracles do happen.

The boy's TV set acted up. In fact, it died.

"Come join us!" I cried happily.

"We'll watch whatever you want!" promised Meir. Naturally, the girl wanted to join the party, and I even grabbed one of the flowerpots from the living room to join us. (Hey, the more, the merrier!)

We watched and watched, and as for the commercials breaks – what a joy, so much fun. Such bonding. I love my family.

We decided not to fix the boy's TV.

"After all," I explained to Meir, "who needs a TV in his room? A TV is a distraction. A person should be able to talk and bond with his partner in the evenings, without watching some stupid shows!"

Cardio boxing provides fun, fitness

FITNESS CORNER
By FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

If getting into shape quickly and easily this summer is what you want, then cardio boxing for you. It's a total body conditioning workout that anyone can do.

Made famous in the 1990s, cardio boxing is still one of the best ways to get in shape and stay fit. The workout consists of basic boxing punches and kicks performed in sequence, similar to those in aerobics classes. But unlike actual boxing, cardio boxing emphasizes the movements without you having to come into contact with anyone.

Cardio boxing is a fantastic stress reliever that can increase your overall health, and it's fun to do. It's a great way to improve strength, balance and co-ordination while increasing stamina and mental agility.

The exercise routines include both upper and lower body movements, creating a constant shift in body weight, causing the core to activate to maintain balance. The regular switching between movements increases mental alertness, due to the focus required to complete the routines. The faster you can alternate your arm and leg movements the harder your body and mind works.

Cardio boxing also increases joint mobility while enhancing muscle definition. The steady use of all the muscles in the body during a cardio boxing session leads to a significant increase in lean muscle mass without having to lift any weights.

Cardio boxing is a cardiovascular and muscle endurance workout that burns up to 500 calories an hour, even if you never master the perfect punch or kick. The idea is to keep moving, performing short, easy boxing routines for about 20 to 30 minutes. You can increase the intensity and burn even more calories by adding resistance bands to your arm movements or a punching bag.

Classes or individual sessions can be found at any fitness level at your local community centre, gym, fitness or boxing studio. If you've never worked out before, hiring a personal trainer for private instruction before you start any exercise program is always a good idea.

Hear the abuser

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

This summer, Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee started a Street Academy for the homeless. In the classroom, I listened to our students' history, often graphic depictions of horrible, horrible lives in which they had been terribly abused and humiliated.

It was painful for me and sometimes cathartic for the person telling their story.

We have all heard stories about people who have been abused. I wondered, though, wouldn't there be value in hearing from a parent who had beaten a child so badly that the child needed to be hospitalized, or drugged a child with amphetamines so he/she could go out on the town?

Would it not be cleansing for society to hear and then understand that person's situation, but mostly, wouldn't it help the abuser? If we are to deal with the abuse that exists in and outside the Jewish community, then we have no choice but to hear from the abuser.

This is exactly what we are trying to do in Canada through the "truth and reconciliation" process in regards to the residential schools. The native communities, the abused, have decided they will listen to representatives of the federal government, the RCMP and the church – the abusers – so native peoples might find peace and perhaps forgiveness.

For a moment in history, our aboriginal people, like the blacks in South Africa, withheld harsh judgment against those who beat, pummelled, maimed and murdered them, as we need to do with individuals who are doing the same to their children, spouses and/or parents.

The next question is: where can abusive people go to express the awful things they have done and try to rehabilitate? Where do they feel safe? The police? That would be risky. A therapist? A therapist has a duty to report if a client is harming a child.

The problem is enormous. If someone is hitting a child, mentally abusing a spouse or parents and are ready to get help, he/she will find few places to get help. If such an organization existed however, it could be instrumental in changing many people's lives – the abused and the abuser.

How do I know? I am reading a compelling book about growth, called Switch. The authors draw upon examples of individuals who have found innovative ways of creating change through determination, courage and a belief that growth is possible.

One such example comes from a study conducted at the University of Oklahoma in 2004 with 110 parents who acted violently toward their children. Therapists instructed parents to sit in a laboratory and play with their children, allowing their progeny to lead the play. They were not allowed to criticize, give commands or even to ask questions – the idea being, to let the child express his/herself and for the parent to not think they had to get in the way.

Next, the parent was taught to praise the child and eventually to command, but with a reason.

The study provided the parent with a script and clear instructions and guidance, so he/she and the child had clarity. Once the ambivalence was gone, so was the anger on both sides.

The results after three years showed 80 per cent of parents never repeated their abuse; this is compared to abusers who have gone through traditional anger management programs, after which 60 per cent were repeat offenders. The study showed that abusers, when given help, can get better.

If you are abusing someone, seek help. Once you've found assistance, help someone else. Then start an organization that does the same. It's possible.

Seeking forgiveness amid tears at Babi Yar

Last week, hundreds of Europeans took part in a "March of Life" near the city of Kiev, Ukraine. The ceremony was in memory of the six million Jews killed in World War II. Some 200 Germans joined the march, along with children and grandchildren of some of the Jews who survived the war. The marchers walked through the forest near Kiev to the ravine at Babi Yar, the notorious killing place where more than 30,000 Jews were slaughtered on Sept. 29 and 30, 1941. Thousands of others – Soviet POWs, Ukrainian civilians, political activists and Gypsies – were also killed there by the Nazis. In the photo at left, Anke Krueger, crying, apologizes and seeks forgiveness from a fellow marcher for the crimes committed by her grandfather against the Jewish people. The organizer of the march was Jobst Bittner, a German pastor.

Iran creates Holocaust-denying website

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iran has launched a website with cartoons on the Holocaust aimed at undermining the historic dimensions of the mass murder of Jews during World War II, Fars news agency reported last Thursday.

Please see editorial on page 8

The site is financed by a non-governmental cultural foundation and mainly based on a cartoon book on the Holocaust published in 2008, which contained satirical cartoons and texts aimed at questioning the Holocaust.

The website, which opens to the Pink Panther theme song by Henry Mancini, reportedly wants to continue challenging the issue and show that "the killing of six million Jews in World War II known as the Holocaust was a sheer lie."

"The site is dedicated to all those who have been killed under the pretext of the Holocaust," Fars reported, referring to Palestinians who, according to Iran, were killed under the Holocaust pretext.

Reports of the site drew an angry response from Israel's national Holocaust museum, Yad Vashem.

"The launch of a website dedicated to denying the Holocaust through caricatures and text is yet the latest salvo emanating from Iran that denies the facts of the Holocaust and attempts to influence those who are ignorant of history," Yad Vashem said in a statement.

"The vulgar and cynical approach of the website, a combination of Holocaust denial and distortion, illustrated with anti-Semitic caricatures, further illustrates Iran's disregard for reality and truth vis-à-vis the Holocaust, Jews and Israel."

Yad Vashem added that its own "Farsi-language website, as well as websites in English, Arabic, Spanish, Russian and Hebrew, provide comprehensive, credible information about the history of the Holocaust to anyone interested in learning the truth."

The News in Brief

Canada

Refinery Sale Dead

MONTREAL — Shell Canada and the U.S. subsidiary of Israeli oil giant Delek have ended last-ditch efforts for Delek-U.S. Holdings to buy Shell's 77-year-old refinery in east Montreal, Delek-U.S. CEO Uzi Yemen said in a release last week. That paves the way for Shell to convert the facility into a distribution terminal. With hundreds of jobs at stake, Delek-U.S., the only viable buyer, and Shell came under pressure to reach a deal. Shell had earlier rejected a Delek offer of $420 million for the facility and gas stations in Quebec and the Maritimes. Union leaders say they'll fight the refinery's conversion.

Ex-MSO Violist Dies

MONTREAL — Otto Joachim, a refugee from Nazi Germany who became a leading musical figure as a violist, violinist, atonal avant-garde composer and teacher, died in Montreal on July 30 at age 99. Joachim was principal violist under Zubin Mehta for the Montreal Symphony Orchestra and founded the Montreal String Quartet with his late brother, Walter, a cellist. Although an expert in classical music who once recorded with Glenn Gould, he maintained an interest in computers and was a pioneer in electronic music, composing Katamavik for the Canadian Pavilion in Expo 67.

World

Temple in Brazil?

SAO PAOLO — A $200-million replica of King Solomon's Temple will be built in Sao Paolo, Brazil. The 10,000-seat replica of the Temple, which was destroyed in 587 BCE, will be built by the Universal Church of the Kingdom of God, a Pentecostal church. It will be about 413 feet high and 341 feet wide, dwarfing Brazil's largest church, the Catedral da Sé. Entretanto. The Temple was made of gold, but the replica will be built of Jerusalem stone imported from Israel for $8 million.

Kaddish App Released

CHICAGO — A new iPhone application teaches the recitation of the Kaddish, the mourner's prayer recited daily in shul. The free tutorial iKaddish 1.0 for iPhones and iPods was released Aug. 1 by Chicago-based Davka Corp. It shows the Kaddish text in the original Aramaic and English transliteration, and chants it, highlighting each word as it's read. The app includes both Sephardi and Ashkenazi pronunciations, and an explanatory section with English translation.

Kagan Confirmed

WASHINGTON, D.C. — U.S. Solicitor General Elana Kagan became the third Jewish justice on the current U.S. Supreme Court with her confirmation in a 63-37 vote by the U.S. Senate Aug. 5. Kagan, 50, joins Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen Breyer as Jews on high court and is the fourth woman to serve. The New York City native and former dean of Harvard Law School was a policy adviser in the Clinton White House. President Barack Obama nominated her to replace retired Justice John Paul Stevens, who served for 35 years. She's expected to support the court's liberal wing, which Stevens led.

Newsweek Sold to Businessman For $1

Sidney Harman

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Newsweek magazine was sold to a Jewish businessman and philanthropist, while a group of Jews active in the local community bought the Washington Jewish Week.

Sidney Harman, 91, will buy Newsweek from the Washington Post Company, it was announced Aug. 2. Bidding lasted two months. Harman paid $1 and will accept Newsweek's $71 million in liabilities.

Washington Post chairman Donald Graham reportedly chose Harman, founder of audio equipment firm Harman Industries, over other bidders because he pledged to preserve Newsweek's character and keep the most staff.

At the Washington Jewish Week, a group owned by David Butler, Allan Fox, Michael Gelman, Stuart Kurlander and Louis Mayberg took over Aug. 2. HarborPoint Media didn't give reasons for the sale, editor Debra Rubin said. The company owns three community newspapers in Florida. Butler and Gelman are past presidents of Washington's Jewish federation. Gelman chairs the Jewish Federations of North America's executive committee.

The new group plans to improve the paper and want it to "be a newspaper, not a newsletter," Rubin said.

Orthodox statement on gays released

170 individuals sign landmark document

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A number of Canadians have added their names to a statement of principles calling for the acceptance of gays in the Orthodox community.

Signed by some 170 Orthodox rabbis, educators and mental health professionals in Canada, the United States and Israel, the statement was released July 29, the same day as the 2010 gay pride parade in Jerusalem.

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler

It says that "all human beings are created in the image of God and deserve to be treated with dignity and respect (kevod haberiyot).

"Every Jew is obligated to fulfil the entire range of mitzvot between person and person in relation to persons who are homosexual or have feelings of same-sex attraction. Embarrassing, harassing or demeaning someone with a homosexual orientation or same-sex attraction is a violation of Torah prohibitions that embody the deepest values of Judaism."

The statement goes on to say that Halachah "sees heterosexual marriage as the ideal model and sole legitimate outlet for human sexual expression. The sensitivity and understanding we properly express for human beings with other sexual orientations does not diminish our commitment to that principle."

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler, spiritual leader of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation in Toronto and one of the signatories, said that the statement is an attempt to express the values of Halachah. "It recognizes the clear values of the Torah. Homosexual relations are forbidden, but [at the same time] we should have respect for all people. [Everyone] should be treated with a degree of understanding.

"We are not condoning homosexual acts, but we welcome [homosexuals] in our synagogues. We understand the trials in their lives, and we do not want to cause them unneeded harm."

Rabbi Martin Lockshin, a professor of Jewish studies at York University and a rabbi of the Toronto Partnership Minyan, said the statement is an important step in acknowledging that homosexuals need to be accepted into the Jewish community.

"It is a well-crafted statement that does not ignore the issues of Jewish law. It makes clear what is and is not permitted," said Rabbi Lockshin, who signed the document and helped edit its Hebrew version.

He said that he's "gratified" to see the wide range of people who signed the statement. "I am happy to see a number of Canadian names."

Rabbi Reuven Bulka, spiritual leader of Congregation Machzikei Hadas in Ottawa, said that he didn't sign the statement "because the truth is, there is nothing new. Most rabbis have already operated under that system.

Theatre leads to the truth

From the editor's desk...

From the very first moment years and years ago when sages, songsters, balladeers, raconteurs and even hucksters held their audiences entangled in the flowing spin of long yarns, theatre has held a special place in our lives.

In being transported to the places of the storytellers' imaginations, we weigh and measure, dismiss or accept the many different truths they intend us to encounter along the way. And in measuring their truths, of course, we measure the truths, the verities – vulnerabilities and vitalities – of our own lives.

In sum, that is the magic of theatre. In the sheer entertainment of the players' enterprise we find fun and delight, and almost always, more precise – and if we are lucky – kinder self-awareness.

In this part of the world, there is probably no rival to the experience of that magic than the Stratford Shakespeare Festival in Ontario.

Each of three plays I saw there in recent weeks is a high testament of praise to the transformative magic of the festival.

Evita tells a brash, dark story of shameless ambition, rough and tumble politics, conscienceless politicians and military men, exploitative demagogues, manipulative nationalists, and even painfully poignant, naive, but ultimately destructive self-delusion.

This is not a soft portrait of life edged in gauzy fabric conveyed through sweet song and reverie. And the music and the libretto are faithful to that portrait. Lyricist Tim Rice and composer Andrew Lloyd Webber have captured the lives and times of the story with harsh, brassy sounds, sharply knifed emotions and, at times, clanging harmonies and disharmonies.

The performances of Chilina Kennedy as Evita and Joshua Bell as Che Guevara are especially strong. After only two years, Kennedy has established herself as a spunky theatre talent of compelling magnetic force. Bell's execution of the role is noteworthy because this is his debut at Stratford. He brings forth a finely balanced portrayal of the storied revolutionary, combining the necessary ingredients required of the character: musical agility, awakening passion and the sneering contempt of a society he observes with pity and wishes to remake.

Director Des McAnuff has made this year's staging of Shakespeare's The Tempest an imaginative, visual triumph, in dazzling complement to the bard's witty, playful, thoughtful narrative of betrayal, intrigue, love and reconciliation.

The experienced cast of players dish out the sweets of the play in large portions, performing to the level of high plaudits. A number of virtuoso performances, however, deserve special mention.

Christopher Plummer

Julyana Soelistyo as the devoted, puckish spirit Ariel was superb. Geraint Wyn Davies and Bruce Dow as Stephano and Trinculo, respectively, were masterful in providing the large dollops of comic relief that are the virtues of their roles.

Christopher Plummer, perhaps now the grandest of current Canadian actors, brought the house down. The appreciative audience gave him an adoring, 10-minute standing ovation after the performance. In unison, it seemed, the audience thought the opportunity too important to let pass without a very large, tangible expression of appreciation. And we were right to do so, giving back to the players a portion of the pleasure they gave us.

Of the three productions, however, the emotions and reactions evoked by Jacques Brel is Alive and Well and Living in Paris penetrated furthest.

The play reprises the late-'60s, early-'70s production conceived and executed by Eric Blau and Mort Shuman, who translated the music and lyrics of the profoundly talented Belgian writer, poet, balladeer Jacques Brel. It was a powerful emotional, sensatory and intellectual experience.

Brel lived, alas, only 49 years. He died in 1978 after a long battle with cancer. His poetry and music are remarkable for the powerful imagery and biting wisdom of his insights, the hauntingly moving depictions of the plights and conditions of the "ordinary people" he knew to be the true heroes of difficult life, and the vividly memorable melodies that carry his poetry to higher dimensions.

Director Stafford Arima said his aim was to "re-explore" the original musical review.

The cast – Jewelle Blackman, Brent Carver, Mike Nadajewski and Nathalie Nadon – and the orchestra were simply outstanding in helping Arima succeed in the re-exploration of Brel's music.

Each of the 27 songs performed by the company members was its own unique, catch-in-the-throat moment of music and drama, provocative lyrics of universal relevance thoughtfully, powerfully conveyed. The heartrending version of The Old Folks, to mention just one example, visibly brought some members of the audience to tears.

One can arrive "lost" to the festival. But, if sentient, one leaves found.

Sephardi school renamed for philanthropist

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

Ontario's only Sephardi elementary school has honoured a philanthropist through the renaming of the school.

The Joe Dwek Ohr HaEmet Sephardic School, formerly the Ohr HaEmet Sephardic School, has had a successful fundraising year, reaching around $1 million in donations mostly thanks to Toronto area philanthropist Joe Dwek, who provided them with a large donation this year.

"I have to say that I have found Joe to be an incredible mensch, a very warm person, and someone who values friendship profoundly," said Stuart Haber, managing director of the school.

"He's someone who deeply loves his family and deeply appreciates the importance of family and Judaism, and someone who feels that education is critical for the development of an individual," Haber said.

The donation will go a long way to help the school, he said.

"We're always struggling to meet our financial commitment every year," said Victor Arrobas, the school's vice-president and a former student. "With this donation, we'll be able to invest in things that will enhance education for children in the school."

Among other areas, the money will help in upgrading the technology in the school's computer lab, and expanding its special education and remedial services programs, according to Haber.

The school's annual operating cost is around $1.5 million, and therefore this donation is very helpful, he said.

The school hosted an Aug. 2 dinner and recognition ceremony at the Sephardic Kehila Centre – also the location of the school – where more than 415 people gathered to celebrate and recognize Dwek's donation. The dinner was also a fundraiser and had the largest turnout of any of the centre's fundraisers since it opened more than 32 years ago, Haber said.

American radio talk-show host Dennis Prager spoke at the ceremony.

"We chose him because he is an excellent commentator on world events and issues with regards to ethics and morality and because he is known as a very, very good speaker," Haber said, adding that the topic of his speech was 11 points in the defence of Israel.

Dwek was born in Manchester, England, and spent much of his young life moving around, having lived in 21 houses in 21 years. His father died when he was 14, and his mother then left England for Venezuela.

He used education as a driving force, according to a biography from the ceremony. When he was 28, he went to Venezuela, and then moved to Toronto three years later, where he built an accounting agency that he currently owns.

He is a member of the synagogue at the Sephardic Kehila Centre, and his perspectives and goals are in line with the school's objectives, Haber said, which he described as producing "students who excel academically but who also have a drive to service the community."

"Mr. Dwek is an incredible example of someone who appreciates the absolute need for strength in Jewish education," he said.

"He believes that our children represent the most important assets of our community," Haber said, and the donation will go a long way to help the children of the school.

Toronto rabbi declines to sign document

The people involved [in the statement] had good intentions, but I did have difficulty signing."

He said that Judaism has "long operated under the rubric that every human being should be treated with dignity. We do not check anyone at the door.

"This statement reaffirms everything about our approach to Judaism. It would be redundant to sign it. By signing it, it would imply that things are changing, but in reality, nothing has changed."

As a general rule, he said, "I do not sign things. The only thing I have signed on to is to keep God's Torah."

Rabbi Moshe Stern of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation in Toronto, said he wouldn't sign the document, "because it sounds like we would be sanctioning something, and I am not sanctioning the homosexual lifestyle. If I signed it, I would be misunderstood."

He does welcome everyone into his shul, he said, "because it is the best place to be. We can pray together, and hopefully there will be a change. I accept homosexuals into my shul like I accept any sinners.

Rabbi Moshe Stern

"The Torah tells us what is and what is not permitted. Sanctioning homosexual relationships would be like sanctioning the desecration of Shabbat."

Other Toronto-area residents who signed the document include Rabbi Jay Kelman of Torah in Motion; Dr. Aubie Diamond; Rabbi Charles Grysman, spiritual leader of Zichron Yisroel Congregation; Rabbi Benjamin Hecht, founding director of Nishma, and Rabbi Mordechai Torczyner, rosh beit midrash of the Yeshiva University-Torah MiTzion Beit Midrash Zichron Dov.

Three Montreal rabbis are among the signatories: Adam Scheier and Yonah Berman, respectively, senior and assistant rabbis, of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim, and Rabbi Mordechai Glick, who founded a small congregation, Ahavat Israel, in Côte St. Luc and is a psychologist.

(Shaar Hashomayim, Montreal's largest congregation, is officially independent of any denomination, but follows Orthodox practice in many of its aspects.)

Rabbi Ira Ebbin, who led Beth Zion Congregation until last June, when he left for New York, also signed the statement.

Statement of principles

1. All human beings are created in the image of God and deserve to be treated with dignity and respect (kevod haberiyot). Every Jew is obligated to fulfill the entire range of mitzvot between person and person in relation to persons who are homosexual or have feelings of same sex attraction. Embarrassing, harassing or demeaning someone with a homosexual orientation or same-sex attraction is a violation of Torah prohibitions that embody the deepest values of Judaism.

2. The question of whether sexual orientation is primarily genetic, or rather environmentally generated, is irrelevant to our obligation to treat human beings with same-sex attractions and orientations with dignity and respect.

3. Halakhah sees heterosexual marriage as the ideal model and sole legitimate outlet for human sexual expression. The sensitivity and understanding we properly express for human beings with other sexual orientations does not diminish our commitment to that principle.

4. Halakhic Judaism views all male and female same-sex sexual interactions as prohibited. The question of whether sexual orientation is primarily genetic, or rather environmentally generated, is irrelevant to this prohibition. While halakha categorizes various homosexual acts with different degrees of severity and opprobrium, including toeivah, this does not in any way imply that lesser acts are permitted. But it is critical to emphasize that halakha only prohibits homosexual acts; it does not prohibit orientation or feelings of same-sex attraction, and nothing in the Torah devalues the human beings who struggle with them. (We do not here address the issue of hirhurei aveirah, a halakhic category that goes beyond mere feelings and applies to all forms of sexuality and requires precise halakhic definition.)

5. Whatever the origin or cause of homosexual orientation, many individuals believe that for most people this orientation cannot be changed. Others believe that for most people it is a matter of free will. Similarly, while some mental health professionals and rabbis in the community strongly believe in the efficacy of "change therapies", most of the mental health community, many rabbis, and most people with a homosexual orientation feel that some of these therapies are either ineffective or potentially damaging psychologically for many patients.

We affirm the religious right of those with a homosexual orientation to reject therapeutic approaches they reasonably see as useless or dangerous.

6. Jews with a homosexual orientation who live in the Orthodox community confront serious emotional, communal and psychological challenges that cause them and their families great pain and suffering. For example, homosexual orientation may greatly increase the risk of suicide among teenagers in our community. Rabbis and communities need to be sensitive and empathetic to that reality. Rabbis and mental health professionals must provide responsible and ethical assistance to congregants and clients dealing with those human challenges.

7. Jews struggling to live their lives in accordance with halakhic values need and deserve our support. Accordingly, we believe that the decision as to whether to be open about one's sexual orientation should be left to such individuals, who should consider their own needs and those of the community. We are opposed on ethical and moral grounds to both the "outing" of individuals who want to remain private and to coercing those who desire to be open about their orientation to keep it hidden.

8. Accordingly, Jews with homosexual orientations or same sex-attractions should be welcomed as full members of the synagogue and school community. As appropriate with regard to gender and lineage, they should participate and count ritually, be eligible for ritual synagogue honors, and generally be treated in the same fashion and under the same halakhic and hashkafic framework as any other member of the synagogue they join. Conversely, they must accept and fulfill all the responsibilities of such membership, including those generated by communal norms or broad Jewish principles that go beyond formal halakha.

Jeweller targeted in alleged murder plot

Compiled by CJN Staff

Toronto's cash-for-gold business took a potentially deadly turn last week when it emerged that a prominent dealer had been allegedly targeted for murder by an employee of one of his rivals.

According to reports, Maria Konstan, an employee of Harold "The Jewellery Buyer" Gerstel, was arrested and is facing five charges over an alleged plot to kill Omni Jewelcrafters owner Jack Berkovits. The charges include two counts of threatening death and two counts of counselling to commit an indictable offence.

Berkovits told various news outlets that about three weeks ago, he was approached by a man who said he was sent to kill him, but after meeting with him in person, could not go through with the act. Berkovits claimed the man, an ex-mixed martial artist, was known as Gerstel's "enforcer."

After the confrontation, Berkovits said he went to the police to report the event.

Gerstel told the Toronto Star that he wasn't involved in any way in the alleged plot and wouldn't comment on whether the alleged hit man had been an employee at his store. Gerstel currently is not facing any charges.

Berkovits and Gerstel, whose storefronts are kitty-corner to each other at the intersection of Bathurst Street and Glencairn Avenue, have been in a heated battle for clientele for more than a year in the lucrative cash-for-gold business, after Berkovits began branching out from his core jewelry manufacturing business to target the gold resale market in a more public way.

Konstan is scheduled to appear in court Aug. 20.

Vile

There is no room left to be shocked by the theocratic medievalists who rule Iran. From their brutish persecution of fellow Iranians at home, their massive underwriting and directing of terrorism around the world, their frenzied race to build nuclear weapons and their doctrinal hatred of the Jewish state, the leaders of Iran are profoundly competent in finding new ways of stooping very low. And if we accept that they actually believe the things they say, then they are also ignoramuses and thus all the more dangerous.

Last weekend, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad once again lectured to his people on one of his favourite subjects – the Holocaust. In a televised address, the intellectually forthright president restated his firm belief, based upon all the evidence he has read, that the Holocaust was a big lie. On this occasion, however, the Holocaust was not the centrepiece of his university-on-the-air presentation. Rather, the focus of his discourse was the 9/11 attacks against the United States. There was no evidence, he suggested, that some 3,000 people were killed in the attacks. They, too, were a "big fabrication." His consistency of thought and analytical skill are to be admired.

And, oh yes. He definitively pointed out that no Zionists were killed in the attacks, because "one day earlier they were told not go to their workplace." He simply cannot stand idly by at the thought that the Zionists may have pulled the wool, yet again, over the world's eyes.

The Zionists are an obsession with this man. It consumes him like a fire that cannot be doused.

Last week, Ha'aretz reported that Iran has launched a website whose aim is to prove the lie of the Holocaust through cartoons and commentary.

The site is financed by a non-governmental cultural foundation, Khakriz Cultural Institute. There is a phone number on the home page, presumably of the institute. The material on the site appears to be based on a book published in 2008 that contains coarsely crude, primitive, childishly simplistic, grotesque, Der Sturmer-like caricatures and propaganda.

The compilers of the site proclaim that it "is dedicated to all those who have been killed under the pretext of the Holocaust."

After news of the existence of the website became known, Yad Vashem in Jerusalem issued the following statement .

"The vulgar and cynical approach of the website, a combination of Holocaust denial and distortion, illustrated with anti-Semitic caricatures, further illustrates Iran's disregard for reality and truth vis-à-vis the Holocaust, Jews and Israel."

Yad Vashem's statement was quite restrained.

Like the regime itself in Iran, the website is vile.

Iran's right to publish the site is not in question. However, the need to, the desire to and the transparent underlying motives for doing so bespeak a frightful danger to the civilized peoples of the world.

As it has done in the past, the government of Canada should once again draw the world's attention to the danger.

25 years ago in The CJN

Israeli prime minister Shimon Peres said his coalition government had agreed that if talks started with Jordan on the status of the West Bank and Gaza, Israel would be able to offer self-government to residents there. But, in his address to graduates of the National Defence College, he stressed that Israel won't allow the territories to become a base for terrorism.

Right to pray regardless of gender

Kol hakavod to Anat Hoffman and the Women of the Wall for praying at the Kotel, one of the holiest sites for all Jews, men and women ("Activist decries haredi control of Kotel," July 29). But shame on the authorities who arrested these women for praying. By doing so, the authorities trample our most sacred beliefs and make a mockery of Judaism's claim to equality.

More than a century ago, the liberal Jewish movements of Europe and North America sought new ways to express their Judaism, including the idea that men and women should be considered as equals in all aspects of Jewish ritual life, as God intended with the creation of man and woman together in Bereshit. The ordination of women as rabbis was a shining moment in the history of Judaism. One can only wonder why there are people who would show such disrespect to women who want to pray, and read from the Torah, whether at home, in shul or in front of the remains of God's House in Jerusalem.

I can only hope that as the Israeli government works in committee toward a new understanding for policies and procedures at the Kotel, it acknowledges the right of all Jews, regardless of gender, to pray there, to protect our beautiful heritage and show the world the best Judaism has to offer.

Rabbi Stephen Wise
Oakville, Ont.

Puzzled by reopening of Kotel conflict

Having lived in Jerusalem for 10 years from 1993 to 2003, I often witnessed the conflict at the Kotel on Shavuot morning when ultra-Orthodox men and women harassed the Women of the Wall who donned traditionally male tallit and tfillin at the Main Plaza ("Activist decries haredi control of Kotel," July 29). In 2003, a compromise was reached to allow the women to daven as they wish at the less public area of the Kotel called Robinson's Arch, and, until recently, there were no more ugly incidents. Why Anat Hoffman and the Women of the Wall wish to reopen this conflict is puzzling, and garners little sympathy from me.

Anti-Israel forces in the gay community

Regarding the letter to the editor "Homosexuality prohibited by Torah law" (Aug. 5), while recognizing that Toronto's Pride Parade is not an event that everyone would feel comfortable attending, we must also recognize another reality: there are Jews in this city who are members of the gay community, and within that community, hateful anti-Israel forces are working to vigorously undermine Israel's legitimacy. Kulanu Toronto, as a legitimate Jewish organization committed to Israel's well-being, deserves the assistance of Canadian Jewish Congress in fighting this dangerous trend. Kulanu Toronto and its friends courageously carried the flag for Israel, confronting anti-Israel parade participants and ensuring a proud pro-Israel presence at the event. Without Kulanu Toronto's public commitment to Israel, those who hate Israel would have won the day.

Religious differences can't be bridged

In his column, Reform Rabbi Dow Marmur calls for the position of chief rabbi to be eliminated ("An obsolete office," July 29). He writes that the radicalism that has come to dominate the Orthodox world has no respect for other faiths.

Orthodox Judaism believes that there cannot be religious dialogue with other faith communities, as there are fundamental differences between us that cannot be bridged. We believe in the eternal truth of the Torah, to the exclusion of other beliefs. We do, however, acknowledge religious leaders of other faiths as being valid representatives of their communities and will join with them in common causes in which we agree.

Sir Sigmund Sternberg, president of the Reform Synagogues of Great Britain, has said about Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, "He has been excellent in building bridges between the faiths."

As an Orthodox rabbi, Rabbi Sacks could not in all conscience enter a Reform temple to attend the funeral of a Reform rabbi. That might give others the impression that it is halachically permissible for a Jew to enter a Reform temple to pray. Insofar as refusing to refer to the deceased rabbi by his title, Rabbi Sacks upheld the Orthodox Jewish viewpoint that a rabbi who does not believe that God gave Moses the entire Torah is not fit to be called "rabbi." This might sound excessively harsh, but one cannot impugn Rabbi Sacks' integrity.

Rav Kook's unconventional vision lives on

By RABBI MORDECHAI TORCZYNER

It was Friday afternoon in Zoimel, Lithuania, where Rav Avraham Yitzchak haKohen Kook served as rabbi in the late 19th century. A cobbler gathered his coins and realized he could not purchase proper food for Shabbat. Despondent, and ashamed to face his family, the man stood at the entrance to his shop rather than go home. He watched his neighbours prepare for Shabbat, and then, as the sun set, walk to the synagogue.

The people of the town were incensed at the cobbler's apparent violation of Shabbat, remaining in his open store while they closed their businesses to mark the day. They muttered to each other about this man who would defy local norms. Finally, emboldened by their numbers, they requested that Rav Kook do something about the man's insolence.

Rav Kook, for his part, simply wished the cobbler a "Shabbat Shalom" while returning home from the synagogue. The man instantly realized how his presence at the store must have appeared to the rabbi, and he explained his situation – his poverty, his shame, and his desire to observe Shabbat. The rabbi responded by pledging financial aid for Shabbat as long as the man would need it. As the story goes, Rav Kook contributed his family's own silver candlesticks (Stories from the Life of Rav Kook, 1988).

This tale, one of many with similar elements, underscores some of the hallmark traits of Rav Avraham Yitzchak haKohen Kook, whose 75th yahrzeit will be marked on the third day of Elul, Aug. 13 of this year, and whose message still resonates in Israel and around the world today. Rav Kook was committed to the honour of the Torah as well as the human being, and he sacrificed of himself to preserve both.

Rav Kook charted a unique course, embracing the holders of many "isms" but endorsing none entirely. He defended what he saw as the pure kernel in secular Zionism, but argued against the religious Mizrachi Zionists' decision to join political coalitions with secular platforms. He wore a long coat, beard and fur hat, but was at home with farmers in the fields. He promulgated leniency in Jewish law to enable Jews to settle the land of Israel, but his multiple volumes of responsa testify to his ability to prohibit, and his stance against women's suffrage exemplifies his adherence to tradition and resistance to the new. Rav Kook was a member of the Agudah and a poetic proponent of religious practice, but he practised and preached respect for all.

Such a precedent-shattering path can only belong to a knee-jerk contrarian or an inspired visionary. Rav Kook's canon of published work makes clear that he was the latter. What vision inspired this iconoclast, and is it still relevant 75 years after his passing?

An unconventional vision

Rav Kook's early years fit what may be termed the typical arc of the talmid chacham, the outstanding Jewish scholar. A scholastic genius as a pre-adolescent in eastern Europe, the youthful future chief rabbi of the Jews of Palestine studied with the leading Torah sages of his day. At the age of 19, he left home for the Volozhin yeshiva, where he learned under the great rosh yeshiva Rabbi Naftali Tzvi Yehuda Berlin. He began to publish, married into a great rabbinic family, was widowed and then re-married. He took a position as the rabbi of one small Lithuanian town (Zoimel), and then later as the rabbi of another (Boisk). From there, though, the narrative changes.

Rav Avraham Yitzchak haKohen Kook

While a rabbi and teacher in Lithuania, Rav Kook wove exceptionally wide-ranging biblical, talmudic, liturgical, kabbalistic and philosophical studies into an unconventional tapestry, developing a weltanschauung that saw the holiness of the individual as the key to redeeming the universe.

In particular, Rav Kook explored three central themes: the Divine spark animating every human being; the power of Jewish nationalism to better the lot of individual, nation and world, and the redemptive potential of personal and national repentance. Combining these three concepts convinced Rav Kook that the efforts of religiously observant and secular Jews to restore Jewish life in the Land of Israel – an act of national repentance and return – would usher in a messianic age for Jew and non-Jew alike, to universal benefit.

As Rav Kook explained, God grants every individual the ability and obligation to improve the lives of every other individual. He rhapsodized (in Olat Ra'ayah 2:361), "If you marvel at your ability to speak, listen, smell, sense, see, comprehend and feel, then take this to heart: All who live now and all who preceded you, in their great numbers, influenced your entire existence. Not a single, small entity is superfluous; all are needed, all serve a purpose. You do the same for all who are beneath you, and you are bound to all who ascend above you." The main task of the individual Jew is to bring this influence to bear for the sake of others, "driven by a bold internal spirit, not a legal obligation" (Orot haKodesh 3:318). These ideas, which were rooted in the teachings of the founding rosh yeshiva of Volozhin, Rav Chaim, had already motivated Rav Kook to donate his Shabbat candlesticks to the cobbler of Zoimel.

> 'Rav Kook never forgot the Divine spark of each individual'

The special character of the Land of Israel added a dimension, though: that the Jew is best capable of this generosity in his ancient land, the place of a Jew's greatest sensitivity to the Divine message. As Rav Kook wrote, "A Jew cannot be devoted and faithful to his thoughts and ideas and imaginings outside Israel, as he can in Israel. Manifestations of sanctity, on every level, are purest in Israel" (Orot mei'Ofel 4). In this one place, the Jew could best stimulate the return, repentance and growth of the nation of Israel, and so bring about universal redemption.

Of course, Rav Kook's generous views came with certain inherent limitations. The Divine character of every soul led him to respect and embrace every individual for their spiritual potential and their finer actions, but as part of a recognition of the Divine, not as carte blanche acceptance of their every desire and decision. The potency of Jewish nationalism moved Rav Kook to value the Zionists' agricultural endeavours, but for the sake of a national spiritual revival rather than a simple presence in the land of our ancestors. The promise of redemption inspired Rav Kook to recognize messianic potential in the Jewish renaissance, but in the theological/eschatological framework of his own Ha'Emunah anthem rather than the more secular/historical sentiments of Naftali Imber's Hatikvah. Rav Kook stands out in the pantheon of Jewish leaders for his willingness to test those limitations rather than retreat from the challenge.

And so Rav Kook, with honest and uncondescending appreciation, supported the Jews who returned to what was then Palestine to create farming colonies, even as he lobbied for greater Jewish observance in that land.

In 1904, Rav Kook accepted a position as chief rabbi of Jaffa, and then, after World War I, as chief rabbi of Jerusalem. Internecine turmoil followed Rav Kook's acceptance of the Jerusalem position, but in large part, Rav Kook dwelled comfortably in two worlds, the yeshiva community and the Zionist community. Religious sages, including the Chafetz Chaim and the Chazon Ish, addressed Rav Kook with the highest honorifics, even as he praised the intentions and exertions of Israel's secular chalutzim.

All along, even as he led a nation, established the Degel Yerushalayim international movement, founded Zionism's flagship Mercaz HaRav yeshiva and inaugurated Israel's modern Chief Rabbinate, Rav Kook never forgot the Divine spark of each individual. The same Rav Kook who gave away his family's silver candlesticks to a despondent cobbler in Zoimel would refuse, decades later, to press charges against hooligans who had assaulted him for his Zionist views. He declared, "I have no interest in court cases. Despite what they did to me, I love them. I am ready to kiss them, so great is my love!" (Malachim k'Vnei Adam pg. 483-485).

Still relevant

Seventy-five years later, Rav Kook's message remains as relevant in Israel and around the world as it was in pre-state Palestine. We are blessed with a global community of Jews who seek, in their own ways, the repentance, return and redemption that Rav Kook held aloft as the goal, with varying degrees and types of religious commitment. Whether it be through a Birthright trip or a yeshiva year or a Nefesh b'Nefesh-sponsored aliyah, multifarious agencies seek to restore Jewish life to the land in which, per Rav Kook, the greatest manifestations of sanctity may be found. It would seem that each group should deserve the respect and appreciation of the others.

Rav Kook's voice reminds us that respect and appreciation are not the same as homogenization. One person can value another without abandoning his own principles. Moreover, Rav Kook's voice reminds us that respect and appreciation are not to be given grudgingly, or even at one's choosing. Respect and appreciation are automatic and axiomatic, a tithe to the greatness inherent in each of us. Perhaps on the day that we recognize and internalize these truths, we will move a great step closer to the redemption that Rav Kook foresaw.

Rabbi Mordechai Torczyner is rosh beit midrash for the Yeshiva University Torah MiTzion Beit Midrash Zichron Dov in Toronto and has lectured extensively on Rav Kook's writings. He can be reached at torczyner@gmail.com.

Opinions

Israel and India: merging interests

When our daughter, Yael, called home recently, she excitedly told us about a Shabbat dinner she'd attended. A local Bnei Akiva group had done the organizing, many Israelis were present and Hebrew rather than English was the preferred medium of communication. Why this is worth mentioning is that our young adventurer was calling not from New York or Jerusalem, but from Dharmsala, in the mountainous region of northern India.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

The city of Dharmsala is best known as the home of the Dalai Lama and the refuge for thousands of his Tibetan followers who have fled their homeland to escape domination by the Chinese.

This summer, and last year as well, five Canadian university students teamed up with five Israelis to participate in a four-week community service program in Dharmsala, organized jointly by Hillel of Greater Toronto, Hillel Israel and the Israel Forum for International Humanitarian Aid. The Forum (IsraAID) was founded in 2001 and is comprises more than 35 Israeli and Jewish NGOs that are active in development and relief work around the world. It was IsraAID, we'll remember, that co-ordinated Israel's storied rescue efforts in the aftermath of the Haitian earthquake this past January.

But aside from Israel's humanitarian involvements in India, links between the two countries have emerged, and begun to flourish, in many other areas as well.

Since 1992, when India established full diplomatic ties with Israel, there has been extensive inter-governmental co-operation relating to defence, security, and counter-terrorism. In 2004, Israel supplied India with an airborne warning and control system (AWACS) at a cost of more than $1 billion, while in 2007, an agreement was reached to collaborate on a multi-billion dollar surface-to-air missile system.

Meanwhile, several new and innovative projects in agricultural and water research, pollution control, public health, information technology, telecommunications and aerospace engineering, among others, are moving forward and helping to further cement the already robust bilateral relationship.

Between 1992 and 2008, Israel-India trade has grown steadily from $80 million to more than $4 billion.

What seems like a natural affinity between Israelis and Indians has been attributed to a commonality of values and experience. Both groups emerged from British colonialism, both live near hostile neighbours, and both embrace democracy as their preferred political ideology. But, when quoted in the New York Times (Nov. 29, 2008), Bangalore writer and commentator, Shoba Narayan, may have best captured the very essence of the Indo-Israeli mindset by remarking that "the cultures are so similar – the commitment to education, the ability to delay gratification, the hard work, the guilt, the fatalism."

My uneasy, but evolving, feelings about Germany

As a child of European parents – my dad survived the Holocaust in Holland, mostly being hidden by strangers, and my mom lived through the blitz of London and evacuation to the countryside – I grew up with an ambivalence, if not downright distaste, for anything German.

Yair Lourie in Jerusalem

In my family, German products weren't purchased knowingly, and quite honestly, even today, I don't like hearing German being spoken. With an eye to the Holocaust, modern German efficiency often evokes ghastly thoughts.

While a student in the 1980s, I shared apartments with a friend, another new immigrant to Israel, who happened to be from Germany. He'd been a member of the German-Zionist youth movement. One summer, as I meandered my way through Europe, I visited him at his parents' home in a town not far from Munich. Several recollections of that trip are still vivid, such as feeling uneasy passing older men in the streets, wondering where they'd been in the 1940s. And driving from Munich to my friend's town, I remember the spine-chilling sensation upon seeing a sign on the autobahn pointing nonchalantly to Dachau.

But I recently had several experiences that gave me an opportunity to reconsider my perceptions.

I've previously written about doing genealogical research. My endeavours in that field continue. This year's exciting discovery was a previously unknown branch of my father's family, part of which moved to East Germany after the war. I corresponded with a newly discovered cousin who lives in Berlin and met her last month when she visited Jerusalem. At one point after we started corresponding, I sent her a PowerPoint presentation lauding the many different ways Berlin commemorates the Holocaust. She replied by sending me links to websites describing the vibrancy of present Jewish life in the city, noting that while it's imperative to learn from the past, it's also necessary to witness and participate in the renewal.

Berlin is definitely on the Israeli tourism radar. In 2009, nearly 50,000 Israelis visited there, making them the largest non-European group of visitors after Americans. These numbers jive with poll results published last year by Hebrew University's Richard Koebner Minerva Center for German History regarding Israelis' views on Germany. More than 80 per cent of Jewish Israelis believe present day Germany is a "different" Germany and that Israeli-German relations are normal. More than 60 per cent perceive Germany as dealing well with Holocaust remembrance. Less than six per cent continue to boycott German goods.

Earlier this summer, I spent hours glued to the TV enjoying soccer's month-long World Cup. Being of Dutch descent, I was rooting for the Netherlands, but as the competition progressed, it became clear Germany was the most exciting team. Despite an early loss to Serbia, they progressed from round to round exhibiting great offence, physical stamina and amazing teamwork.

While not deserting the much-less-electrifying Dutch, I also found myself rooting for the Germans. The media touted them as the epitome of the "new" Germany. They had players of Ghanaian, Turkish, Polish and German parentage, and had abandoned their dreary (albeit successful) defensive playing style of yesteryear.

I loved seeing Chancellor Angela Merkel cheering her team, childlike, from the stands in South Africa, and I found myself truly disappointed when they were beaten in the semi-finals by a lacklustre Spanish side, playing a "German" style defensive game.

On the other hand, when planning this summer's vacation, my wife suggested we travel to the Austrian Alps, a European destination we haven't yet visited, but one that has been highly recommended by friends and family. I told her I couldn't stomach the trip, that travelling to Hitler's homeland would make me uncomfortable. We've compromised on flying to Vienna, a convenient place to begin touring points east, but will also spend a couple of days exploring Austria's capital.

I suspect I'm not the only second-generation child of European parents with complex, not always coherent, feelings about Germany. Multiple internal voices speak volumes of healthy inner conflicts.

Germany today is really a different place than it was during my parents' childhood. Maybe my grandchildren will no longer be of two minds about it.

The confrontational politics of conversion

The establishment of Israel, the restoration of Jewish sovereignty and the unprecedented renaissance that this has triggered are momentous developments, but there are some unresolved issues. For example, for 62 years, we've been unable to decide on key questions such as "Who is a Jew?" or "Who is a rabbi?" and what role religious traditions, developed over 4,000 years, should play in our modern Jewish state. The struggle over these issues also causes some discomfort for Jews in the Diaspora, who are far away from the debates, but strongly affected by their outcomes.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The recent storm over a proposed change in procedures for Israeli converts to Judaism provided a strong reminder of these difficulties and how they're exploited for political gain. Of the more than one million Israelis who arrived from the former Soviet Union over the past 20 years, about 300,000 aren't Jewish under religious law, meaning their mothers were not Jewish.

However, most have always considered themselves Jews and want to be recognized as such. Without conversion, they're also unable to get married in Israel. (Some go to Cyprus or further away to get married, and when they return, their union is recognized. But this is humiliating, and their children are likely to face the same exclusion.)

Instead of helping resolve this growing problem, the Israeli rabbinical establishment, which is empowered and funded by the state, gained control of the process, demanding that candidates for conversion demonstrate commitment to a religious lifestyle. Since the Reform and Conservative movements are seen as foreign inventions, even among secular Israelis, the haredim hold a virtual monopoly. And to protect their power, as well as deeply held convictions, the future of the Jewish people is threatened by the rebellion against religious law and practice. This has resulted in slow-moving conversion procedures that alienate most applicants.

A number of efforts have been made over the years to make conversion more user friendly, but the rabbis in charge responded by tightening procedures even further. After the 2009 elections, Knesset members and ministers from different parties made another effort to break this impasse with legislation to introduce competition among rabbis. Instead of having to go through local religious council and accepting their dictates, candidates for conversion could go to rabbis from other localities.

At this point, the rabbis who head the religious parties, with support from about 20 per cent of Israeli Jews, demanded amendments in return for support. Ultimate authority for conversion would have been formally granted to the Chief Rabbinate, either as a symbolic gesture or to block meaningful changes. Because the religious parties hold the balance of power and can bring down the government, no prime minister, including Benjamin Netanyahu, is willing to risk their wrath.

Mirroring their Israeli counterparts, the rabbinical power structure in the Diaspora chose confrontation, rallying Reform, Conservative and unaffiliated Jews through shrill and misleading allegations. This legislation would not have changed the status of Jews and conversions carried out in the Diaspora, but the hype ignored this point. And while the proposal would have provided incremental improvements, at best, predictions of a "disaster" for the Jewish people were part of a campaign of fear.

The New Israel Fund (NIF), which is involved in other controversies, added more fuel to this fire. Daniel Sokatch, NIF's executive director, grossly mischaracterized the complex Israeli debate as dominated by "the Orthodox, the hardliners and the evangelicals." These and other self-described liberals showed that their tolerance and calls for dialogue don't extend to groups that don't accept their agendas.

As the storm increased, Netanyahu, Jewish Agency head Natan Sharansky and other Israeli leaders intervened to scrap the legislation, meaning that the failed procedures will stay in place until another attempt can be made.

To resolve the conversion crisis, Israel's modern Orthodox leadership will have to stand up to the haredi power structure, and they'll need positive support from Jews around the world, in contrast to the recent confrontational approach. The challenges posed by Israel's realities are difficult enough without adding more conflict.

The Kirshner File

Letter from Meridian

Meridian, a sleepy burg of 39,000 in Mississippi some 300 kilometres northeast of New Orleans, was once the biggest town in the Magnolia state.

During its golden age, from 1890 to 1930, Meridian was a regional hub of trade, commerce and manufacturing and an important railway junction. Founded in 1860, Meridian was sacked by Gen. William T. Sherman during the U.S. Civil War, when Mississippi was one big battlefield. Resurrected from the dead, Meridian, in Lauderdale county, flourished in the 1870s, attracting a wave of fresh residents.

Sheldon Kirshner in Mississippi

Some of the newcomers, Jewish immigrants from Germany, prospered as merchants and played quite an integral role in its development as Mississippi's most populous urban centre.

In 1890, the year Mississippi enacted a new constitution that effectively disenfranchised and marginalized African-Americans, the Grand Opera House, with its massive stage, silken wallpaper, golden chandeliers and elaborate furnishings, was formally inaugurated with a rousing performance of a Johann Strauss opera, reinforcing the general perception that Meridian's future was not only promising but apparently limitless.

The Grand Opera House was the brainchild of four Americanized German Jews who launched their mercantile careers as itinerant peddlers, Israel Marks and his three half-brothers, Sam, Levi and Marx Rothenberg. They were the proprietors of Marks, Rothenberg & Company, one of the largest wholesale grocery and dry goods emporiums in the southern United States. Covering almost a block, it was next to the Grand Opera House.

Nearly 40 years later, when Meridian was still a town of consequence but teetered on the cusp of the great Depression, the 16-storey brown brick Threefoot building, named after a local Jewish family, was finished.

Adding lustre to Merdian's skyline, it was built a year before the Temple Theatre, a remarkable example of Moorish-Revival architecture, opened its doors to the public.

The Threefoot family, whose original name was Dreyfus, conceived and financed the grandiose project, which virtually ruined them financially. Abraham Threefoot, the family patriarch, was a resourceful and eclectic businessman, a grocer, a maker of leather goods and a buyer of cotton, according to Stuart Rockoff, the director of the history department at the Goldring/Woldenberg Institute of Southern Jewish Life in Jackson, the state capitol.

By 1927, when Meridian was still on something of a roll, 6,000 Jews lived in Mississippi, a figure that has since then declined to 1,500. Meridian itself, with 575 Jews, had one of the biggest Jewish communities in Mississippi, said one of its current members, Mark Fisher, a medical doctor.

With the decline of the railroad industry, Meridian's boom sputtered, adversely affecting the fortunes of the Grand Opera House and the Threefoot building.

After being remodelled and converted into a movie theatre, the Grand Opera House was leased to a New Orleans company that tried to gut the interior and turn it into an office building. A protracted legal battle ensued, resulting in the closure of the Grand Opera House in the 1920s. It lay dormant for decades, until the Riley Foundation stepped in and restored it to its former glory, said Suzy Johnson, executive director of Lauderdale County Tourism. In 1972, it was added to the National Register of Historic Places.

Known today as the Mississippi State University Riley Center for Education and Performing Arts, it offers a full lineup of concerts (violinist Itzhak Perlman will perform with the Meridian Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 26, 2011), plays (The Diary of Anne Frank will be presented on Nov. 14) and dance performances (the National Dance Company of Ireland will present a two-hour show on Oct. 24).

Mark Fisher

The Threefoot building, placed on the National Register of Historic Places in 1979, has been closed and abandoned since the 1990s, when Meridian began focusing less on downtown development and more on building malls and hotels, including the new Holiday Inn, in the suburbs. Four years ago, city hall bought the Threefoot building in the expectation that it would be developed into a luxury hotel. But plans for its conversion have fizzled, prompting the National Trust for Historic Preservation to place it on its list of America's Most Endangered Historic Places.

Meridian – where the father of country music, Jimmie Rogers, lived and where a museum in his honour is located – was once a flashpoint in the civil rights struggle in the United States.

In 1964, when segregation was a glaring fact of life in Mississippi, two Jewish civil rights workers from the north, Andrew Goodman and Michael Schwerner, went to Meridian to register African-American voters. On June 21, Goodman and Schwerner, joined by local African-American activist James Chaney, set out for Philadelphia, just north of Meridian on Highway 39, to investigate the arson of a black church, which was to be used as a site for voter registration.

Returning to Meridian, the threesome were arrested by the deputy sheriff. Shortly after they were released, two carloads of Ku Klux Klan members waylaid them, killing all three. Their bodies were found in an earthen dam two months later. In a trial, six Klansmen were convicted of civil rights violations but not convicted of murder. Two of the defendants were acquitted. (The case was reopened, and in 2005, one of the Klansmen, Edgar Ray Killen, was convicted and sentenced to 60 years in prison. Subsequently, Meridian, which is more than 50 per cent African-American, named part of a street after Chaney).

A landmark in the civil rights movement, the case was at the centre of the 1988 Hollywood film, Mississippi Burning.

For Meridian's Jewish community, the civil rights era was challenging, to say the least.

As Rockoff puts it in a monograph, "like other Southern Jews, Meridian's Jewish community was often ambivalent toward the civil rights movement."

The Jews of Meridian, fearing being associated with "outside agitators" like Goodman and Schwerner, gave civil rights workers a cool reception. The rabbi expressed sympathy for their goals, but questioned their tactics, says Rockoff.

Nonetheless, several members of the Jewish community joined an interfaith group calling for the prosecution of people who burned African-American churches.

In 1968, the Klu Klux Klan bombed the education building of Congregation Beth Israel. After attempting to bomb the home of Meyer Davidson, a prominent member of the Jewish community, they were captured by the police. When Meridian finally agreed to integrate its schools, a Jewish member of the school board received death threats.

Despite these anti-Semitic outbursts, Meridian elected a Jewish mayor, Alfred Rosenbaum, who served in the 1970s and 1980s for eight years.

Meridian's Jewish community has since shrunk, and Beth Israel no longer has a full-time rabbi. Fisher, a native of New Orleans who has resided here since 1983, said that no more than about 30 Jews, only five of whom are less than 60 years old, live in Meridian today.

"The children of Jewish merchants didn't want to go into their parents' business and moved to bigger towns and cities," he explained. Still other Jews, having married out of the faith, left the Jewish community.

In an attempt to revitalize itself, the community has offered $25,000 to Jewish couples with children who agree to settle in Meridian. There have been no takers so far, but Fisher is confident that the offer will not fall on deaf ears.

The best news outlets diligently pursue the truth

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

We frequently read these days that news is getting "dumbed down" because, among other reason, in the highly competitive 24/7 news cycle, many journalists simply don't have time to do their homework and ensure that basic facts are established in the first place. They're too busy, so we're told, recording the claims of one side against the other, and thus lack the time to find out where the truth lies.

Under such severe deadline pressure, they don't have time to make the necessary calls to determine salient facts. Worse still, even where no ideological conviction is involved, a few may not bother recording the truth when it's later made available to them, as this would require a follow-up story amending a previous one.

That's why, one day after the Aug. 3 clash on the Israel-Lebanon border (which media almost uniformly reported that day as "Lebanon claims this, Israel claims that" – a classic case of "he said/she said"), it was important to see that several major news outlets made a point of conveying new, key facts: that according to the United Nations, Israel was right in insisting, from the outset, that its troops had not encroached on Lebanese territory and that, without any justification, Lebanese army snipers had shot Israeli officers, killing one and badly wounding another.

For instance, in "UN Supports Israeli Account of Border Clash" (Aug. 4), New York Times reporters Isabel Kershner and Nada Bakri began their story with the following: "The United Nations peacekeeping force in South Lebanon, UNIFIL, said on Wednesday it had concluded that Israeli forces were cutting trees that lay within their own territory before a lethal exchange of fire with Lebanese Army troops on Tuesday, largely vindicating Israel's account of how the fighting started."

Reuters, not known for cutting Israel slack in almost any circumstance, titled an Aug. 4 report by Yara Bayoumy, "UN supports Israeli claim on Lebanon clash." Bayoumy wrote: "In a diplomatic boost for Israel, the UN peacekeeping force in southern Lebanon (UNIFIL) said Israeli soldiers were inside Israeli territory when the border clashes erupted. 'UNIFIL established… that the trees being cut by the Israeli army are located south of the Blue Line on the Israeli side,' said UNIFIL military spokesman Lieut.-Col. Naresh Bhatt, referring to a border line drawn by the United Nations after Israeli troops withdrew from southern Lebanon in 2000."

Also on Aug. 4, Mark Lavie of the Associated Press made the same points, but he added that, despite the clear UN ruling, Lebanon's information minister, Tarek Mitri, "said Lebanon respects the [Blue Line] border, but still contests part of it, insisting that the fateful cypress tree, while on the Israeli side of the border, 'is Lebanese territory.'" In the context of Lavie's report, Mitri's plea looked desperate and illogical.

On Aug. 5, the National Post online updated a Reuters report printed the previous day (which was different from the Reuters story mentioned above) to convey the UN ruling. It noted that "Philip Crowley, a U.S. State Department spokesman, cited the UN finding as evidence Lebanon bore responsibility for the incident. 'The United Nations has now established that the trees cut by the Israeli Defence Forces were on the Israeli side of the line that separates Israel and Lebanon, he said. 'The firing by Lebanese armed forces was wholly unjustified and unwarranted'."

There were exceptions to this reporting trend. For instance, by Aug. 5, there was no update to Patrick Martin's Globe and Mail story "Deadly skirmish raises stakes in Israel-Lebanon conflict of nerves" (Aug. 4), in which the location of the enclave where Israel was operating was left ambiguous, as was the responsibility for the clash.

In its Aug. 5 editorial, "From Lebanon's army, terrorism in uniform," the National Post denounced those who are "simply ignoring the UN-stipulated facts and blaming Israel for what we now know was a Lebanese act of murder."

An Israeli rescue helicopter evacuates an injured soldier following an incident involving the Lebanese and Israeli armies on Aug. 3 on the northern Israeli border with Lebanon. [Flash 90 photo]

On a positive note, however, the reality is that, with few exceptions, mainstream media will not ignore the truth once it has been established. The best of them will pursue it diligently, no matter what.

Clinton-Mezvinsky wedding
Rekindling the interfaith marriage debate

By JACOB BERKMAN
JTA

NEW YORK — Is it possible that the first iconic Jewish picture of the decade is of an interfaith marriage?

Photographs taken July 31 show the Jewish groom wearing a kippah and a crumpled tallit staring into the eyes of his giddy bride under a traditional Jewish wedding canopy with a framed ketubah, a Jewish wedding contract, in the background.

The couple is Marc Mezvinsky, the banker son of two Jewish ex-members of the U.S. Congress, and Chelsea Clinton, the daughter of the former U.S. president and current secretary of state.

The images and scant details of the tightly guarded wedding – dubbed by some the "wedding of the century" – have raised a number of questions about the significance of the union for American Jews and what it says about intermarriage in America.

We should "celebrate the full acceptance of Jews by the larger society that this marriage represents," Hebrew Union College sociologist Steven Cohen told JTA via e-mail from Jerusalem.

At the same time, he noted, the fact that so few children of interfaith unions, particularly those between Jewish fathers and non-Jewish mothers, are raised solely as Jews raises the conundrum of our age: "How do we Jewishly engage and educate the intermarried, while at the same time maintaining our time-honoured commitment to inmarriage?" Cohen asked. "In short, we should celebrate the particular marriage of these two fine individuals, but we ought not celebrate the type of marriage it constitutes and represents."

The wedding had more than just a Jewish flair.

It was officiated by a rabbi, James Ponet, head of the Joseph Slifka Center for Jewish Life at Yale University, along with a Methodist minister. The marriage took place under a chupah. Friends of the couple recited the traditional Sheva Brachot, the seven traditional Jewish blessings given to the bride and groom. The groom broke a glass with his foot, as is tradition. And according to several reports, guests danced the horah and lifted the former president and the secretary of state, Bill and Hillary Clinton, in chairs during the dance.

"Jewish men and women are senators and congressmen, and are in key positions in the White House," observed Leonard Saxe, the director of the Cohen Center for Modern Jewish Studies and the Steinhardt Social Research Institute at Brandeis University. "This is a golden age for Jews in America, and it shouldn't surprise us that the daughter of a former president and the daughter of the secretary of state marries a Jewish man she has known much of her life."

Yet some of the more liberal streams of American Judaism, which accept intermarriage if the couple's children are raised as Jews, chafed at the fact that the wedding took place on Saturday, before the Jewish Sabbath ended. The Reform movement frowns upon its rabbis conducting weddings on the Sabbath, the president of the Union for Reform Judaism, Rabbi Eric Yoffie, told JTA.

In 1973, the Reform movement decided officially that its rabbis would be allowed to perform intermarriages, although they would be discouraged from doing so, an edict that still stands today, he said.

"She has married in," Paul Golin, the associate director of the Jewish Outreach Institute, a non-denominational group that reaches out to unaffiliated and intermarried families, said of Chelsea. "Some will say he married out, but if he was marrying out, there wouldn't have been anything Jewish.

"The fact that they went to the effort to have a chupah and have a rabbi and that he wore a tallis says a lot about their future direction. Otherwise, why bother?"

The marriage has pushed the internal Jewish community debate about intermarriage into the view of mainstream America.

In the days before the wedding, the Washington Post asked several rabbis in its "On Faith" column, "Is interfaith marriage good for American society? Is it good for religion? What is lost – and gained – when religious people intermarry?"

Rabbi Steven Wernick, CEO of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, said intermarriage is certainly "not ideal," but that the Conservative movement in 2008 decided that it must welcome interfaith families and "help their spouses along their spiritual journeys."

Rabbi Shmuley Hecht, who is Orthodox and the rabbinical adviser at Yale University's Eliezer Jewish Society, said intermarriage can work only if the non-Jewish spouse converts to Judaism through an Orthodox conversion and genuinely changes religions. Otherwise, he said, the marriage is doomed to fail because down the road, any self-aware Jew, "however defined, will feel the call of their people and have the fullness of their being disrupted by intermarriage."

Rabbi Brad Hirschfield, also Orthodox and president of the National Jewish Center for Learning and Leadership, said that when marriages break down, it usually has little to do with religion. All religions should stop worrying about intermarriage and start worrying about how to help couples make their relationships work, he wrote.

Ed Case, the executive director of Interfaithfamily.com, said the Clinton wedding certainly had stirred interest in intermarriage, noting that traffic to his website was up 35 per cent in July compared to the same month last year. Case said that accepting this marriage and welcoming this intermarried family into the Jewish fold could help pave the way for the Jewish community to be more accepting of others.

Golin said he is skeptical that the Clinton-Mezvinsky wedding does anything more than revive existing battle lines in the Jewish debate over intermarriage.

"The horse is so far out of the barn on this one," Golin said, noting that as an intermarried person himself, he is turned off by much of the debate over intermarriage as a problem. "The folks who are fearful that my kind of Judaism is going to destroy Judaism are still going to be fearful. The folks who are fully embracing of interfaith families are going to be embracing. I don't see a whole lot of movement."

Contacted by JTA, the Orthodox Union declined to comment on the wedding. Separately, the head of its kashrut division, Rabbi Menachem Genack, a longtime Clinton friend and political supporter, declined to comment.

The Mezvinsky-Clinton wedding is affirmation both of the success of the Jewish community and that American Jewry must learn how to deal with intermarried families and figure out how to bring them into the Jewish fold, the Reform movement's Rabbi Yoffie said.

"The price of our reaffirmation in American society is a high rate of intermarriage," he said. "We can't be embraced and not expect that our young people won't be marrying with their young people. Unless we are prepared to withdraw into a ghetto, there is no solution."

"I look at the couple and my response is, I hope they will make a choice to raise their children in a single religion and tradition, and second, as a Jew and rabbi, I hope it will be Judaism. I don't know if they have had that conversation."

Persian Jewish journalist tells Iran's human story

By CYRUS NEEKPOUR

As the Iranian regime grapples with increased post-election instability at home as well as international isolation, it is contemplating its next moves aimed at staving off further isolation.

One factor that has contributed significantly to the widespread publicity about atrocities committed by the regime in Tehran is the work of analysts and journalists of Persian background. Some of these journalists and analysts have prominent standing within the Iranian community and major media outlets. Lisa Daftari is one such individual whose journalistic work of the last few years has shed much bright and informative light on events in Iran.

The Los Angeles-based journalist comes from a family that always put emphasis on Jewish and Persian values. The reflection of these values could be seen in Daftari's worldview and the way she looks at events in today's Iran. The first and foremost concern for Daftari in her reporting is to bring the human side of the stories to the foreground. She believes that politics do not come alive until their human impact is felt.

Born in New Jersey to Persian Jewish parents who met in the United States and married in Iran, Daftari attended Jewish school and finished high school at a private Jewish school in New Jersey. She is fluent in Persian, Hebrew and English, and speaks Spanish, which is a reflection of her family's values and emphasis on culture and its role in one's upbringing.

Daftari a strong supporter of Israel

Daftari takes pride in her multicultural background and has never felt persecuted within the Persian community. In fact, she feels great about her relationship with her non-Jewish friends and loves the warmth and friendliness of Persian culture.

During her education at Rutgers University, where she did Middle Eastern studies, with a focus on Persian literature, and minored in Spanish and vocal performance, Daftari was exposed to the beauties of Persian culture and Iran's rich history. Daftari's enthusiasm for journalism and her exposure to Iranian literature and culture led her to develop an urge to tell the story of Iran and its sociopolitical situation to the outside world.

As a result of Daftari's passion for journalism and her academic excellence, she was a recipient of the impressive and highly sought-after U.S. Presidential Scholarship that recognizes excellence in high school graduates. She applied to the master's program at Annenberg School of Journalism at the University of Southern California and since graduation, has been working as a freelance journalist. Daftari has worked as both an Iran analyst and a consultant for such networks as CBS, NBC and Fox News. She has been published in the Washington Post and FrontPage and runs her own blog at www.mideastfaces.com, where her coverage of Iranian affairs can be found.

Lisa Daftari

It becomes clear that Daftari is beautiful inside as well as out when she describes her relationship with God and how she is blessed by having God in her life to help her overcome challenges, and how powerful this relationship has always been.

She explains that the single biggest factor in her career were the 9-11 attacks of 2001, which had a deep impact on her and her views on the ongoing war on terror. She witnessed firsthand how the attacks negatively affected the lives of victims of the attack as well as those of many Iranian-Americans. This was a highly personal story for her.

Daftari is a staunch supporter of Israel and believes the Jewish state has every right to exist. This puts her in direct confrontation with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's regime, which has openly and repeatedly called for the Jewish state's annihilation.

What Daftari loves about Israel is that, in her view, it is a country with many intellectuals and bright people, and it is the only state in the region with a fully functioning democracy. As for Iran, she sees a country impregnated with a strong democratic movement. According to Daftari, Iran is a country with a highly educated population with aspirations to a free society similar to what many others have in the western world. She says young Iranians want their basic rights and are fed up with their system of government based on religious laws.

What Daftari finds remarkable and unique about today's Iran is that while the country is run by religious fanatics, the people and the society have become increasingly secular – in her words, "people of Iran have outgrown this regime."

Daftari's love for Iran becomes vividly clear when she talks about her nostalgic feelings for the country. She remembers the day the death of the Ayatollah Khomeini, the leader of the revolution, was announced. Shortly after the announcement, she rushed to her mother's arms, asking her if it was the time to go back to Iran. The negative response from her mom proved a disappointment and a sign of her continuing nostalgic feelings about Iran.

Daftari says she always wishes that she lived in Iran and she admits that what is lovely and amusing about living in Los Angeles is that there are so many Persians speaking the same language, a language she finds very poetic and charming.

As a woman, Daftari feels passionate about Iranian women and their struggle for equal rights and democracy. She finds their work and resistance against the current regime inspiring and part of a larger human story. She believes it is her moral duty to convey the struggle of Iranian women. In her coverage of Iranian women and their struggle for equality, Daftari does not consider herself an activist, as activists, in her opinion, follow a certain agenda, whereas she finds the human side of it to be compelling enough, part of a nation's bumpy road to democracy.

Daftari was in New York City recently for a series of interviews as part of the coverage of the first anniversary of the June 20 presidential elections in Iran, widely viewed to have been rigged by Ahmadinejad and his clique. The elections gave Ahmadinejad a second four-year term.

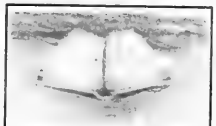
A call we shouldn't miss

By RABBI YONAH S. BERMAN

"Reach out and touch someone."

This simple slogan was used in the 1980s by AT&T to advertise its long distance service. It spoke to the ongoing human need to connect with those around us, both locally and globally. I remember how when my family moved to Israel in 1988, it took months to get our own phone line. In the meantime, calling our relatives in the United States meant using pay phones, depositing a continuous flow of coins as we spoke for a few short minutes.



Rabbinic Reflections

Today, cellphones and related devices have made long-distance communication easier, cheaper and more constant. We take for granted the ability to contact anyone at any time via phone or e-mail. And we feel that we must be constantly responsive to the communications of others. In the time it takes you to read this column, there's a very good chance you'll be interrupted by a vibration or ringtone emanating from a wireless device. And you'll probably find it quite difficult not to have a look at who's calling or tweeting or texting or e-mailing and at what it is that they want to tell you. Simply put, we hate missing calls.

The month of Elul, which began this past Wednesday, is the final month of the Jewish calendar. It is traditionally seen as a period when God is incredibly available to answer our prayer-calls as Rosh Hashanah nears. The manifestation of this special closeness to God is the unique medium we use during this Rosh Hashanah season: the shofar. It's by way of the shofar that we call out to God, begging that our past actions be judged favourably and that the coming year be a good one for us and for the entire world.

Rabbi Saadia Gaon, living in Egypt and Iraq at the turn of the 10th century, composed a list of no fewer than 10 meanings behind the shofar, with particular focus on its special sound. Here are a few of my favourites:

• Rosh Hashanah is the anniversary of Creation. As the Creator of everything, God is celebrated as the one and only true King of the world by our blowing a special instrument in God's honour. This is the shofar.

• Just as the shofar was sounded at Mount Sinai when God revealed the Torah to our People, the shofar reminds us that Rosh Hashanah is a time of re-connection with God and with fellow Jews.

• The shofar is a call to us to involve ourselves in tshuvah – those actions associated with bettering ourselves through contemplating how we have lived during the past year, and planning to live more holy lives in the year ahead.

Every weekday morning during Elul, the shofar is sounded in synagogues, marking this special month. It reminds us to contemplate the year 5770 with an eye toward improving ourselves in 5771. It exhorts us to call to God as we pray for all that is important to us, and it connects us with other Jews and with all of humanity by recalling our shared bond as children of one Creator.

The shofar's sound means that the phone is ringing and that none other than God is on the line waiting for us to answer.

This is one call we don't want to miss.

Rabbi Yonah S. Berman is associate rabbi at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim in Montreal.

The Holocaust through fiction

Beatrice & Virgil* by Yann Martel Knopf Canada.

Several weeks ago in a Hamilton auditorium I exchanged views with Yann Martel about his recent book Beatrice & Virgil. The author, of course, is the acclaimed winner of the Man Booker Prize for his 2001 novel Life of Pi, about a boy's voyage across the ocean on a lifeboat with a tiger.

Bookmarks
Bernard Baskin

Martel is convinced that the most successful and enduring way to depict the Holocaust is through works of imagination rather than factual accounts. This is a dubious thesis.

In 1979, Elie Wiesel wrote: "One cannot write about the Holocaust…The great novelist of our time – Malraux, Mauriac, Faulkner, Silone, Mann and Camus – chose to stay the away from it. It was their way of showing respect toward the dead and the survivors as well. Also, it was their way of admitting their inability to cope with themes where imagination weighed less than experience."

It is noteworthy that not even one universally praised groundbreaking work of fiction has been written about the Holocaust. Wiesel was right. Paradoxically, he went on to write a score novels about the overwhelming tragic event.

Beatrice & Virgil (the sponsors of Dante's trip through Paradise, as told in The Divine Comedy) represent a howler monkey and donkey as allegorical victims of the Holocaust. I asked Martel: "How do you think Holocaust survivors would react if informed that your artistic design is to transform them into talking animals?" His long and rambling response was not reassuring.

The novel, referred to by some critics as singular and experimental, includes portions of a Beckett-like play, two main characters with the same name and a dour elderly taxidermist, a lover of animals, who turns out to be a Nazi sympathizer. It concludes with a random sadistic climax that includes murder and arson.

Undoubtedly, Martel is eager that the Holocaust and its horrors should not be forgotten. This well-meaning ambitious effort, however, is misconceived.

Restitution* by Kathy Kacer, Second Story Press (Paperbound).

In 1939, the Reeser family, fleeing their comfortable home and secure life in Czechoslovakia, boarded a ship for Canada on the very day that German troops invaded Poland.

Happily ensconced in Toronto, Marie, the indomitable family matriarch, couldn't forget the four large, beautiful and valuable paintings that they had to leave behind. They were cherished heirlooms and an inextricable part of their past.

Restitution is an engrossing many-sided account of how the paintings, originally left for safekeeping in the hands of a friend, were finally restored to the family after a 50-year period of war and political upheaval.

Extremely helpful in the drama of rescue were a risk-taking diplomat at the Canadian Embassy in Prague, where the paintings had been deposited, and an adroit and knowledgeable art dealer and smuggler.

Rich in historical and cultural detail, this arresting story is a triumph of hope over despair, tenacity over evil.

In 1990, Marie's son, Karl Reeser, wrote: "The tortuous road of the four paintings from Rakonik to Toronto symbolizes my innermost and ever-present thought – the good fortune that all four of our family members survived those terrible years. This story is my way of 'bearing witness.'"

Kacer, a resident of Toronto and the child of Holocaust survivors, has received the Yad Vashem prize for children's Holocaust literature and many other awards.

How do we keep kids on the path?

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Within religious communities, one of the more vexing problems of recent years is defections from observance, known colloquially as "going off the derech" (literally, leaving the path). I have never been terribly happy with this term, implying as it does that there is but one path to service of God, and you're either on it or you're not. I don't know that we have accurate statistics about who drops out of observance or who leaves the fold, or whatever phrase you want to use, but the phenomenon certainly exists and affects many families.

In certain Orthodox circles, the phrase "off the derech" is, at times, merged with the provocative buzz words "kids at risk." Part of the problem is the flexibility with which these labels are interchangeably used. Sometimes they're used to describe kids who leave Torah observance. At other times, the same phrase depicts kids who have a drug or alcohol problem, and even engage in criminal acts.

These are very different situations. I can quite easily conceive of someone being not observant and being very well adjusted. It's quite possible that children who leave Judaism do so because they don't buy into the package that observance entails. A child could be well loved and nurtured and simply say, "No, religion is not for me," although the anecdotal evidence is that in many cases, there are emotional factors that play into the decision to leave, including family tensions and rebellion against unsympathetic authority figures. But it is misleading to constantly conflate children who reject observance with those who engage in harmful behaviours by calling both of them "at-risk."

The situation obviously calls into question the role that education plays in helping or hindering a child's path to Judaism and raises fundamental questions. What should be the primary focus of our educational system in terms of what we should be inculcating into Jewish children? What values, what information, what attitudes? Are we succeeding in this? If not, what has gone wrong? How do we change course? Is it more important to impart a "feeling" to kids, a feeling of love and joy related to Torah observance, or is it more crucial to engage their minds, to explain the why of Judaism to them? (I understand that ideally one would wish to do both.) For that matter, is spiritual passion teachable?

Literature that deals with the "off the derech" concept tends to glibly divide between those people who are "safely frum" and those who are not. But it would be more accurate to stress that what this actually alerts us to are systemic problems within contemporary Jewish communities that affect everybody. They need to be addressed not as a means of persuading the rebellious, but because all Jews live in an open society where we can choose practically any lifestyle we want and so can our children. If modernity is thus here to stay, can there ever be a "permanent solution" to "off the derech"?

Rosh Hashanah is in the air

Rosh Hashanah may be weeks away but the High Holidays are already in the air with early morning confessional prayers, the reciting of a special Psalm and, of course, the daily blast of the shofar.

Why do we blow the shofar for a month before the New Year? Maimonides wrote: "Arise from your slumber, you who are asleep; wake up from your deep sleep, you who are fast asleep; search your deeds, repent, and remember your Creator." [http://bit.ly/elul09]

Although many people compare the shofar to a wake-up call, Yonatan Sredni suggests a slightly different analogy. He says that in order for children to be ready for that bell on the first day of school, parents must enforce proper bedtime habits well before then to help them switch from vacation to school mode.

"The shofar of Elul acts much in the same way," says Sredni. "In order to be ready to hear the shofar blasts on Rosh Hashanah, we start 'training' ourselves a month beforehand. Every day, day in, day out, the shofar acts as our alarm clock, getting us ready for the first day of the new year. Whether it's the first day of school or the first day of the new year, we have to be ready to answer that bell – or blast." [http://bit.ly/elul10]

Slichot, penitential prayers, are recited daily, except for Shabbat, by Sephardim from the beginning of Elul. Ashkenazim begin very early on a Sunday morning at least four days before Rosh Hashanah. [http://bit.ly/elul11] The central phrase in the Slichot service is the recitation of God's 13 Attributes of Mercy that were spoken as Moses received the second set of tablets at Mount Sinai. [http://bit.ly/elul12]

Rabbi Yitzchak Berkowitz asks why we spend so much effort repeating God's attributes. Shouldn't we focus on our own spiritual growth? He then suggests that in order to grow, we need to make sure our own lifestyle reflects these Godly traits. "For example, the Talmud says that if you are patient with others, then God will be patient with you. You can only demand that God employ all these attributes if you apply them in your own relationships." [http://bit.ly/elul13]

Did you know that a special birthday is celebrated every Elul? The world's. Although Rosh Hashanah is often thought of as birthday of the world, the Jewish New Year actually commemorates the creation of man and woman on the sixth day. Counting backward in your calendar actually places creation of the world on the 25th of Elul. [http://bit.ly/elul14]

Starting on the second day of Elul, Psalm 27 is recited twice daily after prayers. "A psalm of David – the Lord is my light and my salvation... for He will hide me in his tent." [http://bit.ly/elul06]

The Midrash explains the appropriateness of this prayer during this period: "The Lord is my light" – on Rosh Hashanah; "and my salvation" – on Yom Kippur; "for He will hide me in his tent" – on Sukkot. [http://bit.ly/elul07]

A few thousand years later, the late Debbie Perlman composed her own psalm to this special month. [http://bit.ly/elul08]

"In the month of Elul, we uncover our secrets,/ Examining them with a truthful heart,/ Counting the pulse beats of our life,/ The selfish pressures we apply and resist./ Call us to the consultation of our souls,/ For You are a God of healing and mercy;/ Call us to begin without delay,/ That Elul might draw us near to You."

Law student works for peace in Kenya

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Adam Hummel is trying to change the world, one soccer tournament at a time.

Hummel, a University of Windsor law school student, is the founder of Youth Ambassadors for Peace, a grassroots group that aims to unite three Kenyan tribes through workshops and soccer tournaments.

Hummel, 25, who was born in South Africa, has always had clear goals.

"It sounds cheesy, but whenever anyone asks me what I want to do, I say, 'I want to make peace in the Middle East,'" he said.

But, on a summer trip to Kenya, Hummel saw the opportunity to create a different sort of peace.

Adam Hummel

Several summers ago, Hummel volunteered with a small organization in Africa dedicated to forging peace on the continent. When he arrived in Kiptere, a village in Kenya, he realized that, apart from someone from Japan who spoke no English, he was the only volunteer.

"When I got there, I asked where the other volunteers were. They said, 'This is it.' I panicked for the first couple hours," he said.

But Hummel enjoyed the trip, in which he toured the area with some locals from Nairobi and learned about the civil war that broke out after the December 2007 general election in Kenya, which left about 1,300 people dead.

"What I ended up doing [on that trip] was being able to forge relationships over there, to make some good contacts," he said. "At the end of the trip, I thought, 'Maybe I can do my own thing here.'"

So before he left, Hummel came up with the idea of a soccer tournament. But instead of organizing it himself, he gave the job to local young people.

"The one thing I saw which really stuck out [in Kenya] when I was there, especially in these little rural communities, was that idleness is a big problem. Youths don't always have anything to do," he said.

"As a result, they turn to drugs and alcohol. I tried to get a few youths who weren't doing anything to take charge of this tournament," Hummel said, adding that he funded the initiative out of his own pocket.

In May of 2009, Hummel returned to Africa, this time with a larger goal.

"I decided I wanted to make [a soccer] tournament about the peace project," he said, adding that its goal was to unite young people from the three tribes that fought against each other in the civil war – the Kalenjin, Kisii and Luo tribes.

Adam Hummel, 25, started up several initiatives to promote peace in Kenya, including a soccer tournament that brought together players from several tribes.

"That tournament in particular was to bring together youths who were not willing to step up and take leadership positions, but were passionate about sports, and to get them to participate with people in other tribes, to get them to play together to show they're all the same," he said.

The tournament, which ran over two weekends and attracted about 2,000 spectators, was only part of Hummel's initiative. While in Kenya, he also ran a workshop that brought together 25 young people, aged 16 to 30, from the three tribes. The workshop, which was run with the help of Courtney Toretto, a friend of Hummel's, was where the Youth Ambassadors for Peace was created.

"They were charged with being ambassadors to their own communities and to break this idea of tribalism," he said.

At the end of the workshop about peace, shared values and the civil war, Hummel helped the participants draft a peace treaty. This group still exists in Kenya and is committed to encouraging peace throughout its members' communities.

Right now, with the help of donations from friends and family, Hummel is helping Kenyans lead their own initiatives, most of which they have named after him.

The initiatives include the High School Peace Club, where youth ambassadors travel to schools to speak about the dangers of tribalism and racism and set up peace clubs, and Adam's Poultry Project.

"The last time I sent [the youth ambassadors] money, basically they had a bit of extra money," Hummel said. The group used that money to buy chickens and gave out their eggs to villagers living with HIV/AIDS.

"Eggs are really expensive there. These people don't have anything at all… and chickens are so cheap," Hummel said.

Hummel's next goal is to take Canadian students and help them facilitate similar workshops in Kenya. He has been in talks with the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students about this project and his organization.

Noah Kochman, the CFJS's adviser for communications and government relations, is impressed with Hummel's projects.

"We're definitely still looking to see how we can get engaged in the project. Adam has already done some amazing things, including education in villages and bringing students together to play soccer games," Kochman said.

"It's one thing to have politicians stand up for peace. Yet the key is to have young people, the next generation, believing it. [That's] what Adam is doing."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Internet searches result in cash for non-profits

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Israeli high-tech wizards are the creators of an Internet tool that enables Canadians to contribute financially to their favourite charity or non-profit organization with a click of a mouse and not a penny out of their pockets.

Every time a web search is made via a customized site for that organization, a few cents automatically goes into that organization's coffers.

Comtribute was launched recently by its co-founder Yaniv Rivlin, a 28-year-old Israeli who was a Sauvé Scholar this year in Montreal, at Sauvé House, the stately mansion on Docteur Penfield Avenue where he lived and learned with a dozen other promising young leaders from around the world.

During his stay, he became familiar with the difficulties many non-profits here have in raising a steady stream of funds, especially those that are less known and can't count on big donors. He believed Israel's innovative information technology experts might have an answer.

Comtribute was developed by Rivlin and his Israeli partners under the guidance of professor Jim Torczyner, founder and director of the McGill Middle East Peace Program, who was Rivlin's mentor as a Sauvé Scholar.

Zachary Rosentzweig, left, a leader of the youth group The Human Promise, seals a deal with Comtribute co-founder Yaniv Rivlin.

Rivlin is not a techie; he is, in fact, headed this fall for Harvard University, where he will pursue a master's in public policy at the Kennedy School.

Hillel Montreal, the Ghetto Shul, a student-run synagogue, and The Human Promise, a mostly Jewish youth group that was active in raising awareness of the human tragedy in Darfur, are among the first 15 non-profits that have joined Comtribute.

Others include such major charitable bodies as Canada World Youth, Make-A-Wish Foundation, and the Jeanne Sauvé Foundation, which was created by the late Governor General and sponsors the Sauvé Scholars program.

Comtribute, which is a private company, offers registered non-profits in Canada, and soon in the United States as well, a solution called a platform free of charge through which they can not only raise money online but also communicate information and, ideally, foster a sense of community among their supporters. The platform can be set up in a matter of minutes, said Rivlin.

Searches may be initiated from that site or an associated toolbar that can be downloaded.

The searches are powered by search engines such as Google, Yahoo and Bing and results are at the same speed. These corporate giants are the source of the money paid, an average of three cents per search. While there is no cost to the "donor" or organization, Comtribute's take is 30 per cent.

"In return for choosing them, these search engine companies contribute a part of their advertising revenue directly to the non-profit from whose site the search was run," Rivlin explained.

The platform is "white label," that is, it does not contain any reference to Comtribute, and contains only the organization's own branding, including its own name above the search box. The search engine company is identified only in a small-print line at the page bottom.

Users can forward the site to people they know, thereby extending the revenue-generating potential.

While a few pennies may not seem like a lot, Rivlin points out the multiplier effect is significant. "If each supporter performs only two searches a day, they'll bring in over $15 each year straight to the organization. Now imagine if you recruit just over 1,000 supporters, that's over $15,000" netted.

Comtribute's solution is flexible enough that online shopping, playing games and even sending e-mails will eventually also bring in money for the non-profits, he said, perhaps as early as next year.

The service is not available on mobile devices – yet.

The platform contains such features as a toolbar with a scrolling newsline, and a running tally of the amount the user has contributed through his searches, as well as the total from the people he has recruited to the site.

A link can be included to the organization's primary website or blog.

Rivlin, who is Comtribute's North American director, said organizations are carefully screened for the legitimacy and are required to sign a terms-of-use agreement. The search patterns are monitored and any fraudulent use will result in the site being closed down.

Otherwise, Rivlin assures that Comtribute is secure and private.

Rivlin's co-founder and the CEO of Comtribute is Nadav Brandstater in Israel, who was a senior executive with the software company Amdocs.

Another key developer of Comtribute is Mark Goldstein, who was a top designer for Microsoft in Israel.

Rivlin thinks the service will be especially popular with young people who are used to technology and want to support causes but have little money.

Rivlin grew up on a kibbutz in the Golan Heights, the son of an American-born father and a mother from Montreal, and is a graduate of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

He will be attending Harvard on a E. David Fischman Scholarship, worth about $300,000. The foundation selects outstanding young veterans of the Israel Defence Forces who wish to study political science, economics or law at an Ivy League university, through to a doctorate. The one proviso is that they return to Israel for at least five years after graduation and work in the public sector.

That's no problem for Rivlin, a former combat commander who served in the 2006 Lebanon war and turned into a peace activist who has dreams of some day serving his country – not in high-tech – but perhaps in the political and diplomatic sphere.

QJC to have float in Montreal's gay pride parade

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Quebec Jewish Congress (QJC) and the Jewish gay group Ga'ava will again participate in the annual gay pride parade in Montreal taking place Aug. 15.

They will have a large float this year, said QJC human rights chair Abby Shawn, but the details of its appearance are being kept under wraps. QJC and Ga'ava are inviting anyone who wishes, whatever their sexual orientation, to come aboard.

QJC expects Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA), a Toronto-based group critical of the Israeli government, to show up again this year, but Shawn said the main reason QJC and Ga'ava are taking part is to support the rights of homosexuals, not counter any anti-Israel presence.

As of last week, QuAIA's participation was not clear. The group had made no public statement and did not return e-mailed inquiries from The CJN.

The placid atmosphere in Montreal is in sharp contrast to the controversy that surrounded this year's Pride Parade in Toronto.

Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada, along with some members of the gay and lesbian community, including the Jewish group Kulanu, as well as some city councillors and sponsors, objected to the presence of QuAIA in the July 4 parade. Organizers, faced with the possibility of the withdrawal of city funding, agreed in May to ban the phrase "Israeli apartheid" from being displayed in the parade, but rescinded that decision just 10 days before the event.

Responding to political pressure and accusations they were stifling free speech, Pride Toronto organizers allowed QuAIA to march, reversing the earlier decision to ban the group on the grounds its participation under that name violated the non-discrimination policy of the City of Toronto, which partially funds Pride.

Jewish groups had objected to QuAIA's participation in last year's parade, and the move to rescind the ban led 500 people to march in this year's parade in a pro-Israel contingent led by Kulanu and CJC.

QJC and Ga'ava (Hebrew for pride), a group affiliated with Hillel Montreal, participated in the Montreal parade last year for the first time. They rode in a Star of David-festooned pickup truck with the skyline of Tel Aviv, a city reputed for its hospitable attitude to gay people, adorning either side of the vehicle.

Participants flew Israeli flags, including one in which the blue was replaced by the rainbow colours symbolic of the lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgendered (LGBT) people's movement.

Shawn said QJC has not sought to have the QuAIA excluded from the parade, which receives funding from the City of Montreal and Quebec government, but it has reached an understanding with its organizers.

Last year, the group's float was relegated to near the end of the parade, while the pro-Israel entry was near the front.

"They have been marginalized, and we do not want to give them attention," Shawn said. "The organizers realize they try to hijack the event to spew their hatred."

QJC feels it's not only appropriate, but important, to have such a high-profile presence in the parade because of its historic advocacy for the rights of the persecuted, she said. "We're there to express solidarity with the gay and lesbian community."

It also serves to raise public awareness that Israel "is the only country in the Middle East that supports gay rights… while in other places gays can be imprisoned and tortured."

The parade begins at 1 p.m. at the corner of René Lévesque Boulevard and Guy Street and proceeds east to Sanguinet Street and a celebration at Place Emilie-Gamelin.

Ga'ava will also have an information table at the Community Day on Ste. Catherine Street on Aug. 14.

Shawn said QJC has taken into consideration the fact that Orthodox Judaism does not generally condone homosexuality and that many in the Montreal Jewish community probably do not support an active identification with the gay rights cause.

"We support the right of the individual to live the life they choose and to be safe and secure… This is a human rights issue," Shawn said.

Jewish community organizations affiliated with Federation CJA have been reaching out to the gay community lately like never before. A few months ago, the Quebec-Israel Committee hosted a luncheon for local gay community leaders to meet Mike Hamel, executive director of Aguda, Israel's largest LGBT organization.

Federal security funding aids Jewish orgs

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Federal Public Safety Minister Vic Toews was in Toronto this week for more announcements related to security funding for Jewish organizations.

Following an announcement two weeks ago of nearly $300,000 to JVS Toronto to help combat youth crime, Toews made an appearance at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation to promote almost $90,000 in security grants to six Jewish institutions in the city.

The funding comes from the government's $3 million Security Infrastructure Program (SIP), which was launched as a pilot project in 2007 by then-safety minister Stockwell Day, to help communities at risk of hate crimes cover the costs of upgrading or installing security measures at places of worship or communal centres.

Toews' speech at Shaarei Shomayim on Monday detailed how much the government has granted to six Jewish organizations since the program's inception. The largest amount, $24,360, went to Beth Tzedec Congregation almost two years ago.

The next-largest amount went to Chabad of Midtown, which received $21,771, followed by Shaarei Shomayim, $14,948; Shomrai Shabbos-Chevrah Mishnayos Congregation, $11,618; Temple Sinai, $9,325, and Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto's Posluns campus on Neptune Avenue, $7,216.

Brian Lass, president of Shaarei Shomayim, told The CJN that his shul received a portion of the money before his presidency, while the rest was received almost three months ago.

He said the funds have already been invested in closed circuit TVs and perimeter lighting for the synagogue.

Arthur Landa, outgoing executive director of Associated Hebrew Schools, said Associated received its money about two months ago.

Queries to the ministry about why this announcement was made months, or in some cases even years, after funds were granted were not answered by The CJN's deadline.

In a statement, Toews said the government "is committed to building safe and strong communities."

He added that the money "will allow [Jewish] community members in Toronto to gather, practise their faith and provide educational opportunities, safely and peacefully."

Asked whether the government plans to extend the security infrastructure program beyond its 2010 expiration date, Toews told The CJN in a recent interview that he would "agree" it is a worthwhile program and hoped to see it expanded.

According to the ministry, the program "provides funding for security enhancements for not-for-profit community centres, provincially recognized educational institutions and places of worship linked to a community with a demonstrated history of being victimized by hate-motivated crime."

Approved projects could receive up to half the total project costs, "with a maximum funding contribution from the program of $100,000 per project."

The program's eligible costs include security assessments (up to 25 per cent of a project's total cost); security equipment and hardware, such as alarm systems, closed-circuit TV systems, digital video recorders, fences, gates, lighting, intercom systems; minor construction costs related to the project, such as contractor fees, labour, equipment rental, installation fees and training costs directly related to the new security infrastructure.

In 2008, as part of the program's phased roll-out, the government announced close to $400,000 worth of funding to several Toronto-area Jewish organizations as part of the program.

That round of funding included $100,000 to Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation, $39,595 to Bialik Hebrew Day School, $62,183 to B'nai Brith Canada, $95,000 to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, $16,977 to Chabad@Flamingo in Thornhill and $53,280 to Eitz Chaim Day Schools.

In a joint statement, Canadian Jewish Congress and UJA Federation thanked the government and commended the program.

"It's sad to say, but the risk to our community and to others is unlikely to disappear anytime soon, so it is opportune to reiterate our urgent hope that the SIP will be made a permanent element of Canada's continuing commitment to the security of its citizens," said CJC president Mark Freiman.

"Jewish community security is an urgent requirement which imposes an increasing financial burden on UJA Federation. Given global circumstances we see this situation continuing. We are most grateful for the financial relief provided by the SIP program," said David Spiro, chair of federation's committee on public affairs.

DR. GERALD JOSEPH GOLDENBERG z'l, formerly of Winnipeg and Professor Emeritus of Medicine at the University of Toronto, passed away peacefully at the Princess Margaret Hospital in Toronto on July 16, 2010 after a brief illness. He was 76.

Sheila, his beloved wife of 51 years, his four children, Lesley, Jay (Dinah), Suzy (Tony) and Ellie and his sister, Cynthia Goldberg, were by his side. He is also survived by his four grandchildren, Samuel, Matthew, Alyssa and Petra, in-laws Seymour Goldberg, Bebe & Barry Posner, Calvin & Carolyn Melmed as well as nieces, nephews and cousins.

Gerald was born in Brandon, Manitoba and moved to Winnipeg as a child after the death of his father, Jacob Goldenberg. His mother, Fanny Goldenberg, raised her two children singlehandedly in Winnipeg's North End.

Gerald won the gold medal when he graduated from Medical School at the University of Manitoba in 1957. He earned a PhD in Medicine while completing a residency at the University of Minnesota and continued further studies in London, England. He returned to Winnipeg in 1964 to join the Manitoba Cancer Foundation.

He wrote his first paper on cancer research in the early 1960s and was still publishing more than 36 years later, with nearly 100 peer-reviewed articles published in scientific and medical journals. In addition to his research, he taught at the University of Manitoba Medical School and at the Health Sciences Centre and treated cancer patients. He was Director of the Manitoba Institute of Cell Biology from 1973-88. He became Professor in the Department of Medicine in 1975.

Gerald established a national and international reputation, serving as a consultant to the National Cancer Institute and National Institutes of Health in the U.S. He pursued collaborations with scientists at other centres through sabbaticals at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, the Dana-Farber Cancer Institute and Harvard Medical School, in Boston, MA. He also found time to be a board member of the YMHA and read deeply about the Jewish experience as well as history and biography.

In 1990, he moved to Toronto to become the first Director of the Interdepartmental Division of Oncology, Faculty of Medicine, University of Toronto, a post which he held until 1999. During this time, he established university-wide oncology rounds and study groups and worked to integrate clinical oncology research across disciplines. He became Professor in the Departments of Pharmacology and Medicine, University of Toronto in 1990. He was also Assistant Dean, Oncology, Faculty of Medicine from 1990-95 and became Professor Emeritus in 2001.

He continued an active research program in the Department of Pharmacology while pursuing both administrative and clinical activities. He remained a consultant at the Princess Margaret Hospital until his retirement in July 2009.

Gerald was known as a caring, compassionate physician, respected by his colleagues and students and loved by his patients. In addition to his working life, he was an avid golfer and enjoyed summers at the family cottage at Falcon Lake, Manitoba. He and his wife travelled extensively both professionally and for pleasure. He was devoted to his family and proud of his children and grandchildren; they in turn brought him great joy. He will be greatly missed.

A charitable fund has been established in Gerald's name at Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel, 2401 Steeles Avenue West, Toronto, Ontario M3J 2P1 (416) 663 9060 or http://www.benjaminsparkmemorialchapel.ca/

Generous community leader led by example

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Lifelong community leader David Kaufman, who passed away Aug. 1 at age 83, is being remembered as a good friend and a man who led by example.

Bob Freedman, executive director of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, recalled that in emergency campaigns for Israel, Kaufman was always one of the first to step up and pledge support, and he was one of the top donors.

Longtime friend and fellow community leader Marjorie Blankstein noted that Kaufman was one of the first to support the concept of a Jewish community campus for Winnipeg and also funded the Kaufman-Silverberg Library on the new campus, as well as the Kaufman Day Care.

David Kaufman

"For many years, I used to canvass David for the Combined Jewish Appeal campaign," she said. "He was wonderful. His gift always came in quickly – at times even before I called.

"He was a pillar of our community, a real mensch."

Lifelong friend Judge Guy Kroft recalls that Kaufman was an unpretentious person. "Even though he was wealthy, he had no need to show off," Kroft said. "He wasn't demanding. He had much wisdom to offer. He was an unusually fine fellow."

Yude Henteleff, another longtime friend, spoke of Kaufman's "wonderful sense of humour."

The two met at age 18 in university after Kaufman and his family moved to Winnipeg from rural Manitoba.

In 1953, Kaufman married the former Nora Silverberg, daughter of the late Harry Silverberg, who at the time was one of the Winnipeg Jewish community's wealthiest individuals and leading philanthropists.

In the 1950s, Kaufman operated a successful grocery store in south Winnipeg. Blankstein remembers him delivering groceries to her back door.

In the mid-1950s, Kaufman accepted his father-in-law's invitation to join him in business. Harry Silverberg was the president of Silpit Industries, one of Western Canada's largest garment manufacturers. When Silverberg unexpectedly died in 1966, Kaufman found himself in charge of the company. Under his leadership, Silpit rose to even greater heights.

"David was a very good businessman," Henteleff said. "He was fair in all his business dealings and well respected by his employees and fellow businessmen."

Freedman added that Kaufman also frequently and quietly steered business to fledgling entrepreneurs to help them get started.

Henteleff spoke about Kaufman's foresight. In business, he foresaw the decline of the garment industry in Canada in the 1990s and invested in real estate in Winnipeg's Exchange District.

His foresight was also in evidence in 1966 when he joined a group of Jewish businessmen in founding the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba. The foundation now has assets of more than $50 million and is a major funder in the community. Kaufman served as president of the foundation from 1983 to 1986.

Freedman said that it was under Kaufman's leadership in 1972 that the Jewish Welfare Fund – the community's longtime governing board – merged with the western branch of the Canadian Jewish Congress and the Winnipeg Congress Council (representing Jewish organizations in the city) to form the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council. (Kaufman was the last president of the Welfare Fund.)

But it wasn't just in Jewish community leadership roles that Kaufman left his mark. Kroft said he was also well respected in the general community. He and Kroft were both members of the board of the Winnipeg Foundation, Winnipeg's largest charitable foundation.

"David was held in very high regard at the Winnipeg Foundation," Kroft said.

And Kaufman was able to accomplish all that he did despite a long history of heart troubles. He first developed a heart problem at 39 and underwent at least three heart procedures over the years. Freedman credited Kaufman's wife, Nora, with being a wonderful caregiver and partner.

"She made sure that he exercised regularly and properly," Freedman said.

Kaufman had been ill for the past year.

Blankstein said she and her husband, Morley, last got together with the Kaufmans a couple of months ago.

"I am glad we had the opportunity to see them that last time," she said. "David's passing is both a personal loss and a loss to our community."

Kaufman is survived by his wife, Nora, and children Allan, Marcia and Joy and their families.

What's in a name?

By MASADA SIEGEL
Special to The CJN

A recent conversation left me feeling like my heart was ripped out of my body, tossed under a bus and shattered in a million pieces.

As if someone knew I needed light in my moment of darkness, a few minutes later, I received an e-mail from a new travel friend, Randle Roper, who was visiting "Masada" the mountain. He wrote, "I thought of you all day. Our guide said that your name was incredibly special. I asked if it was common name in Israel, she said, 'Oh no. No. Not at all. That name is only used to express absolute specialness.' So congratulations."

Most of us don't choose our names, and I didn't pick mine. When I was born and people heard my name, one man said to my father, "What a big name, for such a small baby." My father responded, "She'll grow into it."

Perhaps we all grow into our names, or maybe they shape who we become. Being named after such a historical, emotional, meaningful place has placed a big responsibility on my shoulders.

The fortress of Masada is the site of one of the most interesting stories of ancient Judea. King Herod's palace was on top of Masada, and in escaping the Romans, many Jewish Zealots fled to live on the top of the mountain. A three-year battle ensued between them, however. Instead of being taken into slavery by the Romans, these Jews instead decided to kill themselves.

Since suicide is against religious law, the 1,000 citizens decided instead to kill each other methodically until only 10 men remained. Those 10 men put their names into a lottery to decide who would be the last man standing. Instead of 1,000 suicides, there were 999 forgivable deaths by others, with only one man having to fall on his own sword, thus nobly ending their dilemma. Their choice was to have freedom in death or to be slaves in life.

The almost 2,000-year-old story of Masada left such an impact that it's still studied by American military leaders today. The most memorable conversation I have had about my name was when I had the good fortune to meet retired U.S. Gen. Colin Powell. The moment he heard my name, he told me how he had studied the battle and learned all about the strategies and how it was a fascinating story of great military as well as political importance.

My name has always made me feel different, because just simply meeting someone new often leads to explaining the story and people asking me if I am Jewish and what do I think of Israel's political actions.

Stop worrying and call her bluff

Family Matters
by John Syrtash

Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator
for 28 years

Question: My wife keeps threatening to sue me. Two family law mediators have told us I'm right and she's wrong about the law. But the court costs and testifying at a trial scare me. Help.

Answer: Stop worrying about a "trial" and call her bluff. Your fears are unfounded. That knot in your stomach will unravel if you place your trust in a knowledgeable family law lawyer. Your lawyer should write a letter demanding a fair settlement with a time limit for a response, falling which you should ideally take her to court first. There are certain tactical advantages in being the first to sue. In Ontario, the first court appearance, called a Case Conference, does not permit either spouse to obtain any relief from the judge, except for procedural court orders, like obtaining orders for information about spousal finances. It also provides an opportunity to present a written "Offer to Settle" in your terms. If your wife does not accept your offer after a successful trial then the trial judge will likely compel her to pay most of your legal bills. If thoughtfully prepared, these offers often lead to settlement with the assistance of an experienced caring judge.

Mr. Syrtash is Counsel to Garfin Zeidenberg LLP, Suite 800, 5255 Yonge Street (at Norton) just north of Mel Lastman Square, Civic Centre Subway station, Toronto, ON M5G 1E6. Question: A couple has two kids, aged 18 and 14. The wife works two jobs and the husband has not been employed (homemaker) for more than 19 years. After years of pleading with the husband to become employed, the wife has finally had enough and asks for a divorce. The husband has agreed to exchange a sum of money for the wife to retain child custody and the matrimonial home. However, the husband becomes violent one night and physically abuses the wife. Police are called and he is arrested pending three charges. He has no employment and no money. How will the court look at this situation? The wife's fear is that legal aid may become involved and she may stand to lose half of the value of the wife's assets, including the matrimonial home.

Answer: If the parents were not married then under amendments to Ontario's Children's Law Reform Act, a judge must consider violence and abuse when determining the bests interests of the child and how that child should be parented, meaning issues of custody and access. This is true even if the violence was against the other parent, not against the child. If the parents were married, no such provisions exist under Canada's Divorce Act, although violent spouses traditionally do not fare as well in custody disputes. However, aside from this issue your friend has every right to be worried. A court will likely treat her husband the same way it would treat a wife who has been a homemaker for 19 years.

Rabbi hopes to open medical marijuana dispensary

By ADAM KREDO
Washington Jewish Week

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Rabbi Jeffrey Kahn is out "to save lives," and he hopes to do so by selling marijuana.

But only to sick people.

Rabbi Kahn, 58, has embarked on a quest to establish what would ostensibly become the first medical marijuana dispensary for the chronically ill in Washington, D.C.'s Takoma Park neighbourhood.

With D.C. recently passing a bill that allows for the creation of at least five medical marijuana dispensaries in the city, Rabbi Kahn has taken the initial steps to set up his own medicinal pot shop at 6925 4th St., N.W., not far from his home.

Assuming that the District's bureaucracy creeps along at a steady rate, come November, Rabbi Kahn expects to be opening the doors to the Takoma Wellness Center.

The law permits city-sanctioned dealers to distribute up to two ounces of the controversial – and in most U.S. states, highly illegal – substance to individuals who suffer from a narrow set of major illnesses, including HIV, glaucoma, cancer or other "debilitating" and "chronic" conditions, according to the bill.

The Reform-ordained Rabbi Kahn says that after working from the bimah for about 26 years at various shuls, he and his wife, Stephanie, are entering the legal drug trade to help severely ill patients who have needlessly suffered for too long at the hands of what he calls a biased health system.

"There are sick people for whom this can really make a real difference," said Rabbi Kahn, invoking Jewish healing principles, such as in Leviticus' Parshat Kedoshim, or the Holiness Code, which reads in part: "You shall not stand by idly while your neighbour bleeds."

Cannabis – as Rabbi Kahn refers to it, claiming the word "marijuana" is a pejorative term that promotes negative stereotypes about the plant – is a legitimate healing tool, he says.

From bimah to pot seller

"What do you do when something's against the law, but your doctor says it will provide you relief?" the D.C. resident asked, soon admitting with a chuckle: "When I retired from my [last] congregation [Temple Har Shalom in Warren, N.J.], it was the furthest thing in my mind that I would end up in D.C. selling marijuana – you just never know."

Helplessly witnessing the painful deaths of Stephanie Kahn's mother and father dramatically influenced the couple's thinking on the drug.

Her father, Jules Reifkind, who suffered for years from the degenerative nerve disorder multiple sclerosis, died first.

For years, the Kahns watched as he physically deteriorated, becoming completely bedridden, the couple recalled. Early on, however, a doctor hinted that marijuana could be the key to alleviating Reifkind's muscle spasms and recurring bouts of pain.

But in the 1970s, when the doctor first recommended the plant, Reifkind was dubious, Stephanie Kahn, 55, recalled.

"My father [was] a straight-laced businessman and was horrified by the recommendation," she said.

Marijuana has long been the benchmark of low-brow comedy and countless anti-drug campaigns, but the Kahns soon took note of its remedial qualities.

On the rare instances when Reifkind, who died in 2005, was able to obtain the drug illicitly, "it made such a difference, but it totally freaked him out, just the idea," Stephanie Kahn said.

Her mother, Libby, who was diagnosed with lung cancer in June 2009 and died two months later, likely would have benefited greatly from smoking marijuana, but she never was able to procure the substance, Kahn recalled.

"She was just wasting away" from numerous sessions of chemotherapy, which had completely destroyed her appetite, Kahn recalled. But the family "couldn't get [marijuana] for her, and she really wanted it. I felt bad." (Marijuana, as comedians often note, is known to increase one's appetite dramatically.)

So when the D.C. City Council took the first steps toward legalizing the substance for medical purposes, the Kahns held a family meeting.

"We sat down and said, 'This is something we can do and do well to really save lives and make a contribution,' " said Rabbi Kahn, who, following a two-year stint in Israel, relocated to D.C. about a year ago to take a top post at the D.C.-based Interfaith Drug Policy Initiative, an advocacy group that campaigns for more "compassionate" drug laws.

It's still unclear whether D.C.'s medical marijuana law will remain on the books, as Congress has until the end of the month to veto the measure. And at least two members of the U.S. House of Representatives are balking at the city's efforts, and one has threatened to pull D.C.'s federal funding if the law isn't altered.

If D.C. ignores his call, Rep. Jason Chaffetz (R.-Utah), the ranking member on a subcommittee responsible for awarding the city federal dollars, said he'd be open to "withholding funding," as it's a proven method to "get [the city's] attention."

The political fray aside, the Kahns say they're keeping their heads down, continuing to lay the groundwork necessary to finalize the Takoma Wellness Center, which would offer a range of diverse marijuana strains, as well as holistic services, such as aromatherapy and reflexology, according to the shop's website.

The centre already has the widespread backing of many community members – a central requirement of the D.C. law, which says licenses only will be awarded to dispensaries that gain the support of so-called "advisory neighbourhood commissions," or local political bodies set up to consider a range of initiatives affecting city neighbourhoods.

Olive oils not all created equal

By SYBIL KAPLAN
Special to The CJN

Imagine sitting five hours a day (with three breaks) for three days and tasting 189 samples of olive oil. Incredible? Not for the 21 judges from 14 countries attending the First Mediterranean International Olive Oil Competition in Jerusalem.

According to Chaim Gan, the "grape man," TerraOlivo is an offshoot of the annual TerraVino international wine competition.

Along with Gan, Moshe Spak, international affairs director of TerraVino, and Raúl César Castellani of Argentina are organizers of the event, one of only eight such competitions in the world. This one, held at Jerusalem's Inbal Hotel, is sponsored by the Municipality of Jerusalem, the Ministry of Tourism, the Inbal Hotel and the Israel Olive Oil Council. Also sitting at the table overseeing the competition is a Tel Aviv corporation lawyer.

Israel is one of the founding members of the International Olive Oil Council, based in Madrid.

"My job as organizer is to make the selections of the jury and promote and market the competition," Spak explained. "No other competition has this quantity of countries. We chose Israel because we are Israelis – we like to have events here and olive oil is identified with Israel. Jerusalem is the identity of olive oil."

A cursory glance actually shows 30 references to olive oil in the Bible – as a means of payment, for use in anointing people, and for religious purposes, food, medicine, cosmetics and lighting.

The judges, who come from Uruguay, Spain, Argentina, Italy and Israel, use a scoring sheet looking at aroma, taste sensations and final sensation in smell and taste. They can also refer to a list of 25 descriptive words and four types of pepper.

All the judges are olive oil professionals. They drink from blue, professional, oil-tasting glasses, imported from Spain, so that they cannot see the colour. Each tasting glass has a separate glass covering. The waiters bring out the glasses from the kitchen, where the bottles are closely guarded. On the tables are bowls with slices of green apples whose acid helps clean the palette between tastings. There are also bottles of Aqua Panna distilled water and Pellegrino sparkling water.

After two days of tasting, there will be a conference on the third day with public tasting and teachers to explain how to taste.

On the final day, a grand prestige gold medal, a prestige gold medal and a gold medal will be awarded to the best olive oil, the best Israeli olive oil, the best kosher oil and the best boutique oil.

Gan presided over the tasting, reprimanding the judges when they talked at their tables and discouraging them from sharing information.

"If the Arab countries would have participated," said Spak, who made aliyah from Argentina, "we would have a minimum of 50 to 60 samples –for example, from Tunisia, Jordan, Turkey and Egypt."

Out on the patio sat Zohar Kerem, a lecturer, food chemist and researcher from the Hebrew University, a large part of whose research is dedicated to olive oil. Kerem also works with the researchers from the Ministry of Agriculture.

"My part is looking into the quality of olive oil, the effects of shelf life, the differences between glass, plastic or tin containers," he said.

He is also involved with learning why olive oil is good for one's health and which compounds are good for the body.

He cited some research that indicates there is a compound in olive oil that does the same thing in the body as Advil. The fatty acids in olive oil are also in a good ratio, he said.

"It is the best fat we need to consume," Kerem said. "It also contains vitamins needed in our diet."

The competition will be held at the end of April or beginning of May next year, and it will become an annual event, organizers said.

Grandfather's cantorial CD release inspires jazz singer

Sophie Berkal-Sarbit has been singing jazz since she was 10. (Bill King photos)

BY CARA STERN
CJN intern

One song was all it took to change Sophie Berkal-Sarbit's life.

The now 19-year-old jazz sensation was just 10 when she was preparing for an international music festival in New York. She sang folk music and was involved with musical theatre at the time, but on her father's recommendation, she performed Angel Eyes, made famous by jazz legend Ella Fitzgerald.

"I fell in love with the song and style and haven't gone back since," Berkal-Sarbit says.

She was 16 years old when she released her first album, The Gypsy in My Soul. Her followup album was released on Valentine's Day this year and is called Young and Foolish. Both albums contain Berkal-Sarbit's covers of famous jazz tracks.

She opened the Beaches International Jazz Festival in Toronto on July 16, where she performed an original song, Just Us. Songwriting, she says, is a skill she's just starting to get into.

She has performed at this festival every year since 2006 as part of the group the Real Divas, but this is the first time she got her own show – on opening night, no less.

"I'm really excited and honoured to have that," Berkal-Sarbit says.

She describes percussion as something she loves to incorporate into her shows. Not drums, she specifies, but other percussive instruments such as bongos.

"I'd love to learn that [percussion] myself, but I don't have any time," she says.

Her album pushes the envelope for a jazz CD, as she performs material that is not jazz – for example, Until by Sting and Grandma's Hands by Bill Withers – but transforms the songs into Latin jazz or ballads with different arrangements.

She has worked with jazz musicians who incorporate their own styles into music from other genres, and she says she is following their example. She also credits the approach to working with her producer, Bill King, who helped her arrange the tracks.

King says Berkal-Sarbit's voice is unique in that it truly connects with people, and he describes it as having a softness to it.

"She has a great rhythm to her singing," he says, attributing it to her exposure to jazz music while she was growing up and developing as a vocalist.

Being in the studio is probably her favourite thing to do, Berkal-Sarbit says, as she expertly describes the recording process, in which she decides on a theme and picks songs that flow into each other to create a cohesive album.

She records herself singing with the band initially and then redoes the vocals separately, she says.

She calls her grandfather, Rabbi Louis Berkal, her biggest inspiration. He was a rabbi and a cantor at the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue in Winnipeg, and released his first cantorial music CD at the age of 87.

"After I found out he was recording a CD, it made me want to record one, too," she said. "He really taught me never to give up and to always go for my dreams."

Her grandfather was born in a shtetl in Lithuania and moved to Canada when he was 13. He went to Grand Forks, N.D., to study to become a rabbi and a cantor. He met her grandmother there, and the two of them moved to Winnipeg.

Her grandfather was at Shaarey Zedek Synagogue for more than 50 years, and he died last year at 95 years old.

Winnipeg is Berkal-Sarbit's hometown, though she moved to Toronto last year to study at a makeup school, where she specialized in special effects and prosthetics, a hobby that she says has always been one of her interests.

But don't expect to see any of it at her shows.

"I think I would scare my audience," she says, laughing. Although her youth attracts a younger audience, jazz still generally appeals to an older crowd, Berkal-Sarbit says.

She says it's an interesting experience being a young jazz singer. While it was difficult to keep up with the workload in high school due to her career commitments, her friends were supportive, she says, adding that they all had tickets to her Beaches Jazz Festival performance.

It's also nice to be different, she says.

"I get to meet so many interesting people, and I always get different reactions from people when they find out I'm a jazz singer," she says.

In the future, Berkal-Sarbit says she wants to spend time writing more music with her producer.

"I love, love, love writing with [him], and we work really well together," she says.

King says her first original song, Just Us, turned out amazing, and he plans on helping her write more songs in the future.

"When she does it live in concert, it's the most successful song in the set," he says. "It doesn't sound like the jazz tunes. It sounds like her."

And if Berkal-Sarbit could collaborate with any other musicians, she would choose fellow Canadian jazz singers Holly Cole and Emilie-Claire Barlow.

Berkal-Sarbit is also hoping to tour in support of Young and Foolish, and has been thinking of basing the tour around Jewish community centres. She performed as part of the Real Divas at the Stars on Spadina concert at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre last April.

Although Judaism doesn't necessarily directly affect her music – and the Jewish aspect to her life was more prominent in Winnipeg than Toronto – many of her fans admired her grandfather, who does play a significant role in her music.

"I definitely talk a lot about my grandfather in my shows," she says.

Catch Berkal-Sarbit on tour when she performs at the Reservoir Lounge in Toronto on Sept. 28. For more information and tour dates, visit www.sophieberkalsarbit.com.

Netanyahu testifies at Gaza flotilla probe

By BARAK RAVID

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Israel Defence Forces (IDF) was responsible for deciding how to carry out the raid on a Gaza-bound flotilla of ships that ended in bloody clashes and the deaths of nine people, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told an Israeli commission of inquiry into the incident on Monday.

On May 31, Israeli navy commandos boarded the six ships that made up the flotilla, primarily activists from a Turkish organization, in an effort to prevent them from breaking through an Israeli marine blockade and reaching Gaza. The naval commandos who boarded the sixth ship, the Mavi Marmara, were met with violence and the nine were killed in the subsequent clashes.

The incident exacerbated tensions between Israel and Turkey, whose formerly friendly relations had been strained by a three-week IDF operation in the Gaza Strip in December 2008.

When asked by the head of the commission panel, retired chief justice Jacob Turkel, whether it was the IDF that decided the means by which to halt the flotilla, Netanyahu said, "Yes, that's standard procedure."

He said the IDF "has always decided on the ways in which to enforce the blockade [on Gaza] and has done its job well."

When asked how the decision on military action was received, Netanyahu said all of those involved "felt that the raid was a last resort, and the instructions were to conduct it with as little friction as possible.

"The IDF had looked into several options, as per my instructions, but also according to the instructions of the defence minister and the chief of staff," he said.

When panel member Amos Horev asked which options were considered, Netanyahu avoided the question, instead asking to discuss the matter behind closed doors.

When asked by Turkel who Netanyahu had put in charge of the operation during his trip to the United States a few days prior to the flotilla's arrival, the prime minister named Defence Minister Ehud Barak.

The prime minister also told the commission that the implications of a military operation were discussed during the May 26 meeting of senior cabinet members known as the forum of seven, but the discussion had centred more around the public relations fallout the operation might have.

"We didn't discuss the details of the operation, except for the media impact," Netanyahu said.

Regarding the information Israel had received prior to the flotilla's arrival, Netanyahu said Israel knew that the convoy had been organized by the IHH, a Turkish group that the defence minister had declared a terror organization more than a year earlier.

Netanyahu said it was obvious that "the flotilla organizers were interested in clashing with the IDF."

In opening remarks prior to the panel's questioning, Netanyahu praised the panel's mission saying that "no country or army examines itself more thoroughly than Israel and the IDF."

He reiterated the importance of Israel's naval blockade of Gaza: the measure is intended to stop shipments of arms from arriving at the Hamas-ruled strip.

"Hamas has transformed the Gaza Strip into a terrorist enclave sponsored by Iran," Netanyahu said, describing the "thousands of rockets and missiles" Iran supplies as well as the "military training and funding" Iran gives to Hamas.

> Was obvious that 'the flotilla organizers were interested in clashing with the IDF'

Netanyahu said he hoped the panel would emphasize in its report Hamas' violations of international law: "inciting to genocide, systematically and intentionally firing on civilians, using civilians as human shields, and preventing visits by the Red Cross to kidnapped IDF soldier, Gilad Schalit."

Tension running high in the Middle East

By AMOS HAREL and AVI ISSACHAROFF
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

The report last Wednesday of a failed assassination attempt on Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad fell on fertile media ground: One day after a deadly incident on the Israel-Lebanon border and two days after rockets hit Eilat and Aqaba, it seemed as if there wasn't a drama-free moment anywhere in the region.

A few hours later, Iran issued a denial: it wasn't an assassin's grenade, but a firecracker set off by one of the president's fans. The international media quickly lost interest. And at the minute, nothing seems to directly link these three incidents.

But there is a connection: tensions are rising in various parts of the Middle East, and each incident feeds off the others. For weeks, there has been a smell of smoke in the air: the new sanctions on Iran, the smuggling of advanced weaponry from Syria and Iran to Hezbollah, the probe into former Lebanese premier Rafik Hariri's murder. None of this necessarily means impending war, but emotions are running high.

The assassination report apparently came from an Iranian website of dubious credibility. But then, Iran's government isn't known for its credibility, either.

Something else was also reported from Iran last week: that it has acquired four sophisticated S-300 anti-aircraft missiles – or perhaps four batteries. The Russian-made missiles were reportedly obtained via Belarus.

Russia has been negotiating an S-300 sale with Iran for years, but its leadership is divided over whether to go through with the deal.

The missiles would hamper an aerial strike on Iran's nuclear facilities – which is why Washington and Jerusalem have been pressing Moscow not to deliver them. Western intelligence agencies suspect the Russians have already let the Iranians train on the missiles. Still, without any proof, the Aug. 4 report sounds dubious.

The Lebanese front was quiet on Aug. 4. Israel was encouraged by the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon's confirmation that its soldiers indeed never entered Lebanon while clearing brush on Aug. 3 – the action that sparked the Lebanese attack. The Lebanese Army, unhappy with the blow it suffered, also seems to be showing restraint, so the incident is unlikely to spark a wider conflict. But the diversion of attention from the Hariri murder probe to tension on the border benefited Hezbollah, which may well try to repeat the exercise.

As for the Eilat-Aqaba attack, both Israel and Egypt yesterday accused Hamas of carrying out the attack. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu even went as far as to send out a taped message to all three television stations in which he threatened to respond. In Egypt, the assumption that Hamas was to blame means more trouble. Cairo will find it even more difficult to broker a Fatah-Hamas reconciliation deal against the backdrop of one of the sides using Egyptian soil as a base for launching terror attacks.

And here is where it all ties back into Iran: the Egyptians, like the Jordanians, who were hit hardest in the Aug. 2 attack, are worried by Iran's growing penetration of the region, and especially its increasingly close ties with the Hamas leadership in Gaza. If Iran is really sweating over the new sanctions or worried over American officials' recent statements about the possibility of attacking it, the effects will be felt in our region, too.

In related developments, Avi Issacharoff wrote, the Arabic-language daily A Sharq al Awsat reported last Friday that Shin Bet security service director Yuval Diskin visited Egypt on Aug. 5 to discuss with officials there the recent deadly rocket fire at Israel and Jordan, believed to have been perpetrated from Egypt's Sinai peninsula.

The London-based A Sharq al Awsat reported that Egyptian authorities were hunting for two trucks believed to have been used to launch the Aug. 2 barrage from Sinai against Eilat and Akaba.

According to the report, Diskin met with senior Egyptian officials, including Egyptian intelligence chief Omar Suleiman. A day earlier, an Israeli delegation crossed the Taba border terminal between Eilat and Sinai to co-ordinate the search for the trucks.

It was also reported that the commander of the Hamas military wing in the Gaza's Rafah sector, Raed al Atar, sent the rocket squad that fired at Eilat and Aqaba.

The Palestinian news agency Ma'an reported that Egypt had declared a state of emergency across the Sinai peninsula as part of efforts to capture the rocket squad responsible for the rocket fire. A group of senior Egyptian security officials were deployed to the area to hunt for the cell, believed to still be in the Sinai, Ma'an reported.

Security officials told Ha'aretz that Palestinian intelligence indicates that Atar had ordered the launching without co-ordinating the move with Hamas' Gaza leadership, nor did he consult the commander of the Hamas' military wing in Gaza. However, according to Palestinian intelligence sources, Atar did coordinate the move with Hamas' Damascus-based leadership as well as Iranian intelligence figures, who were apparently the initiators of the operation.

Many consumers are under the impression that various Yogenfruz stores are kosher certified by the Kashruth Council of Canada. Some establishments may even display an unauthorized COR logo on their menu board. Yogenfruz is a national retailer of frozen yogurt products with outlets across Canada and the U.S. including a number of locations in the Toronto area.

The Kashruth Council of Canada does not presently certify any Yogenfruz stores.

Please note that the COR symbol which appears on any product being sold at these stores is only valid for products in their original factory-sealed packages. Once the packaging is opened, the kosher certification of that product is no longer valid.

The Kashruth Council of Canada reminds the consumer that this same principle applies to all non-certified stores selling ice cream, smoothies, and other similar products. As always, we suggest that consumers patronize establishments that are fully certified by a reliable kosher agency.

Yad Vashem condemns site

Since the 1979 Islamic revolution, Iran has not acknowledged Israel as a sovereign state and has even refrained from using the name Israel, instead referring to the Jewish state as the "Zionist regime."

The tensions reached a peak in 2005, when Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad started his anti-Israel tirades, calling the Holocaust a "fairy tale."

Iran hosted a Holocaust conference in Tehran in December 2006 that was attended by prominent anti-Semitic and neo-Nazi figures.

Ahmadinejad and other Iranian officials argue that while publishing insulting cartoons of the Muslim prophet Muhammad and offending more than one billion Muslims is considered by the West as press freedom, an investigation of a historic event is considered a crime.

Ahmadinejad also has said that even if the Nazi mass murder was true, those responsible for the crime should be punished, but that Israel should not be allowed to use it as a pretext for committing crimes against Palestinians.

Fran Sonshine, national chair of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, said in response to the new website that it's "unfortunate that in this day and age, when information is so easily accessed and available, that those engaged in a calculated campaign to discredit the history and pain of a group of people should find traction and a willing audience in certain segments of our society."

New Zealand allows shchitah until trial

JTA

SYDNEY, Australia — A New Zealand judge has allowed the kosher slaughter of animals to resume until the lawsuit filed by the Jewish community against the government comes to trial.

Justice Denis Clifford of the High Court in Wellington confirmed Monday that an agreement has been reached between the Jewish community and representatives of the Crown Law Office, which is representing Agriculture Minister David Carter.

"We are pleased to report that an agreement for interim relief from the terms of the present Commercial Slaughter Code was reached in court," a representative for the Jewish community announced Monday. "This enables the continued practice of shchitah in New Zealand until the matter comes to trial – likely to be in 2011."

New Zealand Jewish Council chairman Geoff Levy described the interim agreement as "a positive outcome" for the 7,000-member Jewish community.

"Every effort is being made to get chicken and local lamb back on the table as soon as possible," he said.

Lawyers for the Jewish community filed legal proceedings last week against the Minister of Agriculture seeking a restoration of the right to practice shchitah.

The legal showdown was prompted after Carter decided not to exempt kosher slaughter under the new Commercial Slaughter Code, which came into effect on May 28.

The National Animal Welfare Advisory Committee, set up by the Ministry of Agriculture, had recommended that shchitah be granted an exemption from the new code, but Carter ignored the advice, saying he did not believe any animal "should suffer in the slaughter process."

The trial pits the Jewish community against the Conservative government of John Key, whose mother, Ruth Lazar, was a Jewish refugee who escaped Austria on the eve of the Holocaust.

Shchitah has been carried out in New Zealand since 1843.

Israel's co-operation on UN inquiry signals tactical shift

By URIEL HEILMAN
JTA

The decision by Israel to participate in the United Nations probe of the Turkish flotilla incident marks a stark departure from Jerusalem's practice of opposing the world body's investigations of Israeli actions.

A year and a half ago, faced with a similar decision when the UN Human Rights Council decided to appoint a fact-finding mission to investigate Israel and Hamas' actions during the Gaza war, Israel boycotted the inquiry led by retired South African Judge Richard Goldstone. Israel would pay a heavy diplomatic price: the Goldstone report was harshly critical of Israel and generated months of negative publicity for the Jewish state.

A year later, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is taking the opposite course with the UN review panel looking into the May 31 flotilla confrontation. Nine Turks, including a dual Turkish-American citizen, were killed in the melee that ensued when Israeli commandos tried to board the Mavi Marmara, part of a flotilla of ships sailing for Gaza in a bid to break Israel's blockade of the strip. The incident drew worldwide condemnation of Israel.

"Israel has nothing to hide. The opposite is true," Netanyahu said in a statement on Aug. 2. "It is in the national interest of the State of Israel to ensure that the factual truth of the overall flotilla events comes to light throughout the world, and this is exactly the principle that we are advancing."

The UN inquiry out of New York will be led by a former prime minister of New Zealand, Geoffrey Palmer, and will include the outgoing president of Colombia, Alvaro Uribe, as well as a Turkish and an Israeli representative who have yet to be named. The panel is expected to begin its work Aug. 10 and submit a progress report in mid-September.

The decision to co-operate with the UN probe comes after two months of Israel's resisting calls for an international inquiry and signals a tactical shift for Israel when it comes to dealing with UN investigations of its actions. It marks the first time that Israel will be part of a UN committee looking into Israeli actions.

"This could be viewed as a new approach," confirmed a source at Israel's embassy in Washington.

UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon hailed it as an "unprecedented development."

Israel's decision to co-operate on the probe follows weeks of urging by the Obama administration, but it's also a way for Israel to mollify Turkey, which had threatened to sever diplomatic ties with the Jewish state unless Israel acceded to an international probe or apologized for the flotilla deaths.

Israelis demonstrate their anger at Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan in the wake of the Gaza flotilla incident on May 31. [Israel Sun photo]

Israel had launched its own investigations of the incident. An Israel Defence Forces investigation found intelligence failures in the IDF's preparations for stopping the flotilla but no fault with the soldiers' actions, and a government committee probe is still ongoing. Turkey, however, was not satisfied.

Concerned about the rupture between Turkey and Israel over the incident and its long-term implications for the future of the Middle East, the Obama administration was keen on finding a way for a probe that would satisfy both Turkey's demands for an international inquiry and Israel's concerns about bias against it. The new probe was the result of negotiations with Israel and Turkey.

"For the past two months, I have engaged in intensive consultation with the leaders of Israel and Turkey on the setting up of a panel of inquiry on the flotilla incident of 31 May," the UN secretary general said in a statement on Aug. 2. Ban said he hoped the inquiry would "impact positively on the relationship between Turkey and Israel as well as the overall situation in the Middle East."

After the Goldstone report was issued a year ago with findings that tarnished Israel's international image, some in Israel argued that it had been a mistake to boycott the inquiry. Rather, they said, Israel should have co-operated in a bid to ensure the least damaging report possible. With Israel now choosing co-operation over rejection on the new flotilla probe, some in Israel are cautioning against comparisons between the two.

In the Goldstone case, they note, the original mandate for the inquiry prejudged Israel as guilty and came from the Geneva-based UN Human Rights Council, which has a record of singling out Israel for opprobrium while ignoring human rights violators around the world. In the flotilla case, the probe will be conducted under the aegis of the UN secretary general, who is seen as mindful of Israeli concerns.

"You have to make a distinction between the Human Rights Council, which is partisan and has an anti-Israel obsession, and between the secretary general, Ban Ki-moon, who we hold in the highest esteem," a senior Israeli official told JTA on condition of anonymity. "After ongoing discussion with the secretary general, we are convinced that what he is proposing is credible and objective. I wouldn't apply either of those two adjectives to the Human Rights Council, which is a travesty."

For its part, the UN Human Rights Council voted just two days after the flotilla raid to establish its own inquiry into the incident, but Israel is not co-operating with that probe. The United States, among others, voted against it.

In welcoming the new probe, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, Susan Rice, implied that she hoped it would cancel out the Human Rights Council inquiry.

"The United States expects that the panel will operate in a transparent and credible manner, and that its work will be the primary method for the international community to review the incident, obviating the need for any overlapping international inquiries," Rice said.

"That was an unmistakably derogatory reference to the UN Human Rights Council probe," observed Hillel Neuer, the executive director of UN Watch, a Geneva-based pro-Israel watchdog organization. "A shadow has been cast on the UN Human Rights Council probe, and it was done so expressly."

Neither the UN probe in New York nor the one being carried out in Geneva by the Human Rights Council will have legally binding consequences. In theory, a probe's findings could prompt the UN Security Council to take action, but given the veto power the United States exercises in that body, such a scenario appears unlikely.

Israel Briefs

Hamas blamed for rockets

Hamas is responsible for the rockets fired at Israel and Jordan, and Israel is planning to retaliate, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said. In a speech broadcast last Wednesday on Israeli TV, Netanyahu referred to three recent attacks on Israel: from Gaza on Ashkelon, from Sinai on Eilat, and from the Lebanese army on Israeli troops. "I want to make very clear to Hamas and to the Lebanese government that we view them as responsible for the violent provocation against us," he said. "Don't test our determination to protect our citizens. Israel will retaliate for every assault." Netanyahu condemned Hamas for using Egyptian soil to launch an Aug. 2 rocket attack on Israel, which struck Eilat and Aqaba in Jordan. One person was killed in the Aqaba attack. "Whoever shoots at Israeli citizens, and it doesn't matter from where, we will find them and hit them hard," Netanyahu said. Earlier in the day, an Egyptian official was quoted by an official state news agency as saying that the Aug. 2 attack was launched from the Sinai by Hamas.

Man arrested for organ trafficking

An Israeli man was arrested for allegedly running a human organ trafficking network in Ukraine, Army Radio reported. The Israeli, whose name wasn't revealed, was arrested by Ukrainian police along with 12 other people. The network reportedly operated for more than three years and searched for donors via the Internet. Most were young women who agreed to sell a kidney for $10,000. The organs were then allegedly transferred to Israelis in need of a transplant, which cost more than $200,000, the head of the Ukrainian organization for fighting human trafficking said after the arrests. Ukrainian police estimate the network made $40 million. The facility where the alleged operations for extracting kidneys took place denied the allegations.

Train, car collision leaves seven dead

Seven members of a single family were killed last Thursday when a train collided with a minivan near the southern Israeli city of Kiryat Gat. In a grim scene, workers from the haredi rescue-and-recovery organization ZAKA recognized one of the dead as their own Aryeh Bernstein, 43, a ZAKA volunteer. He and his wife, Rivki, and four of their children – daughter Mali Gotstein, who was pregnant at the time, Yohanan, Chaya and Moti Bernstein– were killed in the crash. Mordechai Aharon Gotstein, an infant, also died. Thousands turned out last Friday for their funerals. Initial investigations found the minivan's driver drove through a barrier and stopped on the tracks. All of those killed were in the minivan.

Oraynu – A Sunday School Families Love!

"My son really looks forward to Sunday mornings." This comment is typical of the parents whose children attend Oraynu. We teach Jewish history and culture from a Humanistic perspective, focusing on values.

Children are truly engaged at Oraynu and learn through a variety of meaningful experiential approaches.

The children "do" and "act" through lively, rich participatory discussions, Family Education events, tzedakah projects, music, Hebrew, crafts and community performances at festivals. Our family holiday celebrations are warm and full of fun.

"My daughter feels good about being Jewish."

Building a Jewish identity at Oraynu is enjoyable as the children experience positive affirmations of their Jewishness in every class.

"The B'nai Mitzvah blew me away. I was so moved by the ceremony."

Imagine a B'nai Mitzvah program where students choose their own projects, based on modern Jewish heroes, ancient sages, humour, authors, anti-semitism, etc. Individual ceremonies are offered; Torah reading is optional.

If your family is secular and looking for a school that feels right, perhaps you belong at Oraynu. Intercultural families are very welcome.

Considering your Child's Jewish Education?

If you are a secular or cultural Jew, agnostic or intermarried, Oraynu Children's School is the place for your family!

Acclaimed curriculum focuses on Jewish history, culture and values from secular humanistic perspective

Need Help with the University Application Process?

Approaching application deadlines. Personal statements. Preparing for interviews. Distinguishing yourself from the crowd. It can all seem overwhelming.

It is increasingly difficult to gain admission to many undergraduate and professional programs including medicine, law, business and dentistry, given the dramatic rise in applications for a limited number of positions. Making the Grade after High School: College, University and Beyond

Nine years ago, after a long career as a university teacher and advisor, Judy Libman was convinced that high school and post-secondary students needed more individualized assistance. Soon after winning York University's highest teaching award, she founded Ambitions Educational Consulting, a unique counselling service for students and parents. Since then, she has worked with over 500 students on their way to academic success.

Judy Libman advises each student as a unique individual: no "one-size-fits-all" answers here. For high school students, Libman identifies university or college programs that will provide the best match for a student's interests, goals and learning style. Her familiarity with programs in Ontario and across Canada gives students a wide range of choices.

Libman is also well-known for her expert counseling in US college admissions. She serves as a consultant for US college admissions at several top Toronto private schools.

For students already in university, Libman provides advising on career options, graduate programs, and professional school admissions. Her longtime specialty is the medical school admissions process, with an admirable track record of success.

Judy Libman also counsels students who have had learning difficulties or an unexpected academic setback and need help finding their way back to success. As a former university administrator, she knows how to work with both students and institutions to overcome barriers.

TORONTO ARTISTS NAOMI FREUDMANN AND TAMAR EHRLICH FEATURED IN OAKVILLE ART SHOW

The Joshua Creek Heritage Art Centre of Oakville features the works of Toronto artists Naomi Freudmann and Tamar Ehrlich in an exhibition titled In Harmony, which opens Aug. 15 and remains on view until Sept.12.

Freudmann was born in Tel Aviv and studied art with teachers in Johannesburg, London and Toronto, where she worked extensively in raku and sculpture at the Koffler Centre of the Arts. In 1993, Emunah Women of Canada commissioned her to create a sculpture honouring the Danish people for their humanitarian rescue efforts of Danish Jews during the Shoah. The sculpture was presented to the Danish government at a special ceremony.

Many of Freudmann's sculptures are held in private collections in Canada, United States and Israel. The exhibition features numerous of her pieces in alabaster, bronze and raku.

Ehrlich, who was born in Poland, survived the Holocaust in hiding with her parents, and was educated in Germany, Israel, France and England. The former owner of an architectural ceramic company, Ehrlich has done commissioned work for the Royal Ontario Museum, Osgoode Hall's judge's chambers, Sears and many professional offices in Toronto. She has had several shows of her paintings at the Koffler Gallery and other galleries. In the current show, Ehrlich's "Travelog" paintings document her memories of trips to many countries.

With seven people coming from seven different backgrounds, it's only natural that Gypsophilia can meld so many different styles of music.

The jazzy Halifax band takes different genres, including gypsy jazz, klezmer, funk, indie and reggae, and synthesizes them to create a unique sound.

For example, double bassist Adam Fine brings a lot of the klezmer and Jewish aspects to Gypsophilia's material. The band's repertoire even includes a song called Jewish Dance Party, which has a simchah flavour.

"It started one Sunday morning when I sat down and wrote some Jewish music," Fine said. "I decided I'd take all the Jewish clichés that I knew and put it into one song."

Fine is originally from Toronto, though his mother came from Yarmouth, N.S.

"When I mentioned I wanted to move to Halifax, both her and my dad said, 'What the hell do you want to move back there for?'" he says. But he has found the beauty of living in a small city.

"It's a much smaller scene. You can get to know everybody who's playing here," he says. "I like how social it is. You walk into people you know everywhere."

But he describes the Halifax Jewish community as quite small, with around 1,500 people.

"I have to go home to get deli," Fine says, laughing.

One of the best things about Halifax is the lack of competition, he says.

"If I started a klezmer band in Toronto, there are already 50 really great klezmer bands you're competing with, and here there are only one or two," he says.

His grandfather initially introduced him to klezmer music when he was in high school, though Fine says some of the klezmer bands he's heard, such as Masada, led by American saxophonist and composer John Zorn, are a bit too noisy and "avant-garde" for his taste.

It was also his grandfather and father, both of whom were trumpet players, who inspired him to request to play trumpet in his Grade 4 concert band. Unfortunately, the teacher thought he would make a better French horn player.

And for the next five years, he was stuck with the instrument.

"These days I love the sound of the French horn, but only when it is played by other people," Fine says.

Then, about 14 years ago, he took up the electric bass, which he describes as the first instrument he ever liked to play.

However, two years later, another bass player advised him to switch to the double bass if he wanted to maintain a career in the jazz scene. This transition was a bit difficult due to the physical-strength requirements for pushing down the strings, but it got easier over time, he says.

Fine is keeping busy, with seven side projects, including one called Der Heisser, which is purely klezmer music.

Gypsophilia's music is often described as bridging the worlds of jazz and indie rock, drawing both the regular jazz crowd as well as indie hipsters to the shows, which have been described as highly energetic and almost like a party.

It's a mix of danceable music and listening music, sometimes both in the same night, Fine says, adding that the band has opened for hard rock and punk bands in the past. The music, while clearly in the jazz genre, is less improvised than a typical jazz band, which might make it a bit more accessible.

"Some of the stuff is rhythmic and driving," he says, "and other stuff is very dynamic and a little more developmental."

CHAT grad's kabuki-inspired film premières at Slamdance

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Sol Friedman's short film, Junko's Shamisen, has come a long way since its completion last summer.

"We've been invited to 32 festivals on five continents in the first six months," says the Toronto-born filmmaker of his film, a narrative inspired by kabuki, traditional Japanese opera. "I'm feeling pretty good about that number."

In Junko's Shamisen, a young Japanese orphan and her mystical friend exact poetic justice on a malevolent samurai lord.

The 10-minute short had its world première in January at the prestigious Slamdance Film Festival, the indie fest that runs in conjunction with the Sundance Film Festival in Park City, Utah. The film has since been shown at several international festivals – in Seattle, in Santa Barbara, Calif., at the South by Southwest in Austin, Texas, and the Anima Mundi in Brazil.

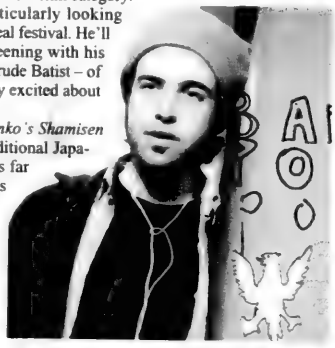
On Aug. 15, Junko's Shamisen makes its Toronto debut, screening at 7 p.m. at the Bloor Street Cinema, 506 Bloor St. W., as part of Toronto After Dark, a festival showcasing sci-fi and fantasy films.

Friedman, 28, is then off to the Montreal International Film Festival. In September, he heads to Seoul, where he's been short-listed for the Opus Prize in the short-film category.

He says he's particularly looking forward to the Montreal festival. He'll be attending the screening with his Bubbie Gertie – Gertrude Batist – of Montreal. "She's very excited about it and so am I."

The success of Junko's Shamisen – a shamisen is a traditional Japanese instrument – has far exceeded Friedman's expectations. "It has been much better received than what I was hoping for.

"At Slamdance, I got a great write-up, and that generated a lot of interest… The Baltimore festival invited me to be part of their opening night program. I didn't even apply there."



Sol Friedman

So how does a Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) graduate end up doing a film rooted in kabuki?

After finishing high school, Friedman attended the Ontario College of Art and Design, which he acknowledges was not a typical route.

"There was a disproportionate number of students in my class (at CHAT) who went into creative fields," he says. "We're all still friends."

Friedman, the second eldest of four children, says his family supported his artistic endeavours, pointing out that his father, George, and older brother, Gabriel, pursued creative careers. They're both architects.

Friedman's foray into film was quite accidental, he recounts. "I was helping a friend with his film, and in the course of helping out, I got into animation.

"I quickly picked up the skills. I did some music videos for a couple of local artists. They were primarily animated, with some live action."

In Junko's Shamisen, he made the transition from animation to live action. "The film focuses on storytelling. It's mainly live action."

Friedman's interest in Japanese culture stems from his training in shiatsu massage. In 2001, he visited Japan for a couple of weeks. "The culture resonated with me. It's a modern society that still actively engages its traditional customs."

He visited Japan again in 2006, and in 2008, he spent five weeks there, when he exhibited drawings in a group art show.

On that last visit he had a chance to see kabuki. He says he was fascinated by the pacing of the performance, which is punctuated by lulls in the action. "The pauses are very dramatic. The performers hold their pose, and the audience gets excited during those pauses."

When Friedman returned home, he wrote a script inspired by kabuki. He says he feels "privileged being a Canadian artist" because so much of the arts are supported by the government. He received funding from the Canada Council for the Arts, the Ontario Arts Council and Bravo! Fact.

He completed the script for Junko's Shamisen in 2008, and then he donned his director-producer hat. "I wrote, directed, animated and produced the film. There were also five other people on the project."

The film was shot in May 2009 and was completed in a record four months, he says, adding that his animation background enabled him to do the post-production special effects at a minimal cost. "Normally, that is very expensive."

As for future plans, Friedman says he has several projects in development, but with another 60 festivals worldwide to consider, most of his energy is going into marketing Junko's Shamisen.

"I'm learning a lot about the industry by promoting the film, but I'd like to get into my next project.

"I'm looking forward to focusing on the creative, rather than the business side of filmmaking."

Hamilton native returns for Forbidden Music

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to the CJN

Misha Aster

The concert Forbidden Music Revealed, part of the Brott Summer Music Festival, will feature music that was banned by wartime dictators Adolf Hitler and Josef Stalin.

The concert will be performed at Hamilton's Adas Israel Synagogue on Aug. 15 by soprano Sharon Azrieli and pianist Shoshana Telner. Misha Aster, author of The Reich's Orchestra: the Berlin Philharmonic 1933-45 will narrate the script, sharing details on composers and musicians affected by the politics of Nazi Germany.

"This is an opportunity to hear repertoire that's seldom performed," said the Hamilton-born Aster on the phone from his home in Berlin. "In its context, the music comes across in a very accessible fashion."

The program chosen by Aster and festival artistic director Boris Brott includes selections from Kurt Weill, Felix Mendelssohn, Arnold Schoenberg, Paul Hindemith, Alban Berg and songs from Rachmaninoff.

During the Nazi era, contemporary Jewish composers like Czech Erwin Schulhoff, a communist active in Berlin, were affected.

"Schulhoff was a great composer of the early 20th century. A friend of Weill, Stravinsky and Ravel, his music is remarkably original and a vivid reflection of that time. He had a tragic end as he died in a concentration camp," said Aster, who moved to Berlin in 2006.

"The Czech composers, Pavel Haas and Viktor Ullmann also died in concentration camps. They were tied into the revolution taking place in classical music, which had to do with breaking down boundaries between musical genres."

Other ground-breaking composers like Arnold Schoenberg left Germany because of Nazi restrictions.

"Schoenberg's music represents different aspects of musical innovations, and for various reasons, was deemed suspect," Aster said. "Weill – who was also of Jewish descent and whose music incorporated many influences from a variety of the musical traditions – he, like Schoenberg, emigrated."

The Nazis also targeted the music of composers of the past, such as Felix Mendelssohn (1809-1847).

"Most obviously and most curiously, Mendelssohn was persecuted. He was in no particular sense a professed Jew, but there have been all kinds of attempts to analyze his music and try to distil any kind of Jewish elements," Aster said.

"Mendelssohn was extremely significant in the revival of earlier German musical forms, but on account of his grandfather, a theologian and philosopher leading the Reform Judaism Movement in Germany in the 18th century, his music was proscribed by the Nazis. Because of this paradox, we wanted to include his music in Hamilton on Aug. 15."

The Brott concert program also includes five songs from Srul Irving Glick's We are children just the same, a song cycle based on poems from Vedem, the underground magazine written by teenage boys in the Terezin concentration camp.

"Glick's song cycle is a contemporary reflection on the fate of composers in Terezin – that's what makes it so moving. There's a strong empathetic connection between Glick's music and the situation in which Ullmann, for example, had lived for almost four years," Aster remarked.

"I hope people will be moved by the music and the artistic expression behind it, and go away feeling they've learned something," he said.

A kosher traditional high tea will be served at intermission.

Sunday, Aug. 15, 3 p.m. at Adas Israel Synagogue, 125 Cline Ave. S., Hamilton. Tickets: www.brottmusic.com or 1-888-475-9377 or 905-525-SONG (7664). $40, $35 seniors & students.

There will be waltzes

He draws inspiration from many different places, with one of his songs incorporating a rugby chant from southern France. He said he was at a rugby game, heard the chant, wrote down the music – exemplifying an obviously great ear for music – and brought it to his bandmates – keyboardist Sageev Oore, guitarist Ross Burns, trumpet player Matt Myer, guitarists Nick Wilkinson and Alec Frith and violinist Gina Burgess.

Gypsophilia's latest album is called Sa-Ba-Da-OW! and refers to the ways musicians talk when they're trying to explain a part of the music.

For example, he might say he's referring to the sa-ba-da-ow part, and the other musicians would know exactly which part he means.

The album has garnered attention from the East Coast Music Association, which gave Gypsophilia a Jazz Recording of the Year award for Sa-Ba-Da-OW!

Right now, the band is working on material for a followup album, which is set for recording in Montreal in December and for a 2011 release.

Although the musicians haven't determined which direction the album will go, one thing is sure: there will be waltzes.

"I've got a bit of a curse," Fine says, laughing. "That's all I can write these days."

Gypsophilia will play a few shows in the Maritimes in August and September. Visit www.gypsophilia.org and www.adamfine.ca for more information.

Graceland: a shrine to an American icon

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

MEMPHIS, Tenn. — As our bus pulled up to Graceland, the gated estate where the mega rock 'n' roll star Elvis Aaron Presley lived until his untimely death 33 years ago this week, a tantalizing line from one of his songs, emanating from a hidden loudspeaker in the trees or bushes, wafted serenely across the expansive, oak-shaded lawn.

"Welcome to my world," Elvis crooned in velvety tones. "Won't you come on in."

It was, I admit, a great way to begin a tour of Graceland, the shrine to the late, lamented entertainer and cultural icon whose all-too-brief life is showcased through mementos, artifacts, photographs, clothes, awards, cars, jets, videos and recordings.

Open to the public since 1982, and declared a National Historic Landmark four years ago, Graceland (at 3734 Elvis Presley Blvd.) is supposedly the second most visited private residence in the United States, surpassed only by the White House in Washington, D.C.

Elvis, who was allegedly of partial Jewish ancestry, purchased the American colonial-style mansion, supported by four white columns and clad in gray limestone, in 1957, just several years after he recorded his first record in Memphis. He bought it from a commercial printer for the then princely sum of $100,000 and proceeded to refurbish it, adding a swimming pool and a racquetball court, among other improvements.

He shared Graceland with his parents, Vernon and Gladys, to whom he was close, and his wife, Priscilla.

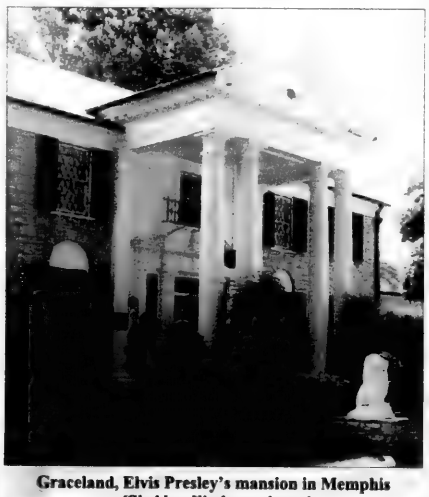
Graceland is surprisingly modest in appearance. Neither ostentatious nor overpowering, it resembles the home of a prosperous accountant or dentist, almost always exuding a distinct bourgeois air of respectability.

Mean-spirited critics, such as Albert Goldman, have compared the furnishings to those of a bordello in New Orleans' French Quarter.

The interior of the first floor – the second storey is strictly off limits to visitors in the interests of family privacy– is a melange of wildly clashing styles. Being unconventional, Elvis was not afraid to mix the old with the new.

In the spirit of his breakthrough hits, which blended blues, country and gospel music, the pelvis-swivelling Elvis, who shocked and mesmerized a nation, blazed his own trail when it came to décor and furniture.

The living room is a mish-mash of stained glass windows, white wall-to-wall carpeting and white sofas, set off by portraits of the Presley clan, which hailed from nearby Mississippi. Elvis' adjacent bedroom, lit by chandeliers, his favourite form of lighting, is dominated by his king-size bed, which is draped with a purple cover.



Graceland, Elvis Presley's mansion in Memphis

The rather modest dining room is filled with an expensive-looking table, six chairs and two cabinets crammed with silverware. The black marble floor is flecked with white flourishes.

The kitchen is very 1950s, an amalgam of stodgy brown cabinets, exotic Chinese lanterns and carpeted floors.

Elvis' wood-panelled jungle room is covered with an unsightly green carpet, adorned with ornate furniture and outfitted with an incongruous indoor waterfall. The television room, painted in yellow and blue hues and containing bright blues couches, has three TVs – Elvis loved watching newscasts, sports events and comedies – and his collection of country, rock and classical albums.

The pool room, let's face it, is simply hideous, the space occupied by upholstered chairs and the ceiling made from thick, suffocating fabric.

Vernon's utilitarian room, next to Elvis' horse farm, is plastered with photographs of his famous son. Elvis, in a retro TV recording, expounds on love and romance.

The trophy room, probably the heart and soul of Graceland, displays his first gold record, Heartbreak Hotel, and all his other hits, from Hound Dog and Love Me Tender to Are You Lonesome Tonight? and Don't Be Cruel, some of which were written by the Jewish songwriters Mike Stoller and Jerry Lieber.

On display, too, are his flamboyant stage outfits– including his gold lame suit – newspaper clippings documenting both his cultural subversiveness and his all-American wholesomeness, and a pin with the following inscription: "Oy Gevalt Elvis."

The racquetball court has been converted into a wall–to-wall and floor-to-ceiling mecca of his framed records, which dazzle in the light. The piano Elvis played the day before his death on Aug. 16, 1977, is an adjoining room.

The Sincerely Elvis museum pays tribute to his forgettable roles in such Hollywood movies as Jailhouse Rock and Loving You. The Elvis Lives exhibit brims with Elvis biographies, ranging from The Unmasking of Elvis Presley by Peter Guralnik to Faux Elvis by Pat Cook. On a touch-screen around the corner, you can call up and listen to his greatest songs.

Although Elvis was an astute entrepreneur, always taking care of business, he was hardly a penny pincher. In the 1970s, he purchased two airplanes, a decommissioned 96-seat jet airliner – which he upgraded with all the bells and whistles and christened the Lisa Marie after his beloved daughter – and a smaller aircraft, Hound Dog 11, which was reserved for his handlers.

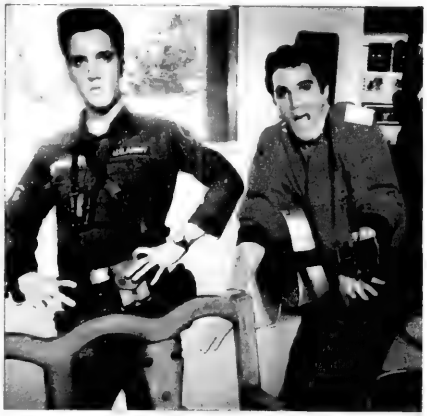
The car museum is equally indicative of his propensity for spending money on baubles. Elvis amassed quite a collection of vehicles, from a white Silver Cloud Rolls Royce and a purple Ferrari to a sporty red MG and a pink Cadillac.

Elvis, his parents and grandmother are buried in the Meditation Gardens, which faces a reflecting pool. Engraved on his gravestone are fulsome tributes – "A living legend" and "A precious gift from God."

Elvis' early years as a pioneering rock 'n' roller are chronicled at Sun Studio (706 Union Ave. in downtown Memphis), formerly known as Sun Records. There he recorded his first song, My Happiness, in honour of his mother's birthday, and far more importantly, his first commercial record, That's All Right, for the promoter Sam Phillips, in 1954.

Elvis' terrific performance of Shake, Rattle and Roll, which he delivered with gusto in his first national TV appearance in 1956, is resurrected in a riveting video.

At the official Elvis Presley Birthplace in Tupelo, Miss., a fairly short drive from Memphis, you can walk through the 450-square-foot, two-room shotgun shack where he was born in 1935. Elvis, who bought his first guitar in Tupelo, lived here until he was 13 years old.



Elvis in typical form

There is no mention of the fact that Elvis had Jewish connections. Stuart Rockoff, a historian at the Goldring Woldenberg Institute of Southern Jewish Life in Jackson, Miss., filled in the gaps.

Elvis' great-great-grandmother, Nancy Burdine, was apparently Jewish. In Memphis, Elvis lived downstairs from an Orthodox rabbi. As a performer, he bought clothes from a Jewish clothier in Memphis, Lansky's. On tours, he usually wore a medallion with various religious symbols, including a Star of David. Asked why he wore it, he is said to have replied, "I don't want to miss out on heaven on a technicality."

Elvis, it seems, was always taking care of business.

A biography of Hollywood's 'boy wonder'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The legendary Hollywood movie producer Irving Grant Thalberg was known as the Boy Wonder.

At the age of 21 and 24, he was respectively in charge of production at Universal Studios and Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, creating classics such as Ben-Hur, Tarzan the Ape Man, Grand Hotel, Mutiny on the Bounty and The Good Earth and making stars out of Clark Gable, Lon Chaney, Greta Garbo, Joan Crawford, Jean Harlow and Norma Shearer, his Montreal-born wife.

Thalberg, who died tragically young in 1936, was nothing if not an innovator. He introduced story conferences, extensive remakes and sneak previews, co-authored the production code under which films were made and established the producer rather than the director as the ultimate authority on the set.

Mark A. Vieira's thorough biography, Irving Thalberg: Boy Wonder to Producer Prince, published by the University of California Press, establishes Thalberg as a universally respected Hollywood icon.

Vieira, a Hollywood historian whose previous works include Greta Garbo: A Cinematic Legacy, scoured unpublished production files and correspondence to write this wide-ranging book.

His underlying theme is that Thalberg – born in Brooklyn, N.Y. in 1899 to German-Jewish immigrants – lived on borrowed time. Diagnosed at birth with a congenital heart defect, he was a "blue baby," a sickly child who, doctors declared, might live to 20, or if he was lucky, to 30. In 1916, he came down with rheumatic fever, spending a year in bed in recovery.

Despite his poor health, he drove himself relentlessly, perhaps aware that the clock was ticking. As a studio executive, he pushed himself to the limit, working 16 hours a day on 40 films per season without much sleep.

Thalberg's entry into the fledgling industry was unplanned. While on vacation at his grandmother's cottage in Long Island, the quiet and reserved Thalberg introduced himself to Carl Laemmle, the founder of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company.

Laemmle, impressed by his intelligence, eventually hired him as his $60 per week personal assistant. Laemmle, based in New York City, posted him to Los Angeles, the studio's production site. "I need someone to keep an eye on things for me," he explained.

By 1920, Thalberg was general manager, earning $450 a week supervising films such as Foolish Wives and The Hunchback of Notre Dame.

As Vieira suggests, he projected an an authoritative yet brittle demeanour. The novelist Edna Ferber described him as "a wisp of a boy, so slight as to appear actually frail." The screenwriter Lenore Coffee, struck by his "strikingly Italianate face," thought he had "a princely air." The actor and matinée idol Conrad Nagel recalled that Thalberg spoke softly and "casts a spell on you."

Thalberg left Universal in 1924 for Louis B. Mayer Productions, which shortly afterward was folded into Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, or MGM.

Within three years, Vieira says, MGM was the most lucrative studio in Hollywood and Thalberg was pulling in $4,000 a week.

Thalberg's films, notably The Big Parade, were tasteful yet populistic. Well-written and stirringly directed, they showcased the talents of big-name actors such as Mae Murray, Lillian Gish, Marion Davies, Buster Keaton, Ramon Navarro and John Gilbert.

Thalberg's modus operandi never varied. Writers working simultaneously would create a script. Story conferences distilled the best of each draft. Previews tested the film's effectiveness.

If a preview was unfavourable, he and the writer would devise new scenes. "You'd preview two, three, four times until you got it right," Vieira quotes an employee as saying.

"Movies aren't made," said Thalberg. "They're re-made."

In light of Thalberg's track record, competing studios adopted his methods.

Likewise, Thalberg groomed stars by trial and error. A promising but newly recruited actor would be assigned a variety of roles until fan mail indicated the right match. Thalberg would then put the actor in a similar role, hoping for a hit. If he succeeded, Thalberg would try to find a formula for continuing success.

Irving Thalberg and his new bride, Norma Shearer, shortly after their marriage in 1927.

This laborious process paid dividends, with MGM producing the largest stable of stars in Hollywood.

Yet, as Vieira reminds a reader, Thalberg's bent for visionary thinking did not always manifest itself, as when he dismissed the importance of The Jazz Singer, the first talkie, starring Al Jolson. "Novelty is always welcome," he said, "but talking pictures are just a passing fad."

Nor did he believe that colour photography would catch on. To be fair, he was not the only Hollywood mogul who hewed to this short-sighted appraisal. Louis Mayer was similarly unimpressed.

Not surprisingly, Vieira spills considerable ink tracing the trajectory of Thalberg's romance with Shearer, whom he married in 1927 and with whom he had two children.

Shearer, who was promoted as "the girl next door" by publicists, achieved stardom in 1930 when she won the Academy Award for her role in The Divorcee. According to Vieira, Thalberg guided her career, giving her first call on novels and plays to be adapted for the screen. In his judgment, they "complemented each other perfectly" and were very much in love.

Although Thalberg was a workaholic, demanding as much of himself as of others, he worried about his health, constantly watching for signs of illness, keeping apples on his desk and carrying nitroglycerine pills in his vest pocket in case he felt chest pains.

When he died of pneumonia, at 37, he was working on the pre-production of two films, A Day at the Races, which would feature the Marx brothers, and Marie Antoinette, which would star Shearer and earn her a sixth Academy Award nomination.

Thalberg's funeral, held at Wilshire Boulevard Temple, attracted a crowd of about 8,000. The service itself was attended by Hollywood royalty, from David Selznick, Lionel Barrymore and Gary Cooper to Charles Chaplin, Walt Disney and Gloria Swanson.

The last film Thalberg worked on, The Good Earth, which was voted one of the year's top 10 by the New York Times, was a money-loser.

But Thalberg's aura never faded. A year after his untimely death, the Motion Picture Academy announced that the Irving G. Thalberg Memorial Award would be periodically given to producers for a body of work reflecting a consistently high standard. Among the winners have been Steven Spielberg, Clint Eastwood and Norman Jewison.

As for Shearer, her career suffered from Thalberg's absence, Vieira notes. She remarried and left Hollywood, never to return.

Looking for gloves in all the right places

Canadian oleh seeks to nurture love of softball among Israelis

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Corey Vyner wants your bats, gloves, softballs and baseballs.

The 47-year-old Toronto salesman and softball enthusiast is making aliyah with his wife at the end of the month to teach baseball and softball to children in the Menashe region, just north of Netanya.

Vyner has been licensed as a softball coach by Israel's Wingate Institute for Physical Education and Sport.

A veteran of the Canadian Maccabi softball team – he's played in three Maccabiah Games – Vyner told The CJN last week that his passion for softball has led him back to Israel, where he hopes to instruct a new generation of players.

"It's all about grassroots education of a wonderful sport," he said.

Last week, Vyner launched a website, www.softballis.org, dedicated to helping Israeli children learn the sport and, perhaps more importantly, to ask for donations of used balls, gloves, bats or any other baseball-related equipment, to be sent along to Israel for use by children there.

His "Israel Ball and Glove donation drive" ends Aug. 21.

"We have 2-1/2 weeks to obtain as many softball items as we can," he said. "In the next couple of days, we will be announcing the locations of our drop-off depots in both Toronto and Thornhill. All donated items, whether new or used, will be sent in a container to Israel on a ship departing on Aug. 25."

According to the website, the Menashe Softball Project aims to "help develop the sport of softball through various after school programs at the grassroots level. Nurture the sport by including softball as part of a weekly gym class [and] convert eight local soccer fields into softball diamonds," the site states.

Corey Vyner reaches first base against the United States in the Maccabiah softball tourney last year.

Additionally, Vyner said he's on a mission to put Israel on the world softball map.

"I am also part of a group called 'Friends of the Field.' In conjunction with JNF USA, we are looking to build Israel's first professional softball and baseball complex. This state-of-the-art facility will be home to future Maccabi softball events. More importantly, this new stadium will help Israel's four national teams – three softball, one baseball – become much better. They would now have a home to practise and play in."

Vyner said that at last year's Maccabiah Games in Israel, he and fellow administrators of the Israeli, U.S. and Canadian teams were dismayed to learn that Israel had no national field for the sport. Instead, it relied on a field owned by the Baptist Village in Petah Tikva for its games.

He said problems obtaining permits and prohibitive costs to rent the field have caused consternation for Israeli players and the Israel Softball Association (ISA) for years.

After discussions with Ami Baran, the association's executive director, Vyner said he was convinced to make the move to Israel to lend his knowledge to the country's burgeoning softball community.

Vyner will be employed by the ISA as its premier import coach from North America.

Baran, he said, wants to raise the profile of the ISA and eventually construct a national field that will be ready for the 2013 Maccabiah Games.

While the ISA is looking for a firm agreement for land on which to build the stadium – they're eyeing Menashe, Vyner said – JNF has jumped on board to lend its influence and advice on the matter.

"JNF USA has been to the Menashe area and has met with the regional councillors. Has the JNF signed on the dotted line? The answer is no. Are they very interested in seeing this project take place? Yes. They have mentioned to Baran that they would be interested in putting $100,000 toward the project," Vyner said, adding that JNF Canada had indicated to him that it might also put up some money.

Asked whether JNF Canada is involved in the project, national president Frank A. Wilson said his organization is not part of it.

In an ISA statement after last year's Maccabiah Games, Baran said it was his "dream" to have a softball stadium built in Israel.

He said that thanks to the philanthropists in Friends of the Field, Israel now has "the chance to move our program forward. The expansion of the Maccabiah Games to include women's open, men's open, youth and men's senior's competitions, and the growth of the Israel Softball Association highlight the need for Israel to have a first-class facility for softball and baseball, for kids from around the Jewish world."

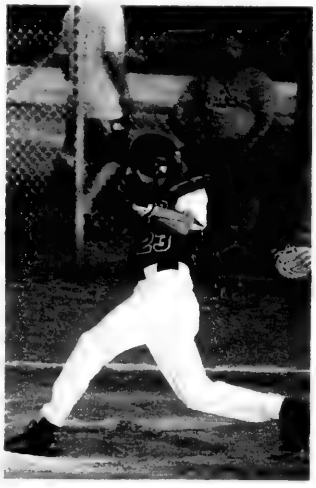
Speaking to The CJN from Israel last week, Baran said talks with regional authorities to erect a stadium could be finalized by the end of August.

"There are close to 1,000 people playing softball and baseball in Israel now," Baran said, adding that the ISA recently put together its first softball "peace camp," which brought together children from moshavim, kibbutzim and Arab villages from around the Menashe area to bond over the sport.

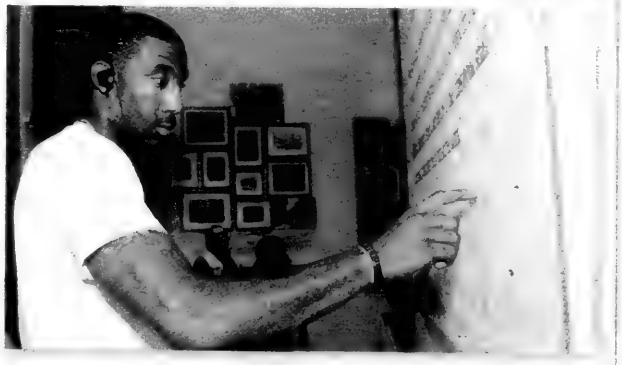
He said Vyner's ball and glove donation drive is an "important" project. "We can always use more equipment for the children."

Softball was introduced to the Maccabiah Games in 1981 when Kibbutz Gezer built a softball facility with support from North America and hosted the games through 1997.

Maccabiah softball games eventually moved to the Baptist Village facility in Petah Tikva, where competition took place in 2001, 2005 and 2009.



Corey Vyner hits one out in a Maccabiah game against the United States last year.



EXPLORING HIS JEWISH ROOTS

New York Knicks power forward Amare Stoudemire visited the Holocaust History Museum at Yad Vashem in Jerusalem on July 30, saying, "It was an incredible experience. I learned a lot and will encourage my friends and others to visit as well." The NBA star had been touring Israel on a quest to discover more about his roots, after declaring he recently learned his mother is Jewish.

Are Hebrew hoopsters on the rise in the NBA?

By BEN FISHER
Special to The CJN

There's a famous scene in the 1980 hit comedy Airplane (which happened to feature NBA great Kareem Abdul-Jabbar) that sees an airplane passenger ask a stewardess if she had any reading material to offer.

The stewardess proceeds to hand the woman a three-page leaflet titled Famous Jewish Sports Legends.

It's just one sight gag in a movie of hundreds, but the joke is clear: with some exceptions – pro baseball players Sandy Koufax and Hank Greenberg, for instance – there hasn't been a rich history of Jews who have thrived in professional sports.

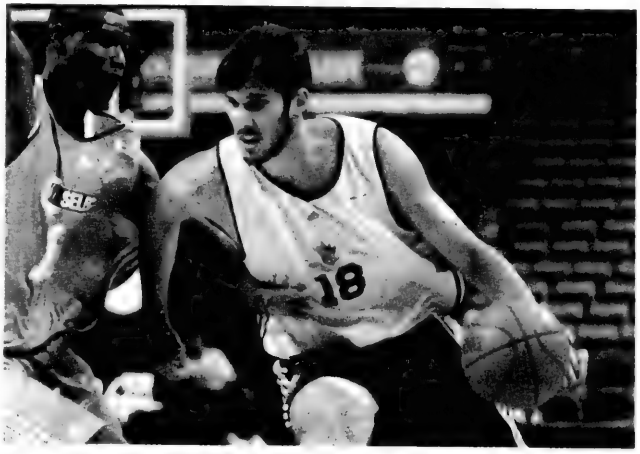
Thirty years after the release of the film, the tide seems to be turning and the links between Judaism and North American sport seem to be growing.

Baseball has Ryan Braun and Kevin Youkilis, while hockey has Mike Cammalleri and Mathieu Schneider. Indeed, of the commissioners presiding over the "big four" sports, only the NFL's Roger Goodell isn't Jewish.

Maybe the most unlikely sport to be affected by this recent rise of prominent Jewish pro athletes is basketball. Sure, David Stern is the NBA's head honcho and there's no shortage of prominent Jews who have been connected to the league, such as the late Celtics GM Red Auerbach, current Charlotte Bobcats coach Larry Brown, Chicago Bulls owner Jerry Reinsdorf and broadcaster Marv Albert. But only now are we seeing multiple individuals with Jewish heritage making significant on-court contributions, all while openly representing their faith.

The rise of Jewish basketball players in the NBA was emphatically pronounced on July 30, when newly signed New York Knicks superstar Amar'e Stoudemire announced via Twitter (how else?) that he was in Israel exploring his Jewish roots.

Now, one would not be blamed for maintaining some reservations about the legitimacy of Stoudemire's exploration and whether it is merely an exploitative publicity stunt – after all, the power forward's new team just happens to play in the city that's home to the world's largest Jewish population in the world outside Israel. However, it seems that the newly minted $100-million man does have a legitimate tie to the faith on his mother Carrie's side and has reportedly been actively absorbing the spiritual side of Judaism on his trip. In fact, as he told the New York Times, Stoudemire visited significant Israeli sites such as the Western Wall and the Dead Sea and said he intends to observe Shabbat and the High Holidays on his return to New York.



Omri Casspi

If Stoudemire is just beginning to become aware of his Jewish identity, Omri Casspi has been attentive to his for quite some time.

To watch the Sacramento Kings forward play is to witness the physical embodiment of Israeli culture.

Casspi, the first Israeli to reach the NBA, plays with a hard-nosed edge and rugged demeanour that, even in his 2009-10 rookie season, shows that he's not inclined to be pushed around.

Although he was able to avoid Israel's mandatory military service due to his status as an elite athlete, the 22-year old boasts a toughness that is a trademark characteristic of many Israelis. He, along with Cleveland Cavaliers guard and former Maccabi Tel Aviv star Anthony Parker, wear the number 18 on their jersey, a nod to the spiritually significant number in Judaism that represents "chai" or life.

Casspi holds the distinction of being the only remaining Jewish player in the NBA's Pacific division, which boasted three as recently as last season. Like Stoudemire, Jordan Farmar went east this summer, leaving his hometown Los Angeles Lakers to sign a three-year deal for $12 million with the New Jersey Nets.

In addition to getting a capable back-up point guard with a championship pedigree, the Nets get a player heavily involved in charitable endeavours, many of which have benefited the Jewish community and the Middle East.

Farmar, whose mother and stepfather are Jewish, spent a week in Israel in the summer of 2008 to lead a basketball camp involving Israeli and Palestinian children aimed at fostering a bond and encouraging teamwork among the kids.

In September of the same year, the now 23-year old helped raise more than $60,000 for California's Chabad community by shooting free throws as part of a fundraising telethon.

If three current Jewish NBA players doesn't seem like a particularly staggering number (and it's not), it represents a major step forward in a sport that has been historically under-represented by Jewish athletes. Stoudemire, Casspi and Farmar will all be rotation players and likely key contributors for their teams in the upcoming season, and they could be joined in the near future by players such as former Duke Blue Devil Jon Scheyer and a pair of Israel-born NBA draftees currently playing overseas, Lior Eliyahu and Yotam Halperin.

Previously, Jewish on-court involvement in the NBA has been largely limited, from the trivial – Ossie Schectman, for instance, scored what is widely considered the first basket in NBA history in 1946 – to the anomalous – Dolph Shayes is the only Jewish athlete to have been inducted into the NBA Hall of Fame as a player.

An increase in Jewish players in the NBA falls in line with the league's growing global identity and could help foster a greater grassroots development of the game in Jewish communities around the world.

A Family Business for over 60 Years

About Life

Dear Ella,

I can't believe how weak I am. I just don't understand why I just can't do this, no matter how badly I want to. I am a hard-core smoker and have been for 35 years. I can't begin to tell you how many times I've tried to quit, but I barely make it through one day.

Logically, I know the horrifying data. Our government has made it extremely inconvenient for me to continue this habit, and my kids are angry with me for being so selfish. The icing on the cake? My dear friend, Barb, just died of lung cancer. She smoked for at least as long as I have. I was physically sick and an emotional wreck thinking that "I may be next". So how do I handle this? I have a cigarette! If this wasn't the kick in the pants I needed, how am I ever going to deal with this?

Addicted

Dear Addicted

Smoking is a complex habit. It's so much more than a physical addiction. There's a huge emotional weight attached to smoking. It's therapy for some, as well as an association with daily routines and a nicotine dependence. A smoking addiction holds on tight to your body and your mind.

The bottom line: only you can make up your mind to fix this. Sure, there may be all kinds of help out there, and your friends and family will jump for joy and support you, but the buck stops with you. You're the one who must walk away without a cigarette after a meal, or an upsetting phone call, or a coffee. You need to get through this tough part and be prepared to put in the work, and make no mistake: it is work.

On the bright side, help and support is out there. A few statistics from Health Canada: In 1999, 25 per cent of people smoked. In 2008, it was 18 per cent. That's a lot of people who've quit. Another stat: approximately 50 per cent of daily smokers have tried to quit in the past 12 months. That's huge! It shows the desperate desire to be rid of this dangerous habit and the hold it has, so you're not alone.

This is your decision. Once you make up your mind to take the plunge, you don't have to go it alone. Tell people. It will make it more real and harder to backtrack. Get help from your doctor, reading material and online support groups – whatever it takes. You'll never regret your decision.

The best four agreements

Life Coach Corner

By JUDY SIBLIN-LIBRACH

Sometimes a book comes along that transforms how you think and feel, and you are not the same after having read it. In The Four Agreements, Don Miguel Ruiz offers up a powerful "code of conduct" that can transform lives and bring happiness, love and enlightenment.

He discusses four simple agreements in the book: "Be Impeccable With Your Word," "Don't Take Anything Personally," "Don't Make Assumptions" and "Always Do Your Best."

It all sounds simplistic until you read the book, and then the "aha" moments and the deep learning abound. The book's premise is that we have made agreements, or have self-limiting beliefs, that trap us and rule our life. When we are ready to change those agreements and create agreements that return our power to us, then we can begin to live life in a healthier way.

"Be Impeccable with Your Word" is probably the most difficult agreement to honour, and even though it is simple, it is powerful. When you are impeccable with your word, and watch the words you use when you communicate, you will feel happier and freer than ever.

Ruiz devotes a large section of the book to people who gossip maliciously with the intent of hurting others. Ruiz compares the mind to a computer, and he likens gossip to a computer virus. He says a person who gossips is a "computer hacker who intentionally spreads the virus."

A person who spreads gossip becomes infected with a virus far worse than anything, he says, and "when we see the world through a computer virus, it is easy to justify the cruelest behaviour. What we don't see is that misuse of our word is putting us deeper into hell."

But guess what? He adds that "impeccability of the word will… give you immunity from anyone putting a negative spell on you. You will only receive a negative idea if your mind is fertile ground for that idea."

So what happens when you become impeccable with your word? Well, according to Ruiz, "your mind is fertile ground for the words that come from love… How much you love yourself and how you feel about yourself are directly proportionate to the quality and integrity of your word. When you are impeccable with your word, you feel good, you feel happy and you feel at peace.

The other agreements resonate strongly as well, especially "Don't Take Anything Personally." By taking things personally, you set yourself up to suffer for nothing. As human beings, we often become addicted to suffering.

"When we really see other people as they are without taking it personally, we can never be hurt by what they say or do," Ruiz writes. "There is a huge amount of freedom that comes to you when you take nothing personally. Someone can intentionally send emotional poison, and if you don't take it personally, you will not eat it."

The Four Agreements allows you to see that when you are being loving, love will bring you inner peace and change your perception of everything. The world does become more beautiful when you see it through loving eyes. By disconnecting from people who don't live by this elevated way of being, you become immune to unhealthy, toxic situations and you open yourself up to even more love and to mastering your own joy and your own dreams in a way you could have never imagined.

Nefesh B'Nefesh brings aspiring soldiers to Israel

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Shar Leyb has had his future mapped out since elementary school.

"People have known 'that kid's going to the army.' I've wanted to go into the [Israel Defence Forces] since I was very young," Leyb said while on an Aug. 2 Nefesh B'Nefesh charter plane to Israel to make aliyah.

"My dad was an officer in the IDF for five years. My brother's in the army… I remember my grandpa did it, my cousin did it. Since I don't have to [serve], I feel like it's more important almost."

Leyb, a 17-year-old from Calgary, was one of 85 North American young adults on Nefesh B'Nefesh's 43rd aliyah flight who plan to join the IDF, a record in the organization's history.

Nefesh B'Nefesh which brought 234 new olim to Israel on Aug. 2, works with the Jewish Agency for Israel to help North Americans immigrate to Israel.

The group, which organized its first chartered aliyah flight in 2002, provides everything from help with forms and documents to financial support, assistance from an employment agency and post-aliyah checkups.

For Leyb, making aliyah means leaving his parents, his girlfriend and his Canadian life for a country that he has yet to live in for more than two months. But the recent high school graduate isn't just leaving home. He's also going home.

The News in Brief

Canada

Chrétien Leaves JGH

MONTREAL — Former prime minister Jean Chrétien was released from Montreal's Jewish General Hospital (JGH) Aug. 9, three days after successful brain surgery. A team led by neurosurgeon Jeff Golan drained blood that had built up between the right side of Chrétien's skull and his brain, causing potentially dangerous pressure on the organ. Chrétien "was in good form and spirits as he left the hospital," the JGH said in a statement. Golan recommended that Chrétien, 76, convalesce for several weeks before resuming his regular activities.

World

Hitler Seizure Upheld

NEW YORK — A New Jersey appeals court ruled that parents who gave their children names linked to Nazism can't have custody of them. The court overturned a family court's decision to return the three children, who had been removed from the home of their parents, Heath and Deborah Campbell, in January 2009. Adolf Hitler Campbell, JoyceLynn Aryan Nation Campbell and Honszlynn Hinler Jeannie Campbell were removed from their home in western New Jersey a month after an incident in which a supermarket refused to print Adolf Hitler Campbell's full name on a birthday cake. The appeals court said there was enough evidence the parents had abused or neglected the children. The court didn't uphold their removal because of their names. Court records show neither parent is employed and both have disabilities.

Anti-Zionist Dies

NEW YORK — New York University historian and writer Tony Judt, a vocal critic of Israel after having lived there, died Aug. 7 of amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, or Lou Gehrig's disease, at age 62. Judt, a London native, had been a professor at NYU since 1987. He was nominated for a Pulitzer Prize for his 2005 book Postwar: A History of Europe Since 1945, a 900-page history of modern Europe. Judt, a one-time Zionist who while living in Israel served as a translator for the Israel Defence Forces during and after the Six Day War, wrote an essay in 2003 calling for a one-state solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Canada Post Suspends Delivery To Gaza

OTTAWA — Canada Post has suspended mail delivery to the Gaza Strip.

In a statement, Canada Post said it has been informed by its counterpart in Israel that "due to circumstances beyond their control, mail service to the Gaza Strip is currently unavailable.

Canada Post says it has been unable to find "alternate routes" to deliver mail to the area. "Our efforts to get mail through to the Gaza Strip will continue, and we will keep customers updated on developments through our website," the statement said.

All Gaza-bound mail accepted by Canada Post that is undeliverable will be returned to sender. Once mail service in Gaza resumes, customers will be able to re-mail their items at no additional charge. Canada Post didn't give a reason for the interruption, but a spokesperson told QMI news agency that when there's a war or conflict in a foreign area, domestic postal services are notified through the International Postal Union.

Somalia is the only country to which Canada Post doesn't deliver any mail, the Ottawa Citizen reported. Surface delivery, in which letters and parcels are delivered by sea, is unavailable in Iraq, Lebanon and East Timor.

The Canadian Union of Postal Workers said mail to Gaza should be sent on a ship that Canadian left-wing activists plan to send this fall to challenge Israel's blockade.

Fire At Majdanek

WARSAW — A fire at the Majdanek concentration camp in southeastern Poland has destroyed a barracks and thousands of prisoners' shoes displayed on the site. The Aug. 9 blaze took firefighters about six hours to put out. The cause is believed to be an electrical fault. The Nazis killed more than 360,000 people at Majdanek. The damage came nearly three months after floods seriously damaged the Auschwitz concentration camp site.

Baha'is Sentenced

LONDON — Seven members of Iran's Baha'i religious faith were sentenced to jail for allegedly spying for Israel. The five men and two women were arrested in 2008, and Iran announced in January that they had gone on trial. Canada has denounced the sentence.

Pro-Israel protesters target Toronto Star

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Some 35 protesters from the Jewish Defence League of Canada (JDL) planted themselves in front of the Toronto Star building at 1 Yonge St. last Tuesday to protest what they call the paper's ongoing "literary public lynching" of Israel.

They also circulated a petition calling for a boycott of the paper for publishing articles "that condemn Israel while ignoring the facts and evidence that justify her actions."

As of last week, the petition, which has also been posted on the JDL's website, had close to 2,700 signatures.

Carrying Israeli flags and anti-Star placards – some of which targeted various columnists, including Haroon Siddiqui, the paper's editorial page editor emeritus– the protesters stood on the sidewalk from noon to 1 p.m., in time to catch the attention of many Star employees as they exited the building for lunch.

Many building employees did double-takes upon seeing the protest, and one told The CJN that he didn't understand "what the issue was."

Dora Machtinger, one of the organizers of the protest, said she recently became involved with the JDL after reading a June 15 Star column by Linda McQuaig ("Partner in flotilla 'farce'") that equated the Israel Defence Forces actions in the May 31 Gaza flotilla incident with those of Somali pirates.

STAR INCUBATES HOMEGROWN JIHAD RAGE!
JIHAD: WORLDS CANCER! BUT MYOPIC MEDIA PLAY DUMB
STAR'S HAROON: JIHAD'S GOON FLOGS ISRAEL

Jewish Defence League protesters set up in front of the Toronto Star last week. [Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf photo]

Machtinger called the column "absurd."

"I take to heart whatever happens to Israel, and I try my best to defend her," she said, adding that she felt Jews are not being proactive enough in protesting the way the Star and other media outlets portray Israel in an unfair light.

"Maybe it's because [pro-Israel supporters] are not motivated to act out of hatred, like Israel's opponents are. But you can be motivated by the truth," she said.

Another man, carrying huge, home-made placards, and who wished to be identified only as "the Lone Protester," said he's been to hundreds of similar events over the last few years and is dismayed by what he sees as the increasing Canadian media bias against Israel.

"If there's an anti-Israel event anywhere, the media will show up in a feeding frenzy and gobble up everything that is said," he said. "[Jews] have to target the media… when they're only interested in what the 'bad guys' have to say."

Four Toronto Police officers stood by to ensure the protest stayed orderly and didn't infringe on Star property.

Though mainly peaceful, one protester could be heard sporadically screaming, "The Star has the stupidest journalists in the world!"

Queries by The CJN to Star editor Michael Cooke and columnist Bob Hepburn, the paper's former editorial page editor and foreign editor, weren't answered by deadline.

Erdogan's justice and equity

From the editor's desk...

Turkey's Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan has not missed an opportunity to publicly berate and excoriate the Jewish state and its leaders in unceasingly harsh terms.

The Israeli military operation against the Turkish-led Gaza flotilla on May 31 in which nine Turkish citizens were killed was the latest pretext for Erdogan's public pronouncements of pique.

In truth, he has had the Jewish state in his gunsights ever since he began to consolidate his parliamentary power more than two years ago.

The famous, inexplicable show of temper with Israeli President Shimon Peres in front of a blue ribbon business gathering in Davos, Switzerland, was the clue that Turkish attitudes toward Israel were about to change.

Last week, the Erdogan government announced that it had established its own inquiry into the flotilla affair to "investigate the attack and the treatment the activists faced," and it will report directly to the prime minister's office.

Neither the United Nations nor the Israeli investigations satisfy Erdogan's quest for truth and justice.

Immediately on the heels the inquiry announcement, Erdogan's government decided to exclude Israeli Ambassador Gabi Levi from the annual dinner marking end of the Ramadan fast.

For the last four years, Erdogan has invited all the foreign envoys posted in the country to the festive dinner.

The snub to Israel was explained by Erdogan's AK party chair of the foreign relations committee, Omer Çelik.

"The reason for not inviting the Israeli ambassador is not on a personal level," Çelik said. Rather, "anyone who is unjust or inequitable cannot pass the threshold of the Justice and Development [AK] party's headquarters."

Once again, proving the rock-hard reliability of his theological mettle and ideological solidarity with fellow hardline Islamists, Erdogan has managed to isolate the "unjust and inequitable" Israel.

Israeli foreign ministry officials expressed disappointment with the Turkish government's decision but wisely refused "to be pulled into the Turkish sword dance."

How ironic, if not also cynically obscene, is the Turkish government's constant supercilious hectoring against Israel in light of a news report of Aug. 12 by Daniel Steinvorth and Yassin Musharbash in the prestigious German magazine Der Spiegel.

The lead paragraph of the story is shocking.

"German experts have confirmed the authenticity of photographs that purport to show fighters of the Kurdistan Workers' Party [PKK] killed by chemical weapons. The evidence puts increasing pressure on the Turkish government, which has long been suspected of using such weapons against Kurdish rebels. German politicians are demanding an investigation."

Recep Tayyip Erdogan

If the allegations against the Turkish army are true, one can only infer from Erdogan's puffy pronouncements regarding Israel, that his use of chemicals against the Kurds was after all, "just and equitable."

The second paragraph of the story adds compelling descriptive force to the evidence that has been brought before Erdogan to refute. "It would be difficult to exceed the horror shown in the photos, which feature burned, maimed and scorched body parts. The victims are scarcely even recognizable as human beings. Turkish-Kurdish human rights activists believe the people in the photos are eight members of the Kurdistan Workers' Party underground movement, who are thought to have been killed in September 2009."

According to Der Spiegel, a German expert on photo forgeries has confirmed the authenticity of the photos and a forensics report released by the Hamburg University Hospital supports the initial finding, saying that it is highly probable that the eight Kurds died "due to the use of chemical substances."

Erdogan's government has denied the accusations.

A Turkish foreign ministry spokesperson reminded the German magazine that Turkey is a signatory to the Chemical Weapons Convention forbidding the use of chemicals in warfare. Moreover, he added, Turkish armed forces do not possess any biological or chemical weapons.

German politicians and human rights activists were not quite satisfied with the Turkish denials.

"The latest findings are so spectacular that the Turkish side urgently needs to explain things," said Claudia Roth, the co-chair of Germany's Green party.

Ruprecht Polenz, a member of the German parliament with Chancellor Angela Merkels' conservative Christian Democratic Union and the chair of the Bundestag's foreign relations committee, agreed with Roth. "Turkey needs to urgently look into these accusations." He added that an international investigation would be the best approach.

Let us see how Erdogan responds to the call for an international investigation of his government's behaviour toward the Kurds. I'm betting this man of justice and equity won't be in favour.

Aliyah increases each year from North America

"My dad was born in Israel. This will be my 11th trip. [It's a] place where you almost feel like it's another home," Leyb said. "Where I lived [in Calgary], you can't go out and find a synagogue around the corner or pray on the side of the road. People would think you're crazy."

Leyb will go into a kibbutz, brush up on his Hebrew and then enter the army in November. He hopes to become a paratrooper.

And he also wants to make friends.

"You meet people [in the IDF] who you talk to for life. It's a friendship for life. You never see that anywhere in the world," he said.

"I have my friends in Calgary, but the friendships in Israel, especially in the army, where you're almost living and dying together, it's something you'll always remember."

And Leyb has started his socializing early.

Sitting in the back of the El Al plane, in seat 27A, the future soldier was surrounded by his peers, who spent the last hour of the flight singing, clapping and dancing together.

Each announcement from the pilot that the group would be landing soon was met by cheers and applause. Amid the noise and blur of faces, it was easy for Leyb to forget his fears.

But they exist.

"I'm nervous to see how I'll adjust. It's always going to be a little hard. I've never lived [in Israel] for more than two months. I'm going on this plane, and I know I don't have a ticket home."

This is where Tony Gelbart, chairman and co-founder of Nefesh B'Nefesh, and his staff come in.

"Ninety per cent [of staff] are olim themselves. They know how difficult it is... You have to be prepared to make aliyah. It's great to be a dreamer, but you have to be a realist as well," Gelbart said on the plane.

"These kids going into the army. If they need a place to stay, a meal, our job doesn't stop when they get off the plane."

Gelbart has seen a rise in North Americans making aliyah since the organization started, he said, adding that the plane was filled with not just future soldiers, but also families, toddlers, young adults and elderly people.

"Look, you walk the plane, [the olim] are religious, not religious, right wing, left wing," he said.

"The thing about this is very simple. You have here, for the last eight to nine years, an increase every year of people making aliyah from North America. Every state and every province. The trend will continue."

Jenna Greenbloom is part of that trend. Like Leyb, the 17-year-old from Toronto has made aliyah and will join the army.

Along with most of the future soldiers on the plane, Greenbloom will be participating in Garin Tzabar, a course for lone soldiers that enables youths to stay on a kibbutz, learn Hebrew and connect as a social unit.

The teen, who wants to be involved in field intelligence in the IDF, started thinking about making aliyah in Grade 8, when she spent a year in Israel with her mother and sister.

"As soon as we got back to Toronto, I was like, 'I want to live there.' I really liked everything, the culture, the atmosphere. I felt like I had more freedom there," she said.

In Grade 12, while most of her friends were applying to university, Greenbloom started the immigration process.

"I was always excited. I never had a moment where it was like, 'What am I doing?'"

Greenbloom's father, Todd, joined his daughter at New York's John F. Kennedy Airport, where the charter flight took off.

"I'll miss her. It's a bit scary. She's a 12- hour flight away, and there's the army," he said.

But he always knew that once the decision was made, nothing would change Greenbloom's mind.

"Once Jenna makes up her mind, she'll rarely, if ever, change [it]," he said. "She enjoys being in Israel so much. She feels a closeness to the people. She has very good friends there."

After the flight, Greenbloom and the other olim were met by Israeli President Shimon Peres, dozens of journalists and, at the welcoming ceremony in Terminal 1 of Ben-Gurion Airport, a crowd of hundreds.

"Why are we so specially excited?" Peres asked at the ceremony, which was made up of the olim's family and friends.

"All of you made [aliyah] of your own choice. You decided to change your life in order to change the lives of Jewish people in the future."

And then, addressing the future soldiers, he said: "We're going to build peace for us, for our nation. You will be soldiers and builders.

"You are coming to... an army with a human responsibility, an army that never wants to fight, but always fought what was imposed upon them. We are sincerely hoping for peace. In one word, when I look at you, I would say each of you is a hope for us."

The reporter's trip was partly subsidized by Nefesh B'Nefesh.

Schulich donates $2.2 million to Eilat schools

UJA Federation, together with World ORT, has committed to an additional $1M for Eilat-Eilot initiative

Compiled by CJN Staff

Toronto philanthropist Seymour Schulich donated $2.2 million at the end of July to outfit Israeli classrooms, primarily in Eilat-Eilot, with interactive whiteboards and other technology.

Earlier this year, in March, Schulich donated $2.1 million as part of the same project, enabling World ORT to launch the Schulich Canada Smart Classroom Initiative in northern Israel.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto – which facilitated the donations – together with World ORT, has committed to an additional matching $1 million for Eilat-Eilot as part of the initiative, administered by World ORT. Eilat-Eilot is UJA Federation's partnership region.

By the end of the summer, 206 classes in 40 schools in 13 communities in the north will have been fitted with interactive whiteboards, laptops and other equipment. Another 209 Smart classes will be rolled out over the next two years in southern Israel.

Each Smart classroom will be equipped with an interactive whiteboard connected to the teacher's computer and an LCD projector, a laser printer, teaching software and wireless network.

Participating schools will be provided with laptop computers linked to the teacher's workstation and whiteboard. The classrooms will also have the abilty to access World ORT's videoconferencing network with virtual links to schools in Russia, Ukraine, Lithuania, Bulgaria, Italy, Argentina, Mexico, Uruguay, France, and elsewhere.

"Mr. Schulich sees this project as a 'game-changer' in terms of the delivery of education for the vital communities situated on the geographic and economic frontiers of Israel," said federation CEO and president Ted Sokolsky. "For him and the Toronto Federation, this is about adding a sense of pride and confidence for students and teachers alike, as well as entire communities, using education as the key to a better future for all."

World ORT director general and CEO Robert Singer said, "The success of the initiative became apparent so quickly that World ORT and the Israeli government discussed taking the project on to the next step – to reach out to new regions and to broaden access to academic advancement by expanding the benefits to parents and entire communities.

"Thanks to the generosity and vision of Mr. Schulich and the Greater Toronto federation, those discussions can be transformed into action which promises to unlock the latent potential of Israel's next generation and thus ensure the country's security and success on the world stage."

Seymour Schulich

World ORT is a non-profit non-governmental organization that provides training and education in more than 100 countries.

Schulich is known for his support of educational endeavours. Among the institutions that bear his name are York University's business school, the University of Western Ontario's school of medicine and dentistry, and the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology's faculty of chemistry.

Wilfred Posluns dies at age 78

Compiled by CJN Staff

Wilfred Posluns, a leader in Toronto's Jewish community, died Aug. 15 at the age of 78.

Posluns was a former CEO and chair of Dylex Ltd., a $2-billion international retailing and manufacturing business. His vast experience encompassed 30 years with entrepreneurs across a host of industries including retailing, manufacturing, oil and real estate. He was also managing director of Cedarpoint Investment, a director of Wet Seal, Inc., a member of the board of governors of Mount Sinai Hospital and Baycrest Centre, and a member of the advisory council of the United Israel Appeal.

A full obituary will appear in the Aug. 26 issue of The CJN.

There's a lot on the line!

This year, United Jewish Appeal wants to raise an additional $2.5 million for programs designed to instill a deep sense of Jewish pride in our youngsters and, by extension, strengthen their bond with Israel.

This is vital in light of today's global movement to delegitimize Israel as a Jewish state. We must ensure that our youth develop a strong sense of Jewish identity through education, community initiatives, and other means.

Cast aside the silent sigh

Jews around the world stand full face now toward the approaching Rosh Hashanah, the Days of Awe and Yom Kippur. Nine days ago, we ushered in the month of Elul. It is our tradition's time for thinking about the approaching holidays, a month-long warm-up, so to speak, for the personal stock-taking that is the sublime purpose of marking the new year.

The Ashkenazi world is gearing up for the Slichot (loosely translated as forgiveness) prayers that commence on the Shabbat before Rosh Hashanah. The Sephardi world has been chanting them each morning since Elul began.

Despite the two different approaches to this unique "preparatory" period of penitential prayer, its underlying theme – conscience and action – forge into one the two streams of the Jewish world.

This time of year is for re-awakening.

It is for greeting each day and each other with a resolve that erupts upon us suddenly like a butterfly bursting forever altered from its cocoon, to change for the better, to do good for others.

In this issue of The CJN, JTA reporter Gal Beckerman has written how Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel – two generations ago, in the early 1960s – was able to ignite the low-burning pilot light of Jewish involvement into an unstoppable army of marchers and activists on behalf of Soviet Jewry.

"Rabbi Heschel was angry and ashamed," Beckerman writes, "that American Jews were not more engaged in helping their brethren in the Soviet Union. [He] could not believe that they were responding with little more than sadness and resignation."

In his typically moving, almost lyrical way, Rabbi Heschel explained that "what is called for is not a silent sigh but a voice of moral compassion and indignation, the sublime and inspired screaming of a prophet uttered by a whole community."

Rabbi Heschel calls to us even today.

Prevaricators and dissemblers, despots and torturers, genocidists and terrorists are not moved by the silent sigh.

To be sure, our task is difficult. But we must not withdraw from it. Withdrawal and retreat simply defers the burden to our own children and grandchildren.

"What had they done to help Jews?" Beckerman poignantly asks, speaking of the generation that heard and heeded Rabbi Heschel's sermon.

What are we doing to help Jews? To help the needy of the world?

Gilad Schalit has been a kidnap victim of Hamas for more than four years. The Jewish state is vilified by would-be boycotters, disinvesters and sanctioners. Darfurians are oppressed. Children are scooped up in parts of the world to be the slaves of the ruthless.

The special ancestral force and energy that hover in the air for us at this time of year – and perhaps too for some at this time in our lives – beckons us to cast aside the silent sigh.

It is Elul. Rosh Hashanah approaches.

25 years ago in The CJN

Israel's cost of living index rose by 27.05 per cent in July 1985, breaking the previous monthly record. The Central Bureau of Statistics attributed the huge increase to currency devaluation, as well as to price hikes stemming from decreased or cancelled government subsidies, part of Israel's most recent austerity package.

Reform movement and gender equality

In his letter, Rabbi Stephen Wise writes that "more than a century ago, the liberal Jewish movements of Europe and North America sought new ways to express their Judaism, including the idea that men and women should be considered as equals in all aspects of Jewish ritual life" ("Right to pray regardless of gender," Aug. 12). This would seem to make the claim that equality was among the founding principles of the liberal Jewish movements.

The claim is problematic due to the lack of any statement on the status of women in Judaism in the Reform movement platforms, as they were established in the 19th and 20th centuries. The Pittsburgh Platform (1885) makes no mention of women and neither does the Columbus Platform (1937), which proclaims the inalienable rights of "man" to avoid prejudice on the basis of race, sect or class, with no mention of gender discrimination.

The claim that the advent of Reform Judaism heralded a new era of "women's rights" in Judaism is disingenuous at best. The first female rabbi in the United States was ordained in 1972, well after the feminist movement had gained a strong foothold in the hearts and minds of the liberal Jewish movements. The Reform movement was not innovative with respect to women's participation, but was only going along with society at large. It is up to the individual to decide if they think that a movement whose policies reflect the whims of non-Jewish society truly reflects Jewish values, or something else.

Outraged by homophobia

If indeed "Tel Aviv is the gay capital of the Middle East," it is in spite of the antediluvian beliefs expressed in the letter "Homosexuality prohibited by Torah law" (Aug. 5). I am deeply outraged by blatant homophobia disguised as Torah study.

Oliver Stone is off her list

It never ceases to amaze me how famous people – be they politicians, actors, artists – the latest of whom appears to be filmmaker Oliver Stone, make blatantly anti-Semitic remarks, and then miraculously, when called to task, apologize, claiming misunderstanding, misquoting, etc. ("Oliver Stone apologizes for anti-Jewish remark," Aug. 5). People say what they mean. I guess I'll just strike another person off my list of people whose work I will support.

Clinton-Mezvinsky wedding (1)

In "Rekindling the interfaith marriage debate" (Aug. 12), about the recent marriage of Chelsea Clinton and Marc Mezvinsky, it wasn't mentioned that the couple's ketubah was on prominent display under the chupah, as tradition dictates. Though some may be offended, this makes the ceremony most decidedly Jewish.

Clinton-Mezvinsky wedding (2)

In "Rekindling the interfaith marriage debate," about the recent marriage of Chelsea Clinton and Marc Mezvinsky, several pro and con opinions are quoted (Aug. 12). I'm curious to know if the interfaith ceremony included the traditional Jewish custom of the groom stamping on a wine glass. And if that happened, were Clinton and Mezvinsky given what I consider to be the best explanation for the custom – "It's the last time the newlywed husband will be putting his foot down!"?

Not all York Centre candidates named

The article "After 18 years, Feldman bows out" (Aug. 5), about Coun. The sermon that helped spur the Soviet Jewry movement

By GAL BECKERMAN
JTA

On a fall day in 1963, Abraham Joshua Heschel unburdened his soul. Speaking the truth without regard for whether it scandalized or hurt was something he would do fairly often in that decade of social upheaval. Already branded as an eccentric and an outsider, that year he had met the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. for the first time, beginning a close friendship that would deepen his involvement in the civil rights movement. The two would eventually offer the most endearing and enduring image of the now long-dead black-Jewish alliance when they walked arm and arm to Selma, Ala., in protest, garlands of flowers around their necks.

But in September 1963, Heschel's audience was Jewish – a gathering of rabbis at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York. His speech would be read aloud that Yom Kippur at hundreds of congregations across the country. It was a sermon that set in motion one of the great engines of what would soon be known as the Soviet Jewry movement: guilt.

Heschel was angry and ashamed that American Jews were not more engaged in helping their brethren in the Soviet Union. There was mounting evidence that these Jews were stuck in an increasingly untenable situation. Every element of their Jewish identity, from religious life to cultural expression, had been brutally squashed. At the same time, the avenues to assimilation were blocked – if nothing else, their internal passports singled them out for discrimination by identifying them as Jews. The option of abandoning the Soviet Union for good was not even a possibility.

Heschel looked at the Jews of America – most of them themselves only two generations removed from the Pale of Settlement – and could not believe that they were responding with little more than sadness and resignation

"What is called for is not a silent sigh but a voice of moral compassion and indignation, the sublime and inspired screaming of a prophet uttered by a whole community," Heschel lectured the assembled rabbis.

Then he made his most searing argument. This was not the first time that American Jews had been impotent when it came to helping other Jews, Heschel told them.

"We have been guilty more than once of failure to be concerned, of a failure to cry out, and failure may have become our habit," he told them.

Heschel was referring, of course, to the Holocaust. And it was effective. Whether or not American Jews deserved to bear this historical burden – whether there was anything more they could have done – is irrelevant. In the early 1960s, just as consciousness of the extent of the genocide was bubbling up, so too was a painful recognition that, as millions of their brethren were murdered in Europe, this increasingly stable and prosperous community could hardly organize themselves to put on a single rally.

This guilt would blossom into what, for some time now, has been an obsessive concentration on the Holocaust, one that many have rightly come to see as an extremely corrosive development – the constant memorializing eclipsing so much else about Jewish identity. But what has been forgotten is that before every Jewish community had its own memorial and museum, there was the guilt and the need to do something about it.

I've been exploring the Soviet Jewry movement over the past five years for a forthcoming book. Throughout its 25-year history, the need to cast away this heavy burden was present at nearly every moment. But I also came to see it as a positive element. American Jews mobilized, went up against an American administration and became a more assertive community, partly as a way of clearing their collective conscience.

Guilt was present when a group of NASA scientists in Cleveland, Ohio, decided in 1963, after reading the then-slim literature of the Holocaust, that they had to do something for those Soviet Jews now suffering "spiritual genocide" and started the first grassroots Soviet Jewry group. It was also present in New York the following year at the inaugural mass meeting of what would soon be known as the Student Struggle for Soviet Jewry. One of the students offered to sing a ditty he had come up with for their first protest. Its refrain was "History shall not repeat."

Guilt, leavened with anger, also was present in Rabbi Meir Kahane's slogan "Never again," when he hijacked the movement in the early 1970s. In 1971, he rallied about 1,000 young people to be arrested in Washington, D.C., near the Soviet Embassy with the words, "I'm asking you to do today what Jews didn't do while the gas chambers were burning. Sit down in the streets of Washington."

And in 1987, when a quarter-million people marched in Washington for Soviet Jewry, greeting Mikhail Gorbachev on his first visit to the United States, guilt dripped from Elie Wiesel's words: "Too many of us were silent then. We are not silent today."

But this guilt was not about wallowing. It was directed, focused. I heard the same line from the many activists I interviewed for the book: they did not want their children to ask the same question of them that they had asked their parents: What had they done to help Jews during the war?

As a result, the movement acted as a sort of catalyst. By cleansing the conscience, it allowed these Jews to be assertive. It emboldened them to act with a confidence they had never before exhibited on American soil.

Never was this truer than during the fight for the Jackson-Vanik amendment from 1972 to 1975. The Jewish community went up against the U.S. president – and won. Under the amendment, Richard Nixon and then-secretary of state Henry Kissinger had to temper their pursuit of detente and make any improved trade relationship with the Soviets contingent on freer emigration.

Here, too, the Holocaust was not far away. The amendment was inspired by a new tax the Soviets wanted to levy on departing emigrants: they would have to pay back the state for their education.

An editorial cartoon in the Los Angeles Times captured the feeling this tax inspired by showing a caricature of two almost identical prisoners. The first held out an arm tattooed with a number from a concentration camp and was captioned "Germany, 1936"; the second had the same tattooed arm and was captioned "Russia, 1972." The difference was that the numbers on the second arm had a dollar sign in front of it.

Jews in Los Angeles in the 1980s march on behalf of Soviet Jewry.

Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel

American Jews made this guilt productive. The Soviet Jewry movement became as much about saving themselves as it was about saving this far-off community of Jews.

When I started working on the book, I was drawn by a need to understand the world after the war. My grandparents all survived death camps and lost much of their families. And yet, by the time I knew them, they had raised families and were happy, well-adjusted people.

As curious as I was about what happened to them in those camps, I also wanted to understand what went into this transformation. The same was true on a much larger scale. How did American Jews scrub out that terrible stain?

The answer, it seems, was to be found in the Soviet Jewry movement. Here Jews were able to work out those feelings, answer Heschel's lament.

A few months before his speech in 1963, a reporter from the Yiddish newspaper the Day-Morning Journal asked Heschel where he had been in 1943. He answered mournfully that he had just arrived in America, did not speak the language well and commanded no attention from the Jewish leadership.

Still, he said, "this does not mean that I consider myself innocent. I am very guilty. I have no rest."

If not for him, then for the next generation, Soviet Jewry offered that rest.

A thing of beauty

We have many aphorisms concerning the glory of beauty. What is beautiful? What does beauty mean to us? Does it promise us eternal youth and everlasting joy, as Keats claims?

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

We want to be beautiful and we want to associate with beautiful people.

But what makes someone or something beautiful? Is it merely a physical array of characteristics, or is it a sense of character or presence? Is it dependent on the eye of the beholder, or is it an absolute reality?

We've all seen someone whose beauty is beyond doubt – natural and forthright. But other beauties are recognized only through education. Think of some of the world's great art objects. Some are immediately acknowledged, others necessitate serious engagement with instruction about the world of creativity and its cultural context.

Which brings me to an insight I had while watching an airplane manoeuvre on the ground. It was so slow and clumsy. It was, in fact, ugly.

But then it took off, and as I watched, I saw the swan emerge. It soared up into the sky in its element with a grace of body unbounded. Created by human beings to defy gravity and extend our physical limits. Beautiful.

Lesson one: context is a touchstone for beauty manifesting mastery over nature.

Lesson two: I have always been frustrated by the midrashim that consistently comment on the beauty of the significant women of the Bible. Why stress this? Were all the women physically beautiful? Were the rabbis telling us that the patriarchs were so shallow as to choose only pretty women ? Were the rabbinic commentaries themselves so obsessed with the physical? Or were they commenting on the inner beauty of these wonderful women? Were they beautiful in the context of their cultures in some way? Or perhaps their acts were distinctive and beautiful ? What did their beauty consist of? That's the challenge of the text.

Did these women extend beyond the physical to act beautifully? Did they manifest mastery over nature? The rabbis fought against that Hellenistic model of body centered worship and obsession. Thus, it seems plausible that they would not themselves have been obsessed with physical beauty.

Perhaps these women exhibited a beauty that was dedicated to moral values (of God and Torah). For me, the beauty we can see in these varied biblical women is the beauty of action, courage and leadership. That might be our model and distinction that would stand the test of time and context. A joy forever.

A shameful decision on the census long form

A word about the Canadian census. A full census is conducted every 10 years. Our last full census was in 2001.

Canadian census forms, unlike those in the United States, ask a 20 per cent sample to state both their religious preference (they can choose "none") and their ethnic background (Jewish is one of many). Thus we can find out many characteristics of the Canadian Jewish population, now the fifth-largest Diaspora community.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Numbering the Israelites via a census, when God commanded it, was a good thing in biblical times. As the Israelites were poised to enter Canaan, it gave Joshua and the leaders a sense of how many fighting men were ready. On the other hand, when King David unwisely ordered a census, he was punished severely. Clearly counting the nation was something done only at divine behest!

Yet, today, times have changed. We live in a society that's wealthy beyond belief. We don't need to raise huge armies. We have created a social network of services, accessible health care and growing amity that is the envy of many other nations in the world (except maybe some American politicians). But I digress.

Our community has benefited greatly from the information that Statistics Canada has gathered. As Canada counted its population's ethnic origins and religion, Canadian Jewry has had a unique window into the economic, social, religious, employment, poverty, household and gender characteristics of our community. So far, no thunderbolt has struck, and we assume that this census had a benign purpose.

It now appears that the Canadian government has decided in its wisdom that for the 2011 year there will be no 20 per cent sample based on the mandatory "long form," which required those households chosen randomly to fill out many details of daily life.

Privacy? Not a problem, because once the census material is collected, the identity of those filling it out is carefully obscured. No one will ever know who filled out any individual form.

We as a community are thus being robbed of a vital resource. This information about the Jews of Canada has in the past given us precious data that we've used to plan community services. It has allowed us to gauge the levels of poverty and prosperity within our community, the needs of new immigrants, the level of intermarriage and many other factors of concern to community organizations.

We will no longer even know how many Jews there are in Canada.

More importantly, however, the furor over it has obscured the real reason why the Canadian government – or the party in power, to be explicit – may have taken this abrupt and unscientific move.

Without the information that the expanded census provides, social service groups can no longer point to its findings as proof of need. No organization planning to make application for funding can use objectively obtained data to make its case. I know how valuable in the past the data has been. I have written many grants to both government and private foundations, and the case for need has rested on hard data.

No data – no case. To be blunt, there can be no proof of child poverty, for example, without the long form. Voila! It disappears in a puff of smoke.

Judaism teaches a very, very important ethic: to reflect as human beings the goodness of the Creator, we need to clothe the naked, care for the sick, feed the hungry and bring those in need to the place where they can provide for themselves. A government that so carelessly cuts off the ability of our society to do these things is an evil presence.

This is a big mistake that will take many years to correct. Our rulers think so meanly that they're willing to go against almost universal good advice from statisticians and businesses, as well as communities such as ours that rely on this information to allocate community dollars.

The biblical census was taken usually for raising armies and (in David's case) for raising taxes. Not so ours: ours was for maintaining a just society. We should be ashamed.

The Jewish experience of Shanghai

This summer I travelled to China to deliver academic papers on aspects of Canadian law and policy as part of a Canadian studies program. The program's primary purpose was to enlighten foreign scholars on the Canadian approach to contemporary issues, while Canadians learned from these scholars and policy-makers, their particular challenges in confronting similar issues.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

No visit to distant lands would be complete without at least some exploration of both the current and historic Jewish community. In my travels, I have been struck with how the Jewish experience and heritage has influenced most countries in the world. This is also true of China.

My visit to the most populous nation in the world was limited mostly to the modern, bustling and largely western-style city of Shanghai. With its impressive office and apartment skylines, its network of bridges and tunnels, its dynamic pulse of commerce, night life and cultural centres, Shanghai has few remnants of its former Jewish life.

The history of Jews in Shanghai dates back to the arrival of Jewish merchants in the eighth century. In more "modern" times, a major wave of Jewish immigration to China occurred in the 1840s during the so-called opium wars with the arrival of a large number of Sephardi Jews.

The next major wave of Jewish immigration occurred during the 1920s. This group of Sephardi Jews included the Kadoorie, Hardoon and Sassoon families. They established the financial district known as the Bund. The buildings in this area were constructed in the mid-1920s in a neo-classical, European architectural style, including the famous Peace Hotel. The Bund is a major tourist attraction today.

The most recent wave of Jewish immigration to Shanghai came in the late 1930s, when Jews were seeking refuge from rising anti-Semitism in Europe. The Chinese mission in Vienna provided documents for some fortunate Jews to travel to China. At the time, Shanghai was one place in the world that did not require a passport or a visa to enter. After the Japanese invaded China and occupied Shanghai during World War II, the Germans wanted the Japanese to round up Jews and build death camps with gas chambers. But the Japanese refused to comply with the German request to exterminate the Jews. Instead, Jews and other members of the city's "foreign" population were forced to live in an area around the Ohel Moishe Synagogue.

The preserved and refurbished Ohel Moishe Synagogue serves as a museum dedicated to the history of the Jewish experience in Shanghai. The original architectural plans are now displayed on a wall in the sanctuary.

The synagogue is a three-storey building with a sanctuary on the main floor, a women's section on the second floor and living and cooking facilities on the third floor. The Ark in the sanctuary does not contain a Torah scroll, but is decorated by a covering donated by the government of Israel. At one time, a mikvah was located in the basement. Two other buildings in the courtyard now house detailed exhibits of Shanghai's Jewish history. At one time, an oven was even set up in that courtyard to bake matzah for Passover.

In North America, when we pray in our synagogues, we face eastward toward Jerusalem. However, in Shanghai, the sanctuary faces westward as, of course, Jerusalem is east of China.

Other Jewish buildings in Shanghai include the Ohel Rachel Synagogue and the Chabad Jewish Centre of Pudong, a district of Shanghai.

At one time, 30,000 Jews lived in Shanghai, however, only three elderly descendants remain. But approximately 3,000 Jewish temporary residents live and work in Shanghai. The fact that only a handful of descendents remains is similar to the experience elsewhere in China. For example, more than 20,000 Jews once lived in Harbin, a Chinese city presently "twinned" with Edmonton. The last remaining descendant died in 1985.

The Jewish experience in Shanghai is similar to the Jewish experience elsewhere. It is characterized by refuge from oppression, the discovery of new lands for building a better life and the preservation of the rich Jewish heritage that has been passed from generation to generation for centuries. The Ohel Moishe museum recognizes and preserves the history of Jewish life in Shanghai, the largest city in the most populous country in the world.

The Kirshner File

The passing of an era in Mississippi

Throughout Mississippi, in small towns such as Vicksburg and Clarksdale and in far bigger centres like Jackson, the state capitol, Jewish merchants once reigned supreme. From clothing, shoe and jewelry shops to fancy department stores, Jews were inextricably associated with the shopping experience. "Jews were overwhelmingly concentrated in the retail trade," said Stuart Rockoff, director of the history department of the Goldring/Woldenberg Institute of Southern Jewish Life in Jackson.

Sheldon Kirshner in Vicksburg

The pattern was remarkably the same in all the southern U.S. states, from Alabama and Georgia to Louisiana and South Carolina. In the past few decades, however, in the passing of an era, the "mom-and-pop" Jewish-owned stores in Mississippi have virtually vanished, swept away on the inexorable tides of change.

During the 19th and 20th centuries, Jewish immigrants from Germany and eastern Europe settled in Mississippi. They were drawn to its booming economy, which was based on the cultivation of cotton.

Usually, they launched their careers as itinerant pedlars, buying merchandise from wholesalers in Memphis and New Orleans, and selling it door to door as retailers. Having accumulated sufficient capital, they opened modest stores in towns ranging from Natchez and Columbus to Tupelo and Gulfport.

In Clarksdale, in the storied Mississippi Delta, Jewish merchants sold their wares on Issaquena Avenue, Delta Avenue, Third Street, Yazoo Avenue and Sunflower Avenue In Jackson, one of the leading department stores, The Emporium, was established by Simon Marks.

Steven Marcus inVicksburg [Sheldon Kirshner photos]

Jews, of course, were not the only merchants who plied their trade in Mississippi. Lebanese Christians, for example, made an impact in the Mississippi Delta.

"Some businesses were very successful," said Rockoff, referring to Stein Mart, now a national chain of discount department stores that originated in Greenville. Managed nowadays by Jay Stein, a descendant of the founder, Stein Mart dispenses brand-name fashions for men and women, as well as accessories, home decor, linens and shoes at prices up to 60 per cent below those of competitors.

"Still other businesses were short-lived," Rockoff added.

As small-town retailing was washed away by big-box stores and malls, and as the university-educated children and grandchildren of Jewish merchants migrated to large southern cities in search of more opportunities, these shops closed, leaving empty, forlorn storefronts lining streets that bustled with activity before the 1990s. "No one really took them over," said Rockoff, who was born and raised in Texas.

There are still, to be sure, Jewish-owned stores in Mississippi, as I discovered during a week-long road trip in July.

Yet, as Rockoff noted, they are insignificant in number, and in many towns, such as Lexington, only one Jewish-owned store, Cohen's, has been left standing. "As to the future, I suspect that the numbers will dwindle even further," he said in a sombre forecast.

In Holly Springs, a town of historic antebellum mansions, and in Port Gibson, near the scenic Natchez Trace highway, fading signs above shuttered shops recall an epoch when Jewish merchants could easily be found in virtually every nook and cranny of the Magnolia state.

As I walked along Washington Street in Vicksburg – a pleasant town of about 26,000 on the banks of the mighty Mississippi River that surrendered to federal forces after a 47-day siege during the U.S. Civil War – I spotted the Marcus Furniture sign above a large store.

It was metres away from the Biederham Coca-Cola Museum, where the famous soft drink was first commercially bottled in 1894. It was also a 10-minute drive from the Vicksburg National Military Park, the site of a Civil War battle, a cemetery where 18,000 soldiers are buried and a museum that houses the remains of the Cairo, the first military vessel in the history of warfare to be sunk by a mine.

Steven Marcus, the 51-year-old proprietor, was outside his store puffing on a cigarette. When he asked why I had just taken a photograph of his sign, I explained that I was collecting material for a story about Jewish merchants like himself.

Floyd Shankerman in Clarksdale

Inside his cavernous store, seated comfortably at his desk, he told me that his grandmother, an immigrant from the Russian empire, started the business by making quilts that her husband, a pedlar, subsequently sold.

The store itself was opened in 1899 and was run by Marcus' grandfather and great-uncle for decades. By then, several hundred Jews lived in Vicksburg, where Jefferson Davis, the president of the ill-fated Confederacy, once resided.

A 1981 graduate of the University of Mississippi who was born in Vicksburg, Marcus has worked in the store since the age of 10. Recalling the days when at least half of the shops here were owned by Jews, he acknowledged that he is one of the town's last Jewish merchants.

By his estimate, Vicksburg is home to 15 to 20 Jews today, including Laurence Leyens, who was mayor until about a year ago. Marcus,

A Jewish merchant's store sign in Meridian whose son owns a furniture store in Oxford, Miss., intends to remain in Vicksburg. "It's home," he said.

The town of Meridian, on the other side of the state, has even fewer Jewish inhabitants. One of Meridian's last Jewish merchants, Robert Loeb, 58, runs an elegant menswear shop on Front Street, near the railway station. His German-born ancestor, Alex, established Loebs in 1887.

"We have been very fortunate that our business has continued, and so far, we have been doing well," he observed.

In a reference to his big-box competitors, he said, "We try to stock merchandise that big stores can't get, and we pay a lot of attention to customer service."

He doubts whether his children will succeed him. "They will likely go into the professions, dentistry and accounting, which are good fields to follow these days."

Morele Rosenfeld owned a ladies' ready-to-wear shop in Meridian until 1997. "We closed it for two reasons," she said, citing the opening of a mall that year and the high cost of employee salaries.

"Up until the mid-1960s and 1970s, many stores in Meridian were owned by Jews. Our children did not want to carry on the family business. They wanted no part of the six or seven-day week and the nine to 10-hour day."

In Clarksdale, a one-hour drive north from Greenville on highway 61, Floyd Shankerman, 71, runs Shankerman's Men's Wear on Yazoo Avenue. His Lithuanian-born grandfather, Abraham, opened the store in 1919 and his father, Phillip, ran it until the mid-1980s. Shankerman, a self-proclaimed patriot who sings in a Baptist church choir, commutes to his spacious shop from neighbouring Charleston, where the Hollywood actor Morgan Freeman lives.

Born in Clarksdale, whose Jewish presence has dwindled to a handful of individuals from a high of several hundred decades ago, he remembers the days when more than two-thirds of the dry goods stores here were owned and operated by Jews.

Tellingly enough, Shankerman's four grown children, Robert, Steven, Jason and Cindy, have left Mississippi and gone into various professions. "There were better opportunities for them elsewhere," he said, touching upon a compelling reason why the Jewish merchant class in Mississippi has so drastically declined.

But Shankerman, one of the last of the old-timers, has no intention of leaving Mississippi. "I like it here. It's my home."

The benefits of studying abroad

By VICKY TOBIANAH
Special to The CJN

Vicky Tobianah

When I decided to study abroad last year, I knew that the decision would open new doors for me, academically and personally. But I never imagined the impact it would have on my life.

As a third-year student at McGill University, I knew that although I loved Montreal, I needed a change.

I felt that to truly benefit from my education, it would be in my own best interest to take time to learn things from a different perspective, a new perspective. As a political science student, I focused on international relations, and my search for an exciting place to study led me to The Hebrew University of Jerusalem in Israel.

With great incentives, I completed the long application form with just a couple months to spare before the term began. In early December, I received my acceptance letter, booked a flight to Israel and left for a new experience.

Studying abroad is a new phenomenon among university students. Learning a new language, living in a different culture, becoming more independent and self-sufficient are only a few of the skills students learn and bring back to their home university.

Guest Voice

Abby Plener, an English literature major at McGill, spent a semester at the University of Cape Town in South Africa. "My semester abroad taught me a lot – probably more than I will ever realize or could even begin to process now," she told me.

"While at UCT, I often got the question, 'Why are you studying here? The universities are so much better in North America.'

"In general, studying abroad made me reflect on the degree to which western countries have a monopoly over education – defining the standards of what is 'good' education."

But employers and academics are acknowledging that studying abroad contributes to a well-rounded education.

Thevi Pather, associate director at Camosun College in Victoria, B.C., said in the First National Report on International Education and Mobility by the Association of Canadian Community Colleges: "After 15 years of work in international education, it never ceases to amaze me when I see the profound changes that occur in a student after their return from a study abroad experience. Many leave our shores with very visible fear of the unknown. Most students return brimming with confidence and ready to tackle the next big challenge in their young lives."

Researchers are now even attributing students' improved academic performance after they return to their home campus to their experience studying abroad, according to an analysis headed by the Georgia Learning Outcome of Students Studying Abroad Research Initiative.

Eden Sagman, a McGill graduate who now works in the high-tech industry in Israel, where she spent a year studying abroad in 2008, says her program helped her break into the business she always dreamed of working in, in the country she always dreamed of living in. "Studying abroad enhanced my education. It opened my eyes to other perspectives about controversial issues," she said.

Although studying abroad is seen as beneficial, it can be difficult to arrange.

Picking a school, approving courses, planning a budget and often enduring a longer semester are some of the difficulties in studying abroad. You can look forward to meeting with 10 professors just to get one course approved, and once you return, you have to ensure all your information is received in a timely fashion.

However, don't let the bureaucracy hold you back. Studying abroad helped me realize so much about myself that I never would have discovered. I learned to be independent in a foreign country, navigate across cities and meet incredible people along the way. And I know that next semester, my education will have benefited because of it.

Prof wants to bridge business, art worlds

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — For much of her 30 years teaching at McGill University, management professor Nancy Adler kept her artistic side to herself and, when she donned her painter's cap, she was discreet about letting her creative colleagues know about her day job.

Today, Adler, who holds the S. Bronfman Chair in Management at McGill's Desautels business school, is openly working to combat the unflattering stereotypes that businesspeople and artists still hold about each other.

Nancy Adler
[Owen Egan photo]

She is a pioneer in the growing trend to integrate the arts into business education and management training.

An exhibition of about 50 of her works, mostly figurative watercolours on nature themes, is currently at Galerie MX, sponsored by the management faculty.

As its title, Reality in Translation: Going Beyond the Dehydrated Language of Management, suggests, the goal is to throw cold water on the notion you can't run a business if the sight of a delicately brushed flower touches your soul.

Adler is trying to instil in her students, ambitious MBA candidates from around the world, an appreciation of beauty in general, which she believes will inspire them to become better, more socially aware, business leaders.

Like an artist, the successful entrepreneur must have work from ideas that can be realized. More than that, Adler believes that business should not be only about making money, but must be concerned with making the world a better place.

In various countries over the past decade, she has taken executives on tours of art museums and led seminars for managers, helping them get in touch with their inner artist and showing how such a touchy-feely exercise can be good for business.

She wants business leaders to "envision the beautiful, not just the less bad or the OK."

Students find Judaism in the outdoors

Celebrating Shabbat in Algonquin Park

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Joel Silver is something of an outdoorsman.

He's backpacked in the Rocky Mountains, hiked in the Negev Desert, spent 28 days on a canoe trip and now, for the second year in a row, he'll be celebrating Shabbat in Algonquin Provincial Park.

And he won't be alone.

Silver, an aerospace engineering student at Ryerson University, created and organizes Hillel's Travel With Purpose Algonquin trip.

The trip, which had its pilot run last year, merges Judaism with the wilderness and includes canoeing, hiking and a Shabbat dinner.

In its second year, Silver's initiative has been split into two, with the regular trip, which runs from Aug. 26 to 29, for beginners and an advanced trip, which lasts from Aug. 25 to 29, for those comfortable with the outdoors. Participants in the advanced trip will go deeper into Algonquin Provincial Park and will have longer canoeing and portaging experiences. On Aug. 27, the two groups will merge for Shabbat.

"The whole point of the trip is two things – the wilderness, outdoor experience and to tie that into the Jewish identity," Silver, who's involved with Hillel and organized the trip with the help of Hillel staff, said.

"There's a lot of programs that help us see Israel and let us help out in different countries… I thought it was important to bring it home and have Canadian students have an experience in Canada."

For Silver, 20, who has always been interested in the wilderness, camping can be used as a link to many Jewish values.

"The outdoors really gives you a sense of responsibility. When you hike along the path, you get a sense of beauty and your impact on the world, on the environment," he said, adding that the trip will help students understand the importance of environmental projects.

"You appreciate the world around you, and you become closer with it. Many of the core value of tikkun olam are involved with that… not only are you going out and recycling, you're also reaping the benefits and appreciating the beauty you're helping to sustain," Silver said.

The trip, which has about 18 participants, is aimed mainly at students who have little involvement with Hillel. Which is something that Rena Friedman, the student leader for the regular trip, can appreciate.

"I love the idea of taking something that everybody can enjoy, like nature, and really giving it a Jewish twist and giving these people who pretty much have no connection to Judaism and being involved in Jewish youth groups on campus… something to relate to," she said.

"I'm hoping [the students] will get an appreciation for nature and Judaism. I'm hoping they'll get involved and not see Hillel as a place that only the 'in' people can come to."

This is what happened to Yosef Aharonov, who went on the pilot trip last year. Aharonov, a graduate of York University's Atkinson School of Business, rarely attended Hillel events in his third year.

"I went to a few Shabbat dinners, but was never really involved," he said, adding that the trip piqued his interest.

"It was incredible, definitely one of the best experiences I've had in Canada," he said. "It brought me closer to Hillel, it opened my eyes… going on the trip made me realize who are the type of people that go to Hillel. I found it to be a great experience."

Aharonov particularly liked spending Shabbat in the outdoors.

"It's easy to keep Shabbat in your home, but when you're out in the open, it's a whole different ball game. We didn't have a fire for Shabbat, we prepared some food before, we had a lot of sandwiches for Shabbat lunch," he said.

"We kept it really simple, we didn't go anywhere, didn't travel. We sat around and we talked. We all bonded, had some davening going on. It was a really nice feeling."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

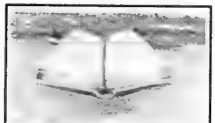
The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Why we blow the shofar

There are many reasons why we blow the shofar on Rosh Hashanah. It's the anniversary of the creation of mankind, so we sound our trumpets to proclaim God's sovereignty. It's also a call for repentance, because who can hear the shofar and not tremble?



Rabbinic Reflections

In addition, it reminds us of the eventual resurrection of the dead, which, quite frankly, I witness in shul every year when I announce that I'm about to blow the shofar!

Lastly, we blow the shofar to remind ourselves of the binding of Isaac by blowing a ram's horn. One can ask, "What is this eternal message of this episode?" After all, Abraham didn't accomplish his mission. While he set out to bind his son Isaac, he ended up offering the ram in Isaac's place.

When God told Abraham not to slaughter his son Isaac, Abraham was on an emotional high, but he had no mitzvah to fulfil in order to concretize his emotions. By taking the ram and slaughtering it, he substituted the energy he collected initially for Isaac's sacrifice and put it to good use, albeit in a different form.

For many of us, Rosh Hashanah is a spiritual high. On our level, we act like Abraham. We come to shul to bare our souls, to proclaim that this year, we will be God's loyal servants. However, the wealth of spiritual energy that we muster up sadly fades into oblivion, because we are unable to concretize our emotions.

But there's a solution.

Take all of your emotions and put it into "your ram."

When you hear the sound of the shofar, commit to being God's servant all of the time. But then think of one mitzvah to fulfil, so that the feeling you're experiencing won't go to waste.

Be realistic. Pick one mitzvah, not all 613! For example, if you go to shul 10 times a year, make it 15.

If you usually give five per cent of your earnings to tzedakah, make it six per cent this year. If you have extended yourself to one needy family this past year, make it two this year.

In closing, our rabbis highlight that the ram's horn that was used at the Akeda (binding) will be the same horn that the Mashiach will use.

In other words, God doesn't mind "small" mitzvot. In fact, He loves small mitzvot, especially when they are accompanied by such august emotions.

And always remember: the small ram's horn will turn into the horn of the Mashiach.

Time to forgive?

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

The government of Italy recently completed its third tax amnesty in the past eight years. The amnesty – which only applied to undeclared income held abroad – resulted in Italians declaring more than $120 billion that had previously been hidden in offshore accounts, bringing in billions of dollars of "windfall" revenues to government coffers and far surpassing projected estimates of its success.

While their economic impact can be remarkable, such amnesties are controversial, with many arguing that they reward, and perhaps even encourage, tax evasion. Presumably it's this fear of letting cheaters off the hook that explains why, to the best of my knowledge, neither the Canadian nor American government has ever publicly promoted an amnesty scheme. While penalties for tax evasion are bound to be lower for those who voluntary come forward, a blanket amnesty is something many governments are wary of encouraging.

Balancing the need for justice while enabling the possibility of repentance is very difficult. This tension is most readily apparent in the lead-up to the High Holiday period, when "repentance prayer and charity can annul the Divine decree [of strict justice]." Insisting that justice be fully executed will inevitably discourage many from confessing, something that will do little to help the victims of crime – which, in the case of tax evasion, is every single citizen of a country. Yet it does seem unjust to allow criminal activity to go unpunished.

On a practical level, it would appear that Jewish law – perhaps reflecting the Divine attribute of forgiveness over justice for sincere repenters – is more concerned with rehabilitation than punishment. While a thief must pay double the value of the object stolen (Exodus 22:6), this is so only if the thief is caught before coming forward to confess. In the latter case, only the principal amount need be returned.

This concept of reimbursing the victim – at times for more than what was stolen – is in stark contrast to the western view of crime. The western approach is focused on jail time, or perhaps community service, a very worthwhile notion, but one that does little to compensate the victim.

The notion of encouraging cheats to admit their wrongs was taken a step further by our talmudic sages. Jewish law requires that the actual stolen object itself be returned. According to biblical law, if one uses stolen material in the construction of one's home, one would be obligated to tear down as much of the house as necessary in order to return the stolen material. Such is the biblical demand for justice.

Our rabbis understood that few, if any, could meet this standard. Invoking the power they have to "modify" biblical law in monetary matters, the rabbis issued "an ordinance of repentance," allowing monetary compensation of the value of the stolen object.

Such leniencies are only accorded to those who desire to repent, yet find it difficult to do so. In the classic talmudic formulation, a "stolen lulav" is rendered invalid, as it represents a "mitzvah [sic] accomplished through a sin." While it's hard to imagine someone stealing a lulav today – although not paying taxes on the purchase of a lulav may in fact render it stolen, and hence the mitzvah invalid – it's unfortunately not hard to imagine ill-gotten gains being given to charity.

While the precise value of the underground economy is by definition unknown, it's conservatively estimated to be in the many tens of billions of dollars in Canada alone. While granting amnesty to those who would cheat their fellow citizens might understandably be uncomfortable to many, it's an approach that I believe has much merit, both in terms of rehabilitation and in bringing in much-needed revenue to government coffers.

Writing Jewish history is a touchy subject

By MARTIN LOCKSHIN

In 2008, a controversial essay, From Victim to Murderer: The Jewish-Christian Encounter in the Middle Ages – Historiography in the Wake of the Establishment of a Jewish State, appeared in one of the leading Jewish studies journals. Written by a highly respected Israeli scholar, Daniel Lasker of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, it highlighted some fascinating changes in the last half century in how Jewish scholars write their people's history.

Martin Lockshin

Perhaps the best known change occurred a generation ago, when the great Jewish historian, Salo Baron (d. 1989), decried the tendency of earlier historians to write about Jewish history as an unrelenting "Vale of Tears."

Baron, living in New York where Jews and Christians got along well, tried to wean Jewish history away from what he called the "lachrymose (tearful) tradition of Jewish historiography," arguing that it was inappropriate to portray the Jewish experience in medieval Christian Europe as one of constant persecution. Opportunities for Jews there were often impressive, he claimed, and Jewish-Christian cooperation was sometimes real.

Lasker's article identified a more radical approach to the writing of Jewish history that has emerged in the last few decades. A small number of Jewish historians, mostly Israeli, have been shining their light on Jewish negative attitudes and behaviour towards medieval Christians. Lasker made the controversial, but I think persuasive, argument that these historians are often from the political far left, Jews with a self-critical approach to the way Israel interacts with gentiles today.

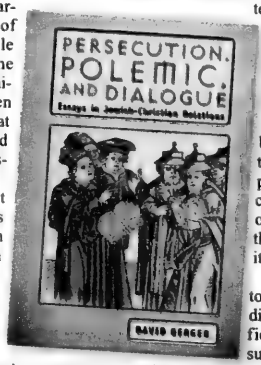
In other words, some historians describe the Jewish past in ways that best serve the political and social goals that they promote for contemporary Jews. Historians in the past who wished to elicit sympathy for Jews portrayed medieval Jews as victims; some self-critical contemporary Jews today portray our ancestors as perpetrators.

Against this unsettling claim about historians' lack of objectivity, it is a pleasant relief to read the latest book of David Berger, the dean of the Bernard Revel Graduate School for Jewish Studies at Yeshiva University. Persecution, Polemic and Dialogue: Essays in Jewish-Christian Relations (Academic Studies Press, 2010), is written by a true scholar who demonstrates how to write medieval Jewish history without an agenda. Two-thirds of the essays in this book are about Jews and Christians in the medieval world; the last third relate to modern-day Jews and Christians — from reactions to Mel Gibson's Jesus movie to the question of changes in Catholic attitudes to Jews in the last 50 years.

(Full disclosure: Berger was my undergraduate instructor and role model for pursuing a career in academic Jewish studies; we remain in friendly long-distance contact.)

Berger is a man of clear values: he is an ordained Orthodox rabbi and a strong supporter of the State of Israel. He is both one of the world's leading scholars of medieval Jewish-Christian polemics and also the co-author of a very useful gently polemical handbook, Jews and "Jewish Christianity": A Jewish Response to the Missionary Challenge, for contemporary Jews who face some of the same challenges that medieval Jews did. The handbook has recently been reprinted here in Toronto by Jews for Judaism.

Berger never sugar-coats his depiction of medieval Jews. While he describes well the problems and discrimination that they often faced, he also notes that at times they initiated arguments with Christians.



One of the most interesting essays in this collection centres on the medieval Christian belief that Jews were physically ugly. Berger shows from Jewish texts of the time that Jews themselves often agreed with that negative assessment of their looks, adopting the attitudes of those who discriminated against them. A different essay goes carefully through the arguments of Israeli professor Yisrael Yuval, who often highlights the negative portrayal of Christians in Jewish theology and folk beliefs. Berger even-handedly and dispassionately points out which of Yuval's arguments are legitimate and which are not.

In short, when dealing with historical issues, Berger comes as close as possible to agenda-free writing.

But when Berger turns to modern issues, he does not just describe and analyze objectively; here he openly (and, to my mind, appropriately) promotes his own contemporary Jewish agenda.

He explains why he still supports the position of his teacher, the leading modern Orthodox rabbi of 20th century America, Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik (d. 1993), on inter-religious dialogue. Rabbi Soloveitchik recognized that co-operation with other religions was crucial in North America, yet he strongly opposed theological dialogue between Jews and Christians.

Berger, who interacts often with Christian leaders on many crucial issues, continues to make a cogent case against theological dialogue, disagreeing with some recent modern Orthodox leaders who have abandoned or modified Rabbi Soloveitchik's approach.

Many of the essays in the "modern" section reflect a related cause dear to Berger. He details the kinds of complaints contemporary Jews can and cannot legitimately offer against Christian beliefs about Jews. For example, many Jews who were offended by Mel Gibson's movie, Passion of the Christ, spoke out against the movie vehemently, even attacking scenes that were simply based on New Testament narratives.

Berger argues that Jews who believe sincerely in their own Bible and religion do not appreciate when gentiles tell us what to believe, and we should not tell them what to believe about their holy texts either (even their anti-Jewish holy texts). But he still does not let Gibson off scot-free. In a finely honed and often entertaining analysis, Prof. Berger shows the many ways that Gibson went beyond the New Testament in his negative portrayal of Jews. Jews can legitimately speak out forcefully against this type of anti-Semitism.

A few of the essays touch upon, but do not directly address, the difficult issue that Jewish supporters of the State of Israel face today: what should our attitude be to those Evangelical groups which provide unwavering support for the State of Israel but promote unpleasant attitudes to Jews, praying for us to realize the alleged error of our ways or even actively seeking our conversion to Christianity? Should we cozy up to them, as some Jews — even some modern Orthodox rabbis with far-right political ideologies — have done? Or should we steer totally clear of those who wish for our apostasy?

Berger is the right person to give guidance to our community on this issue. He is a strong believer, a committed Zionist and someone who respects other religions without adopting the relativist world view that sees all religions as equally valid. He also does not avoid controversy — consider his brave book, The Rebbe, the Messiah, and the Scandal of Orthodox Indifference, which I reviewed in these pages in 2002. Perhaps in his next project he can apply his scholarship and good sense to this thorny issue.

The Czech Torah scrolls – new developments

By CHARLES HELLER

Many synagogues in Canada and throughout the world have on display a Czech Torah scroll that survived the Holocaust. Some scrolls are actually used for Torah reading, but in many cases, the scrolls are on display as a memorial.

These scrolls survived the devastation of Czech Jewry and were purchased from the Czech government by the Westminster Synagogue in London, which established the Czech Memorial Scroll Trust. Many of the scrolls were partially restored there and then they were distributed (on long-term loan) to communities throughout the world.

On a recent visit to the trust in London, I learned from its research director, Michael Heppner, of some important recent developments in this vital project.

First, I learned that there has been a re-evaluation of the concept of the Central Jewish Museum that housed the scrolls and thousands of other artifacts when the Nazis first occupied Czechoslovakia.

It has always been assumed that the massive work of collection and cataloguing was a Nazi-inspired scheme to create a "museum of a defunct race."

But there is now some evidence that disputes the idea that the scheme was instigated by the Nazis. The whole enterprise was initiated by a group of leaders of the Prague Kultusgemeinde (Jewish Congress). They realized that the Jewish treasures in the abandoned synagogues were vulnerable to destruction and developed a scheme to collect everything to a central point from which it would be returned after the Nazi nightmare was over. They had already had experience with the Jewish Museum in Mikulov whose contents had been removed to safety.

A key element in the success of this scheme was its documentation in quadruplicate, previously assumed to be proof of methodical Nazi bureaucracy, but in fact a method for ensuring that every item could be tracked and eventually returned to its original congregation.

Authority was somehow given for this operation, possibly because the Nazis appreciated the museum value of European craftsmanship, even though they dismissed the historical value of Jewish cultural objects.

The story that the Nazis planned a "museum of a defunct race" probably started after World War II when the influential journalist Egon Erwin Kisch, astounded at how many riches had survived in the midst of such terrible destruction, assumed this could only have happened because the Nazis planned it. In any case, there is no evidence of any Nazi propaganda in the exhibitions that were put on by the museum.

I also learned that many more scrolls than had originally been thought are capable of full restoration as kosher scrolls suitable for reading. It was formerly assumed that nearly all the scrolls were in too bad a state to be repaired, although some more liberal-minded synagogues might read from a damaged scroll, which their Orthodox colleagues would not allow. It would be very heartening if additional kosher Czech scrolls were to become available.

Some of the Czech Torah scrolls that survived World War II.

Many synagogues that possess a Czech scroll do not use it effectively as a memorial and a teaching aid. If your synagogue has such a scroll, make sure that it has its identification plaque and certificate of origin, which were issued by the Scrolls Trust. This information should be prominently displayed.

In this way, your synagogue will be able to identify with a specific community that was affected by the Holocaust. Educators have repeatedly shown that identifying with one particular person or place is the best way to build empathy, rather than talking about large-scale events such as the Holocaust as a whole. Students doing projects will find this rewarding and meaningful, and in this way can fulfil the mitzvah of zachor – remembering our history.

The Westminster Synagogue also houses a museum outlining the story of the Czech Torah scrolls and contains many artifacts in addition to the scrolls themselves. Of particular interest is the large collection of beautiful scroll binders, which, lovingly made of patchwork and embroidery, spell out for us the details of people, places and events in a now vanished world.

A half century of helping IDF soldiers

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — For nearly 50 years, from 8:30 in the morning until 1 in the afternoon on virtually every Sunday from spring to fall, in good weather and bad, Arthur Schwartz has sat at a little table inside a gate or near the office at Baron de Hirsch cemetery on Rue de la Savane, asking for and collecting money.

Not for himself, needless to say.

A retired needle-trade cutter – an art that has gone the way of the dodo in the era of computer and laser technology – the money has always been earmarked for a fund for the welfare of soldiers in Israel.

For the last 16 years, Schwartz, 87, has been a widower. His wife of 37 years, Estelle, who was 11 years his junior, died of cancer in 1994. Since then, Schwartz has lived completely on his own in the Ahunsic area of town in a triplex he owns and is the landlord of.

Schwartz has no idea of how much he has collected over the decades. But it's all marked down in his notebook, as he showed a recent visitor, written with the same precision as the lines he made with his sharp scissors at the wide factory table he once worked at.

UNRWA perpetuates historic con game

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

How is it that 60 years after Palestinians became refugees following the creation of the State of Israel, those who are still alive, and their decendants, remain refugees? In his Aug. 7 National Post column, "Palestinian refugees frozen in time, addicted to pity," Robert Fulford addressed this important, but largely overlooked, question.

In the aftermath of World War II, about 50 million people were made refugees as a direct result of the war and various other conflicts. Typically, they were resettled and ceased being refugees. Included in this category were approximately 800,000 Jews who were forced to flee Arab countries in the years immediately after Israel was established. Most of these Jews were absorbed into Israel or moved to other countries where they became citizens. Also included were the 12 to 13 million Hindu and Muslim refugees who were compelled to move to India and Pakistan, respectively, when Pakistan was created in 1947.

But as Fulford noted, Palestinian refugees were treated differently and uniquely. "They are a special case… only the Palestinians cling to their 'refugee' status decade after decade. They present themselves as helpless victims of Israeli aggression. They await rescue – as they have been awaiting it for three generations, since Israel was founded in 1948."

Fulford explained how this unique situation came about: "The Palestinians are the only people who have their own private section of the UN, the United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA). It defines 'refugee' as someone who lived in Palestine between June, 1946, and May, 1948, and 'lost both their homes and means of livelihood as a result of the 1948 Arab-Israeli conflict.' The definition includes all their descendants. Entirely credible numbers don't exist, but UNRWA believes there were 711,000 such refugees in 1948, and now more than 4.7 million."

All other people who were or have become refugees are handled by another agency of the UN – the High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), which is mandated to resolve their plight. The solution is generally permanent resettlement in a host country. By contrast, UNRWA, mandated only to provide "relief and works programs," in effect perpetuates the status of Palestinian refugees as refugees. As Fulford observed, this plays into the hands of Arab leaders who have used the Palestinian refugees as political pawns in their ongoing refusal to recognize Israel: "The Arab League advises Arab states to deny citizenship to Palestinians, 'to avoid dissolution of their identity and protect their right to return to their homeland.'"

Remarkably, the UNHCR itself has acknowledged the special "political" role that UNRWA plays. In its publication, "The State of the World's Refugees 2000: Fifty years of humanitarian action," the agency wrote that "[u]nlike the work of UNHCR, the scope of UNRWA's work does not [emphasis added] include the search for permanent solutions for the refugees under its care."

A passage that precedes this admission is important to quote at length: "Once UNRWA was established [in December, 1949]… Arab states insisted that Palestinian refugees receiving UNRWA assistance should be excluded from UNHCR's mandate and from the 1951 UN Refugee Convention [which stipulates refugee rights and the obligations of states to recognize these rights]. Arab states were concerned lest the individual refugee definition under discussion in the draft convention undermine the position of Palestinians, whose rights as a group to return [to Israel] had been recognized in General Assembly resolutions [sic!]. Other parties also feared that the non-political character of the work envisaged for the nascent UNHCR was not compatible with the highly politicized nature of the Palestinian question" [emphasis added].

Leave aside the fact that the UNHCR grossly misrepresented General Assembly resolutions allegedly affirming a Palestinian "right of return." The organization's explicit recognition that this so-called right is at the heart of a "politicized" agency, UNRWA, amounts to declaring that in the case of the Palestinians, the UN has no practical interest in resolving their refugee status. Above all, the insistence of the "right of return" (even in principle) of millions of Palestinians to present-day Israel is a prescription for on-going conflict with the Jewish state, if not its destruction.

Fulford precisely encapsulated what's transpired over decades under UNRWA when he called this "a historic con game." No one could have put it better.

Montreal Jewish teen charged with sister's murder

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – The brutal death of a teenaged Jewish girl, for which her older brother has been charged with first-degree murder, has sent shock waves throughout the Montreal Jewish community.

Shirel Attar, 14, was allegedly stabbed and beaten in her Côte St. Luc home by Maor Attar, 18, the evening of Aug. 9. She was pronounced dead at the scene. He was apprehended a few hours later a few streets away.

Maor Attar, who graduated last year from Hebrew Academy, has pleaded not guilty.

"The community is deeply shaken and bewildered," said Rabbi Reuben Poupko, leader of Congregation Beth Israel Beth Aaron in Côte St. Luc, who knew the family "peripherally."

"That a child of our community, a graduate of our own institutions [allegedly did this] is deeply troubling. We know things like this happen in the world, but when it strikes this close to home, the impact is deep."

Rabbi Poupko said people are asking how this could happen, or if there had been warning signs. "They are trying to understand, they are looking for hints in his past, but the fact is something like this is not comprehensible. It's an unmitigated tragedy that raises more questions than it answers.

"If this leads to more intervention when there are certain behaviours, it's all to the good, but I can't say if that is relevant in this case at this point."

Comments made on the U.S.-based blog Voz iz Neias? which disseminates news of concern to the Orthodox community, reflected this sense of disbelief, especially given that the Attars are observant and, although the parents reside in separate homes, were living an apparently quiet middle-class existence in the heart of the community.

Community reeling after brutal death

"He must be sick in his mind. Something must have snapped. I am sure a good Jewish boy wouldn't do this without being mentally ill," one person wrote.

Another responded that unless it is shown he was insane, "he should face justice like any other murderer. Being Jewish from a good home doesn't excuse it. It makes it worse."

Shirel had gone to Jewish People's and Peretz Schools at the elementary level and Grade 7 at Bialik High School. She just finished Grade 8 at Marymount Academy, a public school in Notre-Dame-de-Grâce. Her brother reportedly had spent a year in Israel after leaving Hebrew Academy and was enrolled in a religious post-secondary institution in Montreal.

Hebrew Academy spokesperson Barbara Rotenberg said last week that the school had no comment. "No one is here. All of the administrators are away," she said. "It's terrible news."

At JPPS, Elizabeth Kennell, director of advancement, said the summer absence of most of the school's senior people meant it was not possible to say definitely what the school's response may be.

"We are deferring to the guidance counsellors, who are in the process of deciding what to do," she said. The new school year begins Aug. 27, and by that time, after the initial shock has subsided, the school will be in a better position to decide how best to proceed, she indicated.

Whether that may take the form of offering counselling or a memorial, she could not comment.

"This is a very tight-knit community. It has reverberated through the community, but people support each other," she added. "Our heartfelt condolences go the family."

The English Montreal School Board (EMSB) said it will be offering support to Marymount students and staff.

"Our hearts go out to Shirel's family, friends and those who knew her at Marymount," said EMSB chair Angela Mancini in a statement. "This is an unspeakable tragedy."

Members of the board's student services department were to meet this past Monday with the principal and vice-principal of Marymount to develop a plan of action to be "immediately available to any students in need of support."

Mancini noted that the EMSB's trauma team has experience in this area.

"I am certain that some classmates or even teachers of Shirel's are feeling shock and sadness right now," she said. "We have professionals available to assist them."

Agence Ometz, the social service agency of Federation CJA, has also offered its services to the Jewish schools, said co-executive director Gail Small. Ometz has a team specially trained to help after crises such as this, when there is a tragic death or frightening incident, such as the 2004 firebombing of United Talmud Torahs.

The agency is also extending any support it can give to the Attar family, if it requests it.

Whether such a horrifying outcome could have been prevented, Small hesitated to comment.

The agency can only intervene if someone comes forward with a problem, she said.

If anything positive can be taken from this event, she said it is that people should get help if they are concerned with a family issue, and that they have to know where to go. Small added that this is a general observation, and not about the Attar family specifically.

This crime also carries the message that the Jewish community is not immune to domestic violence, Small said. Auberge Shalom, over the past two decades, has done much to raise awareness about spousal abuse, but abuse may exist between other family members.

Auberge Shalom, a shelter and support service for battered women, was established by the National Council of Jewish Women in the stunned aftermath of another domestic killing in the Montreal Jewish community, that of Donna Kertzer Rose at the hands of her husband in 1984.

Montefiore Club closes doors

MONTREAL – After 130 years, the Montefiore Club, once the exclusive preserve of generations of the Montreal Jewish establishment, has closed its doors because of insufficient membership and financial problems.

The private club has sold its home since 1906, a three-storey Victorian greystone on Guy Street, to Concordia University, which will take over the building Sept. 15, said club accountant Craig Gordon.

Just 72 members were paying full fees at the end, down from more than 600 in the early 1990s, he said, and the club, which had eaten through its reserves, was running a deficit of about $25,000 a month.

The annual operating budget was about $750,000, he said, and revenues came nowhere near to covering that. Full fees were about $2,000, among the lowest of private clubs in the city, he said.

The proceeds from the sale, after costs and staff severances, is expected to be about $1.5 million, which will be donated to the Jewish Community Foundation of Montreal for Jewish education and to Concordia for a Jewish studies endowment, he said.

The building's contents, which includes artworks, are to be auctioned off later this month to members, and possibly to the public afterward if anything remains, he said.

The club's considerable archives are being donated to the Jewish Public Library.

The Montefiore's membership has been declining for years, and a variety of attempts to reverse that trend did not succeed. In the mid-1990s the place underwent a half-million-dollar renovation, he said, which brought in about 100 new people, but perhaps only a quarter stayed on.

The Montefiore was founded as a social club for young Jewish people in 1880 by 11 fellows ranging in age from 15 to 23.

Palestinian village's suit thrown out

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — Palestinian villagers who want to sue two Quebec-registered companies for building homes for Israelis on the West Bank will have to do so in Israel, the province's highest tribunal has ruled.

The Quebec Court of Appeal decided Aug. 11 that the municipal council of Bil'in and 11 of its residents, who are the plaintiffs, cannot settle their grievance with Green Park International Inc. and Green Mount International Inc. through the province's judicial system.

The high court's ruling upholds that made in September of last year by Quebec Superior Court Justice Louis-Paul Cullen.

On June 3, the Court of Appeal agreed to review the file submitted by the group's Canadian lawyer Mark Arnold, without rehearing the case.

The civil suit against the two companies and their sole director, a resident of Quebec, alleges that the construction of homes for Israeli citizens violates the Fourth Geneva Convention, which prohibits an occupying power from transferring its own population into the territory occupied.

Bil'in is four kilometres from the Green Line, in territory administered by the Palestinian Authority. The land referred to in this suit was lost after the 1967 Six Day War and more recently with the construction of Israel's security barrier. In 2007, an Israeli court approved the expansion of the nearby Jewish settlement of Modi'in Illit onto that land.

Green Park and Green Mount constructed approximately 30 condominiums and apartments in the area.

Arnold argued that the Bil'in villagers had to turn to Quebec courts for justice because Israeli courts have consistently refused to rule on the legality of Jewish settlements under international law.

The three Court of Appeal judges said Bil'in's lawyer didn't provide evidence to prove that this is indeed true.

In any event, the court found that the dispute's connection to Quebec is too weak to give its courts jurisdiction.

Montreal paper apologizes for stereotyped cartoon

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL – The monthly Montreal newspaper La Metropole apologized for publishing a cartoon that Jewish groups and some readers thought was anti-Semitic.

In its July edition, the publication's cartoonist Métyvié drew a chassidic man in black hat and payes with a large nose holding open the door of his cab bearing a Star of David.

Under the headline "Un taxi transformé en synagogue?" ("A taxi transformed into a synagogue?"), the driver says, "Entrez! Que Yaveh soit avec vous" ("Come in! May God be with you").

The stereotyped Jewish figure is repeated in the signage on the car's roof, which also advertises the taxi company's fictitious website, www.pascherpascher.com ("pas cher" means inexpensive).

The cartoon was inspired by Montreal taxi driver Arieh Perecowicz's contestation in court of fines he has received from the Montreal Taxi Bureau for decorations in his cab.

Among the items he has put up are two of a religious nature – a mezuzah and a photo of the late Lubavitcher rebbe. He has claimed that banning them is discriminatory. Perecowicz is Jewish, but not chassidic. The bureau defends the penalties on the grounds that regulations prohibit any objects in a taxi not required for its operation.

La Metropole printed the apology first on its website, which carries its online edition, and in this month's issue, which appeared Aug. 11.

"We're pleased that La Metropole was so quick to react and recognize their error in judgment," said Adam Atlas, president of Quebec Jewish Congress.

"The stereotype of the Jew with a long hooked nose and the side curls is something you would see in 1930s Germany, not something you would see in a 21st-century Canadian newspaper," said Moise Moghrabi, a B'nai Brith Canada vice-president.

Atlas agreed that the cartoon reinforced stereotypes about Jews, both in appearance and traits, pointing out that "pas cher" in the fictitious website address suggests that Jews are miserly.

Two Vancouver institutions receive federal security cash

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Vancouver's Congregation Schara Tzedek and Ohel Ya'akov Community Kollel are among the Jewish institutions across Canada that recently announced they had received funds from the federal government's Security Infrastructure Program.

They received approximately $20,000 from the program, which was launched in 2007 to assist communities at risk of hate crimes in covering the cost of upgrading or installing security measures.

"We received $7,000 two months ago and used it to install video cameras, to alarm the building and to install double locks to make the kollel more secure," said Rabbi Shmuli Yeshayahu, a director at the Kollel.

"We've had a few incidents in the building over the past few years, including swastikas spray-painted twice," he said. "When we heard about the Security Infrastructure Program, we applied for it and were surprised how easy and accessible the program was, and how accommodating the government was in helping us."

Congregation Schara Tzedek received a matching grant of $12,575 from the SIP. The impetus for its submission came in January 2009, during Israel's war in Gaza, when Schara Tzedek held an Israel solidarity rally attended by 1,000 people.

"There were pro-Palestinian demonstrators that parked themselves outside the building during the rally, and there was some hostile name-calling and a heightened sense of vulnerability," said Ed Lewin, the shul's chair of security. "It was upsetting to say the least."

After hearing about the program last summer, Schara Tzedek approached the federal government for assistance in improving its security measures. It received the first part of its grant in December 2009 and used it to upgrade the synagogue's intrusion and motion detection, closed circuit television and alarm systems.

"The funds from the program were very timely, and we're very grateful for it," Lewin said.

Earlier this month, five Toronto synagogues and a Jewish day school announced they have received or will be receiving some $90,000 from the program to defray the cost of security measures.

Netanyahu makes historic visit to Athens

First ever trip by an Israeli prime minister to Greece

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu arrived in Athens on Monday, a week after being visited by his Greek counterpart in Tel Aviv and at a time of deteriorating relations between Israel and Turkey, Greece's neighbour and traditional rival.

Security was tight for Netahyahu's visit – the first ever by an Israeli prime minister to Greece – as left-wing groups planned demonstrations outside the Israeli Embassy in Athens.

The activists were planning marches to the Israeli Embassy outside the city centre to protest Israel's May 31 raid on a Gaza-bound aid flotilla in which nine Turkish citizens were killed, as well as Israeli policies in the Middle East.

Police increased patrols in the capital, and cars were barred from parking along key routes, including near the Jewish Museum in central Athens.

Greek Prime Minister George Papandreou was to meet with Netanyahu Monday afternoon, after speaking by telephone Sunday with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Amr Moussa, secretary general of the Arab League, his office said.

A government official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said that before meeting with Netanyahu, Papandreou wanted to hear the Arab leaders' opinions on the Middle East peace process, including on a push for a resumption of direct talks between Israelis and Palestinians.

Israelis and Palestinians have been balking at the terms for restarting direct talks – Abbas is wary of entering open-ended talks with Netanyahu, who has retreated from some of the concessions offered by his predecessors, while Netanyahu and his top cabinet ministers have said they will not accept any conditions for resuming negotiations.

Under an emerging compromise, the so-called Quartet of Mideast mediators – the United States, the United Nations, the European Union and Russia – is considering issuing an invitation for direct talks that would list underlying principles and a time frame.

Papandreou, who also holds the foreign ministry portfolio, had been an active mediator in Arab-Israeli relations in his previous role as foreign minister nearly a decade ago.

The two prime ministers were to hold talks in Athens on Monday afternoon, then briefly head to the nearby island of Poros on Tuesday. Israel is also strengthening its military co-operation with Greece, especially regarding military industries.

Turkey, the only largely Muslim NATO state, has long played an intermediary role between Arab states and Israel. It also had close military and intelligence relations with the Israelis.

But relations deteriorated after Turkey criticized the Israeli attack on the Palestinian territory of the Gaza Strip in December 2008 and cancelled several planned joint manoeuvres. They hit a new low point after the Israeli raid on the Turkish-backed aid flotilla to Gaza.

Alon Liel, Israel's former top diplomat in Ankara, suggested that Israel is looking to strengthen ties with Greece given its current testy relations with Turkey, and in doing so, may be able to push Turkey to soften its stance.

But he added that such sentiments might be misplaced and that Israel should not expect this week's visit in the region to embarrass Turkey.

"I think there is lack of understanding in Israel… I think no one in Turkey will even notice it. Turkey doesn't see its relations with Greece as a strategic or military rivalry. I don't think it will make Turkey rethink its tense relations with Israel," he said.

Liel doubts that Greece could replace Turkey as an intermediary between Israel and the Arab states.

Relations between Greece and Turkey have traditionally been tense, and the two countries came to the brink of war on several occasions in the late 20th century. In recent years, things have improved greatly, but old rivalries linger.

Officials from both Israel and Greece said topics on the agenda this week would include increasing tourism, seeking greater Israeli investment in Greek industry and ecological projects such as water conservation.

Greece is already seen as gaining in tourism from Israel since Israel's fallout with Turkey. Israeli tourists who once flocked in the tens of thousands to Turkish resorts are now heading to Greek destinations.

Israel may also seek closer military ties with Greece.

"In terms of political and defence co-operation, we are interested in exploring closer co-operation in these areas as well," the senior Israeli official said.

Netanyahu was also scheduled to meet with opposition leader Antonis Samaras and other Greek officials before visiting the nearby island of Poros on Tuesday.

U.S.-Turkey arms deal in jeopardy, Obama warns

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — U.S. President Barack Obama has warned the Turkish prime minister that Turkey's strained ties with Israel and increasing support of Iran could hinder an arms deal between Ankara and Washington, the Financial Times reported Monday.

"The president has said to [Recep Tayyip] Erdogan that some of the actions that Turkey has taken have caused questions to be raised [in the U.S. Congress]… about whether we can have confidence in Turkey as an ally," a senior administration official told the Times.

"That means that some of the requests Turkey has made of us – for example in providing some of the weaponry that it would like to fight the PKK [the separatist Kurdistan Workers Party] – will be harder for us to move through Congress," the official was quoted as saying.

Relations between Israel and Turkey have grown increasingly strained since Israel's three-week-long Gaza invasion, which was launched in December 2008 in an effort to stop rocket fire by Gaza militants into bordering Israeli towns. More than 1,400 Palestinians and 13 Israelis were killed during the operation.

Erdogan condemned the Israeli offensive in Gaza, and criticized the Israeli blockade of the Palestinian enclave.

Following the offensive, Turkey called off a joint military drill with Israel, and relations were strained further after Israel rebuked the then-Turkish envoy over a television show depicting Israeli soldiers as cold-blooded killers.

The most critical blow to Israeli-Turkish relations, however, came on May 31, when Israeli commandos raided a Turkish aid convoy trying to break the naval blockade on Gaza, which resulted in the deaths of nine Turkish activists. Turkey had threatened to cut off diplomatic ties with Israel, and continues to demand an official apology over the raid.

Turkey's Foreign Minister Ahmet Davutoglu last week said Israel should admit sole responsibility for the killing of the nine activists.

"No one else can take the blame for killing civilians in international waters," Davutoglu told journalists. "Israel has killed civilians and should take the responsibility for having done so."

Turkey, which is a NATO member and European Union member candidate, has also seen its capital rise sharply in the Muslim Middle East since Ankara's vocal condemnation of the killings of nine pro-Palestinian activists aboard a Gaza-bound aid ship.

Ankara, together with Brazil, brokered a nuclear fuel swap in May in the hopes that the deal would draw Iran and major powers back to the negotiating table.

Turkey last week also said it would support gasoline sales by Turkish companies to Iran, despite U.S. sanctions that aim to squeeze the Islamic Republic's fuel imports.

The U.S. administration official quoted by the Times, however, said Turkey needs to show it takes U.S. national security interests seriously.

Washington is closely watching Turkish conduct to assess if there were "sufficient efforts that we can go forward with their request," the official said.

Israel Briefs

No compromise with Israel

Eleven extremist Palestinian groups based in Syria warned on Sunday against a "concession and compromise" policy ahead of a possible round of direct talks between Israel and the Palestinian Authority. The message from the groups, which include Gaza rulers Hamas as well as the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine factions, appeared directed at Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. Abbas is under pressure to enter direct talks with Israel after months of U.S.-brokered proximity talks between the two sides. Damascus-based Hamas politburo chief Khaled Meshal said Sunday that the factions' representatives issued the statement after talks held at his house in the Syrian capital and that they rejected all compromise with Israel.

Israel to buy F-35 fighters

Israel's defence minister has approved a $2.75-billion deal to buy the world's most advanced warplane from the United States. Ehud Barak on Sunday approved "in principle" the purchase of 20 U.S.-built F-35 warplanes, reportedly capable of evading radar. The fighters will be delivered between 2015 and 2017, Reuters reported. Final approval by Israel's cabinet is expected in the fall. Eight international partners that helped develop the plane have signed purchase agreements: Canada, Turkey, Britain, Italy, Norway, Denmark, Australia and the Netherlands. Israel would mark the first foreign military sale of the new jet.

Migrants killed at border

Israeli media reported that six African migrants trying to cross into Israel were killed by their smugglers and by Egyptian forces. The smugglers opened fire last Friday after an altercation over the fee to help about 100 migrants cross the border into Israel, killing four, according to reports. Two more were killed by Egyptian forces while trying to cross the border. Several of the dead were Eritrean. Some 22 other migrants were detained by Egyptian police. Twenty-eight African migrants have been killed so far this year trying to cross into Israel, 24 by Egypt's police and four by smugglers.

Follow-up panel arrives

A United Nations committee charged with following up on the Goldstone report on the Gaza war arrived in the coastal strip. The 16 committee members crossed into Gaza through the Rafah crossing with Egypt late Saturday night, the news agency AFP reported. They're scheduled to spend three days in Gaza and evaluate judicial procedures that Israel and the Palestinians can take in light of the Goldstone report. The Goldstone commission report, headed by former South African judge Richard Goldstone, accused the Israelis and the Palestinians of war crimes and possible crimes against humanity during the month-long Gaza war in 2008-2009. The report recommended that if Israel and Hamas don't conduct credible investigations, then it will transfer its findings to the International Criminal Court in The Hague. Israel's military has completed its investigations in all but one of 30 cases singled out in the Goldstone report, the Israel Defence Forces said.

Alleged killer extradited

Israeli media reported that an Israeli suspect in a series of killings and attacks in three U.S. states waived his extradition to Michigan. Elias Abuelazam, 33, a Christian Arab from Ramla, appearing in an Atlanta court last Friday, did not contest his extradition to the state where most of his attacks allegedly took place. Abuelazam will be extradited in the next two weeks. He's expected to face an attempted murder charge in one of the attacks. Following a trial in Michigan, Virginia will likely request his extradition. Some of the attacks also took place in Ohio. Abuelazam reportedly was living legally in the United States on a green card he got when he married a U.S. citizen, from whom he's now divorced. Nearly all of the attacks, which included at least a dozen non-fatal stabbings and five deaths, involved dark-skinned victims.

Opinions mixed on building mosque near Ground Zero

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — Hamas leader Mahmoud a-Zahar said Monday that Muslims must build a mosque near the site of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, a project opposed by U.S. conservatives and many New Yorkers.

Muslims have to build everywhere so that they can pray, just as Christians and Jews build their places of worship, Zahar said in an interview on Aaron Klein Investigative Radio on WABC-AM.

Earlier this month, a New York city agency cleared the way for construction of a Muslim cultural centre that will include a prayer room, two blocks from the site of the 9/11 attacks, popularly known as Ground Zero.

The centre is a project of the Cordoba Initiative, an advocacy group that promotes improved relations between Islam and the West. The group did not respond to Zahar's comments.

Zahar is a co-founder of Hamas and its chief in the Gaza Strip.

New York Senator Chuck Schumer said Zahar's comments don't carry any weight because Hamas is a terrorist organization. Schumer has not taken a stand on the mosque.

U.S. congressman Peter King, who opposes the mosque, says he won't respond to Hamas.

U.S. President Barack Obama on Friday backed construction of the project.

"As a citizen and as president, I believe that Muslims have the same right to practise their religion as anyone else in this country," Obama said at an event attended by diplomats from Islamic countries and members of the U.S. Muslim community.

"That includes the right to build a place of worship and a community centre on private property in lower Manhattan, in accordance with local laws and ordinances," he said, weighing in for the first time on a national debate that has grown increasingly heated in recent weeks.

"This is America, and our commitment to religious freedom must be unshakable," said Obama, who has made improving ties between the United States and the Muslim world a cornerstone of his foreign policy.

Obama added on Saturday that he "will not comment on the wisdom of making a decision to put a mosque there."

Many families of those killed in the attacks have mounted an emotional campaign to block the community centre, calling it provocative and a betrayal of the memory of the victims.

Conservative American politicians have also called for the project to be scrapped. A spokesperson for the conservative Tea Party political movement said the centre would be used for "terrorists to worship to their monkey god."

In his remarks on Friday, Obama stressed that Al-Qaeda is not synonymous with Islam. "Al-Qaeda's cause is not Islam – it is a gross distortion of Islam," he said.

New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg has firmly supported the project, but 53 per cent of New Yorkers oppose it, according to a recent Marist Poll.

A day before President Obama defended the right to build the proposed mosque near Ground Zero, the developer said it would consider building elsewhere.

New York Gov. David Paterson last week raised the idea of building the mosque on a different site, possibly offering state-owned land. Paterson does not oppose the current location.

Mosque developer Sharif El-Gamal, the CEO of Soho Properties, has said the group is interested in hearing from Paterson.

"We are open to a conversation to find out more on what the governor has in mind," the centre, called Park 51, said in a Twitter post Aug. 12, the New York Daily News reported.

Park 51, which will include a mosque as well as a 13-storey Muslim cultural centre, will be located at 45-47 Park Place, two blocks from Ground Zero. Jewish groups have come down on both sides of the debate.

150 Irish Artists add names to Israel cultural boycott

By JACK KHOURY

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — More than 150 Irish artists and intellectuals have declared a boycott of Israel, saying they would not perform or exhibit in Israel until Israel ceases what they call its abuse of Palestinian human rights.

The artists signed a statement Saturday pledging to refrain from engaging in any cultural activity with Israel "until such time as Israel complies with international law and universal principles of human rights."

Speaking to the Irish Times, the head of the Irish Palestine Solidarity Campaign, Raymond Dean, said artists who perform in Israel are backing it whether they like it or not.

"You can't really pin this down… [There has to be] at least an end of the occupation of Palestine, dismantling or at least stopping the settlements and Israel negotiating in good faith with the Palestinians," Dean said.

The statement comes as more and more international artists scheduled to perform in Israel, including Elvis Costello, The Pixies, Gil Scott Heron, Santana, The Klaxons and the Gorillaz Sound System, have cancelled their shows, in what appeared to be a response to Israel's raid on a Gaza-bound aid flotilla last May that resulted in the death of nine flotilla activists.

Only last month, British electronica duo Leftfield announced that they would be cancelling their scheduled performance in Israel on Aug. 31st for what they referred to as production problems.

"Unfortunately Leftfield will not be able to perform at the Heineken Music Conference on the 31st August due to unforeseen production problems," the duo wrote on the Facebook fan page dedicated to their current tour.

Meanwhile, on the duo's official Facebook page, they published a letter sent to them by the organization Boycott Israel calling for them to "postpone your planned concert in Israel this summer, indefinitely."

The letter, scanned and posted on their page, stated that in light of Israel's deadly raid on the Gaza flotilla in May, they urged the musicians to take a stand and protest Israel's actions by cancelling the show.

"Performing in Israel today means crossing an international picket line," the letter said, adding that "your visit here will be construed as a vote of confidence in Israel's oppressive policies."

In their cancellation statement, the group made no reference to the letter, despite the fact that they had made it public by posting it on their Facebook page.

Leftfield joined a growing list of artists and musicians who have recently cancelled their shows in Israel for political and other reasons.

Canadian brings gift of song to injured Israeli soldiers

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — When Ritasue Charlestein peered around the door of the orthopedic ward at Ichilov Hospital in Tel Aviv, she saw a mother, bent over her 20-year-old son's bed. He was propped up on pillows, with both legs elevated in the air.

A week or so before the young man, Artur, an Israel Defence Forces soldier, had been the victim of a hit-and-run that shattered his legs and left a deep scar on his forehead.

Charlestein, in IDF uniform with guitar in hand, learned his story after introducing herself as a volunteer with the IDF Medical Corps. "I have bars in both my legs," said Artur.

"That is terrible," responded Charlestein, and reached out to hug and kiss the boy. "I have come from Canada to thank you for your service and tell you I am so proud of you," she said, adding, "You still have your life. You are a beautiful, smart, strong young man. You will get past this, and you will be OK again."

Next she offered to sing him a song. Charlestein pulled out her guitar and played a few bars of the Israeli folk classic Adon Olam. Artur hummed along to the music. His mom smiled and his dad sang along. When the three requested an encore, Charlestein, in her powerful voice, belted out a heartfelt rendition of Lu Yehi.

Before she put her guitar away, she handed Artur a piece of paper with her phone number on it. "If there is ever anything I can do, or if you ever want to talk, you can call me anytime," she said.

Artur looked at her with tears in his eyes. "Thank you for coming," he said. "You really warmed my heart."

Artur was one of 18 injured in-service soldiers Charlestein visited and sang to on her daily hospital rounds that day, and one of tens of thousands of soldiers she has visited at 12 hospitals, from Be'er Sheva to Tsfat, over the past 28 years.

"This is what I do. I go to them when they are at their worst, and I try to make them feel better," says Charlestein, a 55-year-old mother of four from Toronto. "I get a great sense of personal gratification from making the soldiers feel that they are cared for, that they are not alone, that I am with them, that the whole Jewish people are with them."

The Medical Corps offices at Israeli hospitals have become her second home. Before she does her rounds, she is greeted with hugs and kisses at each office. Young soldiers who care for in-service soldiers in hospital call out "Ritale," an affectionate nickname for Charlestein. "Every morning when I get dressed and put on this uniform I have tears in my eyes," she says.

There is something transcendent about the folk songs Charlestein sings. Her own love affair with the genre started at Hebrew day school in New York, she says. "There is no music that touches like this music. It makes me feel completely connected to Israel, to the land, to the people.

"Sometimes I think the soldiers I sing for won't want to hear this old stuff, but every time a young soldier starts to cry, I realize this music is very special to them, too."

Charlestein's volunteer career started in 1982, during the First Lebanon War. Living in Philadelphia at the time, she came to Israel to express her solidarity with IDF soldiers. On her arrival, a representative of the non-profit Association for the Well-being of Israel's Soldiers (Aguda Lemaan Hachayal) picked her up and took her on a tour of northern-front army bases and hospitals, where she sang for injured soldiers.

"This experience changed my life dramatically," says Charlestein.

Then she met Simcha Holtzberg, a Holocaust survivor and activist who made it his life's work to help wounded in-service soldiers and victims of terror. The "Father of the Wounded Soldiers" became Charlestein's mentor, and she worked with him on her frequent trips to Israel for more than a decade, before he died in 1994.

"I was amazed how he would know exactly what to say to these families. He knew how to make them feel better – when to hug and when to let them cry and when to tell a joke, and when to be silent," says Charlestein, who carries Holtzberg's obituary in her wallet.

"He is my inspiration. He is on my shoulder with every soldier I visit, and he helps me to embrace the family with hope and love, and let them know that I am there for them and I am with them."

With Holtzberg, Charlestein also began visiting victims of terror, through the organizations One Family Fund and Atzum, as well as elderly righteous gentiles living in Israel.

When she left her 15-year home in Toronto for Jerusalem in 2005, it was obvious to Charlestein that she would pursue her volunteer work on a full-time basis. "I realized that what I had started 23 years earlier was waiting for me," says Charlestein, who left behind a career singing for various Jewish organizations in Toronto and teaching Israeli folk singing to adult and day school students.

Ritasue Charlestein

When she moved to Israel, she left behind a chapter of personal tragedy: the loss of her eldest son a few years ago, a difficult divorce and an encounter with ovarian cancer. "After my son's death, singing for the soldiers was the only thing that kept me going," says Charlestein. "If I didn't have it, I would have flat-lined a long time ago."

Charlestein makes a special point of visiting soldiers in the oncology ward. "This is very important to me. I am there at that moment when they think that no one understands the pain and the fear," she says . "I say to them, 'You don't have to say I look young and pretty. But do I look healthy and strong?' I beat the disease and I want them to believe that they will, too. My story gives them hope."

The soldiers she visits are equally inspiring to her. Charlestein tells the story of a soldier she visited in the intensive care unit at Soroka University Hospital in Be'er Sheva. An officer in the prestigious Golani infantry brigade, Tal, 26, had been shot in the head and was in a coma. After sitting for a while with the family, Charlestein went into the soldier's room and sang to him.

The following week, she came and sang for him again. Miraculously, while she was singing, he moved his right arm. Then his left arm. And then one of his legs. Afterward, when Charlestein arrived at her home in Jerusalem, she got a call from the hospital informing her that Tal was awake. "That was my most powerful moment," says Charlestein.

A year has passed since then, and Tal is now functioning at 90 per cent of his original capacity. "He is a miracle. No one gave him a chance of walking or talking again, and now he jokes with me in both English and Hebrew," she says. "I live with miracles every day."

Tal is one of the many soldiers with whom Charlestein has forged deep, long-term relationships. She takes each soldier's phone number and calls his or her family every Friday. "My closest friends are the people who I sang to 10, 20 years ago," she says. "They have become my family."

Charlestein is also connected to a group of Soviet refuseniks she visited in Russia in the 1970s and '80s. She brought them books, gave them Hebrew lessons and introduced them to Hebrew songs before they made their way to Israel. These trips earned her the title of "Zionist spy."

In October, Charlestein received an award from the IDF chief of staff, who singled her out as an example of what one individual can do. She was greeted at the ceremony by a commanding officer who had lost both his legs and whom she had visited in hospital over a 10-month period. "He ran to me, on two artificial legs, to hug me," says Charlestein. "For me that was the best award I could have received."

The chief of staff honoured her this summer by inviting her to sing Hatikvah at a memorial ceremony for an elite IDF mission to Poland.

"I, the Canadian, stood in my Israeli army uniform, with the ashes of our people behind me, saluting the flag of Israel and representing the IDF," says Charlestein, choking with emotion. "Other than childbirth, it was the most extraordinary moment of my life."

Does she ever get depressed, being confronted with pain and tragedy every day? Charlestein responds with a resounding "Never."

"I find these soldiers' courage and determination to be extraordinary," she says. "My life is dedicated to dark places, but from those dark places comes enormous light."

Wilfred Posluns ז"ל

Baycrest and our community lost a giant this week.

Wilfred Posluns z"l represented the very best in community leadership. His involvement spanned decades, helped shape the direction of major organizations, and touched the lives of literally thousands of people who likely never even knew his name.

Always two steps ahead of everyone else, Wilfred's vision for community was ambitious yet sensitive to the realities of the times and the need to be broad-based.

Baycrest was blessed to have Wilfred serve in numerous capacities including Treasurer, member of the Baycrest Centre Board of Directors, and Chair of the Baycrest Foundation. In recognition of his longstanding commitment, he was named an Honorary Director of both the Centre and the Foundation and has been recognized as a Treasure of Baycrest. At the 2010 Annual General Meeting, Baycrest presented the inaugural Wilfred Polsuns Award for Foundation Leadership.

While community was important to Wilfred, nothing ranked ahead of his family. His was an example to be followed. He involved his children in every aspect of his business and community endeavours and has left a living legacy to our community through their involvement and leadership in numerous organizations.

All of us at Baycrest express our heartfelt condolences to Wilfred's wife Joyce, their children Wendy, Lynn and David and the entire Posluns family. We, too, share in their deep sense of loss.

May his memory be a blessing to all who had the honour and good fortune of knowing him.

Food Ideas for the Holidays

The High Holidays, which begin with Rosh Hashanah on the first two days of Tishrei, culminate with Shmini Atzret and Simchat Torah three weeks later.

As with any Jewish celebration, the High Holidays link us to our past and to the Jewish community worldwide. As we prepare for our holiday meals, we feel a sense of unity as we imagine Jews around the globe preparing in similar ways.

During the holidays, we rely on our traditions, and we prepare foods that are symbolic of the celebration.

We eat sweet foods as a symbol of our wish for a sweet year, and as well as dipping apples and challah in honey, we often incorporate sweet ingredients into our main dishes. Bitter dishes are avoided on the holiday table, but we include honey, raisins, carrots and apples, which are symbolic of hope for the coming year.

Other food traditions include eating the head of a fish as a symbol of fertility and abundance, and on the second day of Rosh Hashanah, eating a new fruit – often a pomegranate, whose seeds represent a new year filled with mitzvot – that we have not yet eaten that season.

Many cooks rely on family recipes for their holiday meal, and their table is laden with old favourites. Others look for new recipes and innovative ways to take their traditional recipes to new sweet heights.

In our upcoming High Holiday food supplements, we offer you the family favourites of some of our writers, as well as some new, yet traditional recipes. Whether you're cooking your first Rosh Hashanah meal or you are an experienced cook, you're bound to find a sweet addition to your meal.

From all of us at The CJN, we wish you good meals, and most of all, a Shanah Tovah.

Apples aplenty – and not only for dessert

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

Rosh Hashanah falls during the middle of Indian summer this year, but you will still find bins overflowing with a tremendous variety of sweet apples at your local grocery store. These nutritious and satisfying orbs come in so many varieties and flavours that one can choose a different kind almost every day of the week and still have some from which to choose. Ida Reds, McIntosh, Red and Golden Delicious, Empire, Cortland, Crispin, Spartan and ye old favourite, Northern Spy, are but a few you will find in markets at this time of year.

To ensure that you have an abundance of sweetness and joy this holiday, I've gathered a cornucopia of ideas together that celebrate apples in different guises throughout the Rosh Hashanah meal. I wouldn't suggest serving all of these courses, but if you're looking for ways to incorporate apples in other ways than just dessert, then there's plenty of inspiration offered here. Roasting tends to bring out the natural sweetness of fruits and vegetables, so I have opted to roast or caramelize the apples in these particular recipes. Because roasting tends to break down apples rather easily, use a hardy apple, such as Golden Delicious or Northern Spy.

ROASTED APPLES ON GREENS WITH SHERRY VINAIGRETTE

4 apples
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
2 tbsp. packed light brown sugar
8 cups torn mixed greens
4 cups torn radicchio lettuce
1/2 cup toasted sliced almonds

Vinaigrette
1/3 cup sherry vinegar
1 tsp. Dijon mustard
2 tbsp. maple syrup or honey
1 tbsp. finely chopped shallots
3/4 cup vegetable oil

Peel and quarter apples. Place, cut side down, on foil-lined baking sheet. In a small bowl, combine oil and brown sugar. Brush all over apples. Roast in 425-degree oven for 25 to 30 minutes, turning once, until caramelized and cooked through. Let cool (apples can be covered and refrigerated for up to 24 hours).

In a small bowl, whisk together vinegar, mustard, maple syrup and shallots. In thin steady stream, whisk in oil until emulsified.

Place greens in bowl, toss with vinaigrette and heap evenly onto salad plates. Slice apples. Arrange over greens. Sprinkle with almonds. Makes 8 servings.

ROAST CHICKEN WITH MUSHROOM STUFFING AND ONION AND APPLE COMPOTE

Stuffing
3 tbsp. vegetable oil
4 cups finely chopped mushrooms
3/4 cup finely chopped onion
3/4 tsp. dried thyme
1/2 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. pepper
1 apple, peeled, cored and diced
1/2 cup diced zucchini, unpeeled
1-1/2 cups fresh bread crumbs
1/3 cup chopped fresh parsley

1 chicken (about 4 lb.)
3 tbsp. Dijon mustard
4 sprigs fresh thyme

Onion and Apple Compote
3 large onions, thickly sliced
1/4 cup vegetable oil
2 tbsp. granulated sugar
3 large apples, peeled, cored and cut into large chunks
1/4 cup apple juice
1 tbsp. honey

For stuffing: In large skillet, heat oil over medium high heat. Add mushrooms and onions, thyme, salt and pepper. Cook, stirring often, for about 10 minutes or until softened. Stir in apple and zucchini; cook for 3 minutes. Remove from heat. Stir in bread crumbs and parsley.

Remove giblets and neck from chicken. Rinse and pat chicken dry inside and out. Loosely place stuffing inside cavity of chicken. Pat any remaining stuffing into small gratin dish or loaf pan. Tie legs together with string; tuck wings under back. Place, breast side up, on rack in roasting pan. Loosen skin from breasts. Smear mustard over breasts; tuck thyme sprigs under skin.

Roast in 350-degree oven for 1-1/2 to 2 hours or until juices run clear when chicken is pierced and meat thermometer inserted in thigh registers 185. Cover extra stuffing with foil and add to oven during last 45 minutes of roasting.

Meanwhile, prepare compote. In a skillet, heat oil over medium heat. Add onions and sprinkle with sugar. Cook, stirring often, for 15 to 20 minutes or until onions start to turn golden. Add apples, apple juice and honey. Cook for about 10 minutes or until apples are just tender. (Compote can be made up to 1 day ahead and kept, well covered, in the refrigerator. Warm on medium heat in the microwave.)

Carve chicken. Serve with warm compote. Makes 8 servings.

SWEET POTATO AND APPLE PUREE

2 large sweet potatoes (about 2-1/2 lb.), peeled and cut into chunks
1 onion, trimmed and cut into eighths
1/4 cup olive oil
1 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. pepper
3 apples, peeled, cored and cubed
3/4 cup chicken stock

In a bowl, toss potatoes with onions, oil, salt and pepper. Arrange in single layer on foil-lined rimmed baking sheet.

Roast in centre of preheated oven at 375 for 30 minutes. Stir in apples. Roast for 20 minutes or until vegetables and apples are softened.

In blender or food processor, puree mixture, with chicken stock, until the consistency of soft mashed potatoes. Makes 8 servings.

PAVLOVA WITH CARAMEL APPLES

4 apples, cored, peeled and thickly sliced or chopped
3/4 cup granulated sugar
2 tbsp. margarine or butter

Pavlova
4 egg whites
1 cup granulated sugar
1 tbsp. cornstarch
2 tsp. lemon juice

Sweet challah for the holiday

By DENISE PHILLIPS
Special to The CJN

There are many special customs for Rosh Hashanah, but one of the most enjoyable is to eat sweet challah in a bid to ensure that the coming year will be sweet and prosperous. In many homes, including my own, we go further, and between Rosh Hashanah and Simchat Torah, we also dip the challah in honey.

There are as many recipes for challah as there are Jewish cooks and cookbooks. Different ethnic traditions call for differences in the recipes. One distinct addition is to sprinkle sesame seeds or poppy seeds on the top of the bread before baking (usually after an egg wash, which helps the seeds stick).

Two loaves of challah are placed on the Sabbath and holiday table. They are always covered with an embroidered cloth so that when the blessing is said over the wine, symbolically it does not get jealous of the bread!

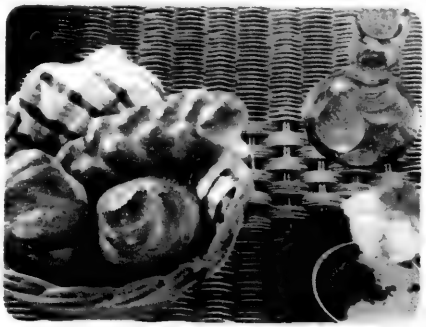
Two loaves are used to remember the double portion of manna that was provided on Friday to the Israelites in the desert following the Exodus from Egypt. Work, such as the gathering of food, is of course banned on the Sabbath, so to avoid this, God cleverly arranged an extra-large delivery the day before!

According to Jewish law, every Jew must eat three meals on Shabbat. Traditionally, a "meal" must include bread, so observant Jews eat challah at the beginning of each Shabbat meal. As Shabbat meals tend to be meat-based, classic challah is made without the addition of dairy products. This distinguishes it from brioches and other enriched European breads, which often contain butter, milk or both.

The term challah also refers to a small piece of dough that is traditionally separated from the rest of the dough before baking. This piece of dough is separated in memory of the portion of dough that was set aside as a tithe for the Jewish priests (kohanim) in the Temple. This is then burnt in the oven when the challah is baked. The mitzvah of separating the challah is one of the three mitzvot performed especially by women (the others are lighting the Shabbat candles and guarding family purity).

This recipe is one of my personal favourites. I have added grated apple so that all the symbolic ingredients of Rosh Hashanah are included. Festival challah is cooked in a spiral shape to signify the circle of life, unlike the regular Friday night challah, which is braided.

2 1/2 cups white flour
1 package dried yeast
2 tsp. salt



1 egg
1 heaping tbsp. clear honey
1 apple, peeled – optional
1/4 cup raisins
2 tsp. cinnamon
1/4 cup vegetable oil
3/4 cup warm water
2 tbsp. sesame seeds for garnish

Combine the flour, yeast, salt, egg, honey, raisins and cinnamon in a mixing bowl. Using a dough hook if available mix the ingredients together. Place the raw eating apple (if using) into a food processor and mix to semi-pureed mixture.

Add this to the bread mixture together with the vegetable oil and warm water. Continue to mix the dough for 2-3 minutes until it is smooth and the mixing bowl is clean.

Remove the dough from the bowl. Lightly grease this bowl with some olive oil. Knead the dough lightly and return it to the mixing bowl to rise. Cover with plastic wrap. Leave in a warm place for 1-1/2 hours or until double in size.

Pre-heat the oven to 400. Knock back the dough. Remove a small piece of dough the size of an olive as the challah tithe and place it on the baking tray. Cut the remaining dough in half. Knead each piece into a long sausage. Curl these into a spiral shape or as desired. Glaze with egg yolk and sesame seeds.

Bake for 30 minutes or until golden and when you turn the bread over, it feels light, and when tapped on the underside, it sounds hollow. Makes two round loaves.

To serve, dip into honey and dust with some cinnamon. Serve slightly warm, if possible.

Different customs – but the same wish for a sweet year

By SYBIL KAPLAN
Special to The CJN

Food customs differ among Jews whose ancestors came from Spain and Portugal, the Mediterranean area and those who came from primarily Muslim Arab countries.

A universal bread such as the round challah that's used by most Ashkenazi families does not seem to be a staple among these groups of Jews. However, among some Moroccan Jews, a bread called khobz is baked for Rosh Hashanah that uses honey to start the yeast although it does not contain eggs and oil. Sesame seeds are sprinkled on top.

Another round, sweet bread similar to challah, called pain pétri, made with sesame seeds and anise seeds, is also served at this holiday by some Moroccan Jews.

Whereas Ashkenazim dip apple in honey, mansanada, a Sephardi apple compote, is traditionally served as an appetizer and dessert by some Sephardim, according to Gil Marks in The World of Jewish Desserts.

According to Rabbi Robert Sternberg in The Sephardi Kitchen, Sephardi Jews have a special ceremony called the Yehi Ratzones (Hebrew for "May it be Thy will"), where each food is blessed with a blessing beginning "Yehi ratzon," which comes from a passage in the Talmud listing seven foods to be eaten as a sign to God that we recognize His sovereignty and hope He will hear our pleas for a good and prosperous year. Apples are eaten baked and dipped in honey or in a compote with a special syrup; sometimes dates instead of apples are dipped in honey; and some people mix sesame seeds and anise seeds with powdered sugar and dip dates into this mixture.

Moroccan Jews take sesame seeds, warm them in the oven and eat them with apple dipped in honey to symbolize that Jews should be fruitful and multiply like the seeds and have a sweet year. They also eat the pomegranate because of the 613 seeds said to be in each one like the 613 mitzvot. They identify the seven autumnal foods as pumpkin, zucchini, turnip, leek, onion, quince and Chinese celery, and sprinkle these with sugar and cinnamon to eat at the beginning of the meal.

One Sephardi custom is to say sheva brachot (seven blessings) over fruits and vegetables whose names resemble words in prayers.

Although perhaps not authentically Sephardi, here are some recipes using these fruits and vegetables.

STUFFED DATES WITH ALMONDS

1 1/4 cups dates
3/4 cup rum or 1 tsp. rum extract plus 1 tsp. vanilla plus 1/2 cup orange juice
1 cup chopped almonds
2 tsp. grated orange peel

Mix rum or rum extract, vanilla and orange juice with almonds and orange peel. Let sit 20 minutes. Cut a slit in each date. Insert stuffing and let sit at room temperature. Makes 8 servings.

BEETS IN ORANGE SAUCE

4 cups cooked, sliced beets
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
2 tbsp. brown sugar
1 cup orange juice
1 tsp. grated orange peel
1 tbsp.cornstarch

In a saucepan, combine oil, sugar, orange juice, orange peel and cornstarch. Cook until thick. Add beets and heat. Makes 6-8 servings.

BRAISED LEEKS

16 washed leeks, cut into 1/2-in. rounds
3 cups chicken soup
4 chopped tomatoes
4 tsp. lemon juice
2 tsp. olive oil
4 minced garlic cloves
salt and pepper to taste
1 cup pitted black olives
minced parsley

Heat chicken soup in a pot. Add leeks, cover and cook 10-15 minutes until leeks are tender. Drain off soup. Add tomatoes, lemon juice, olive oil, garlic, salt, pepper and olives. Continue cooking 5 minutes. Garnish with parsley when serving. Makes 8 servings.

Sweet ending to a holiday meal

Topping

2 cups nondairy whipped topping (or 1 cup whipping cream, whipped)

In cast iron skillet or heavy-bottomed skillet, add sugar and 1/4 cup water. Cook over medium-high heat until sugar is dissolved, stirring only to help dissolve sugar. Reduce heat to medium. Cook, without stirring, for about 8 minutes, or just until amber. Stir in butter, stirring until hardened sugar softens. Add apples. Cook, stirring occasionally, for about 8 minutes or just until apples are tender. With slotted spoon, remove apples to bowl. Bring mixture in skillet to boil; let boil for 3 minutes or until thick. Pour over apples. (Apples can be covered with plastic wrap and refrigerated for up to a day.)

Pavlova: In bowl of electric mixer, beat egg whites until stiff but not dry. With beaters running, gradually add sugar until meringue is shiny and soft. Fold in cornstarch and lemon juice.

Mound meringue mixture onto centre of parchment-lined rimmed baking sheet, spreading it to an 8-inch circle.

Bake in centre of preheated 250-degree oven for 1 hour and 20 minutes. Allow to cool completely. (Pavlova can be kept in a dry area, covered for up to 24 hours).

Break surface of meringue slightly so it's concave. Mound whipping cream on top, covering most of the surface. Arrange apples on top, drizzling extra caramel over. Makes 8 servings.

Rosh Hashanah fare reinvented

By RANDY FINGRUT
Special to The CJN

The High Holidays are an ideal time for families to get together to enjoy a traditional dinner. The dining room table is impeccably set, and what seems like a never ending parade of delicious dishes is presented. The Rosh Hashanah meal is as enjoyable as the Holiday itself.

Now, fast-forward to the days after the holiday is over. What can you do to enjoy the leftover brisket, turkey or chicken, the vegetables and all the potato dishes that are now packed into plastic containers and baggies? Zapping them in the microwave is not the answer! Leaving leftover food forgotten at the back of the fridge is unproductive. With a little imagination, great recipes and a few helpful hints, you can make the most of everything you have left from your Rosh Hashanah dinner.

SUPERIOR SHEPHERD'S PIE

This is the most amazing use of leftover food ever! You can include together leftover brisket, boned turkey or chicken. Along with the meat, you can toss into the processor any carrots and roast potatoes that were cooked with the brisket. For a fancy touch, reserve some mashed potatoes and pipe a trim on the top of the Shepherd's pie. Decorated or not, no one will ever guess this dish was made from leftovers.

4 cups ground cooked brisket, or turkey and brisket (instructions following)
1 cup gravy or leftover chicken soup
Montreal steak spice to taste
1 small onion, peeled and chopped
4 tbsp. margarine divided
12 medium potatoes, peeled and boiled until soft (about 15 minutes)
4 eggs, beaten
2 tbsp. flour
2 tsp. baking powder
salt to taste
white pepper to taste
canola oil spray

Using a food processor, pulse 2 or 3 slices of meat at a time (adding roasted potatoes and carrots if available) until finely chopped; do not over process. Remove to a large bowl and splash with some gravy or stock and sprinkle with Montreal steak spice. Mix well. Repeat until all meat is ground. Mixture should be moist and look somewhat like fresh ground meat.

Sauté onion in 2 tbsp. margarine until soft and mix into ground meat.

Mash or rice potatoes while they are still hot. Make them as smooth as possible. Add eggs, salt and pepper, flour, baking powder and 2 tablespoons margarine and combine. In a 9x11 baking dish sprayed with canola oil, layer first half of the mashed potatoes, all the ground meat mixture and the remaining mashed potatoes. Bake for one hour in a 350-degree oven or until heated through and lightly browned on top. This dish freezes well after it is assembled. Allow extra time to bake if frozen.

Alternative Shepherd's Pie Suggestion: If you have a large leftover portion of potato kugel, omit the mashed potatoes when preparing the shepherd's pie. Instead divide the crunchy top portion of the kugel in half horizontally from the softer bottom of the kugel. (Don't worry if the kugel breaks into pieces.) Layer a greased 9x11 baking dish first with the bottom half of the kugel, all the ground meat mixture, and then the top crunchy layer. Bake in a 350-degree oven for 45 minutes to 1 hour, or until heated through.

Food Ideas for the Holidays

Like my bubbie used to make

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Rosh Hashanah is, of course, a time to contemplate the past year and to pray for a good new year. It is also a time to gather with family around the yom tov table, and often, to reminisce about past years.

When I visit my kids in the United States, I often cook with my grandchildren, some of whom especially love to cook. My 10-year-old grandson Shlomo wants to be a chef when he grows up and to own a restaurant – which got me to reminiscing about my mother, my grandmother and their cooking.

My mother was the worst cook in the world. She could ruin a hard-boiled egg – and sometimes did. I remember her hard-boiled eggs exploding and my father having to get on a ladder to scrape the egg off the ceiling. It was a good thing that my father was in the restaurant business!

Now my grandmother– there was a cook! Her kitchen was the tiniest kitchen I've ever seen in my life, about the size of a small bathroom. But oh, the dishes she turned out in that miniscule space.

My grandmother was born in Russia and came to America in her late 20s with her husband and two children. She never really mastered English (hmm, like her granddaughter in Israel who has yet to master Hebrew), and like so many of her generation, she did not own a cookbook and there was no such thing as a written recipe. Her measuring cup was a "yahrtzeit" glass. She would add "enough" of whatever ingredient she was using until it seemed right.

She would come home from shopping, change into her housedress (shmattah), put the schmaltz (chicken fat) on to cook and get out her wood chopping bowl and begin chopping onions and garlic for the whatever dish she was making – gehakte leber (chopped liver), lungen stew (lung stew), ptcha (jellied calves feet), chicken fricassee, pupiks, stuffed helzel (chicken necks), kishke, knishes or tzibbele kugel (onion kugel). Would you believe I never tasted a sweet kugel until after I was married? Kugels were always salt and pepper kugels or onion kugels. Dessert was usually fruit compote or putter kichel (yummy little yeast cakes with cinnamon and nuts), and for the yamim tovim there was honey cake.

My bubbie died when I was 12; so I never really got a chance to learn to cook from her, but just reminiscing about her cooking makes my mouth water, and I wish I knew how she made some of her delicacies. My mother not being a cook, never learned any of her mother's dishes.

I searched the Internet for chicken fricassee and came up with some wild recipes – some calling for ingredients such as slivered pork and sour cream. Nope, that definitely wasn't the way my bubbie made it.

Many of her dishes remain just fond memories. But I can't help wondering how my grandchildren would like those dishes today. And when they get together on future Rosh Hashanahs, what will they remember about my cooking?

CHICKEN FRICASSEE

This recipe is the closest I could come to the memory of my bubbie's chicken fricassee, which was always served as a first course on Rosh Hashanah. The amounts are flexible as are most of the ingredients. You can also use a cut-up chicken instead of the giblets but the giblets make it more authentic. Do not add livers.

2 large onions, chopped
2 stalks celery, chopped
2 carrots, chopped
5-6 cloves garlic, chopped
2-3 lb. (1-1/2 kg) chicken giblets (necks, gizzards, wings) about 2 tbsp. kosher (coarse) salt pepper to taste
paprika to taste (optional)
1 tbsp. powdered chicken bouillon (optional)
1 lb. ground meat
1 large potato, grated
1 small onion, grated
2 eggs
salt and pepper to taste

Place the vegetables and chicken giblets in a large soup pot or Dutch oven. Add seasoning, cover and simmer for about 1-1/2 hours over low heat. Meanwhile make meatballs. Mix together ground meat, grated potato, onion, eggs, salt and pepper. Form into very small meatballs and add to pot. Cover and simmer about 30 minutes. Serves 6-8 as a main course, 10 as an appetizer.

Note: the vegetables and chicken should give off enough liquid, but if necessary, add some boiling water to ensure you have enough sauce to cook the meatballs.

Comfort food for the holidays

SUPER COLESLAW

Nothing goes better with Shepherd's Pie than a heaping serving of crunchy coleslaw. And the best coleslaw hands down is Super Coleslaw from The Pleasures of your Processor by Noreen Gilletz, now titled The Food Processor Bible (Whitecap Books). I usually double this recipe so that I have enough for the High Holiday meals and well as to go with the shepherd's pie. If you have extra coleslaw, it is excellent as a main dish salad. You can add some salmon or tuna, chilled cooked snow peas, nuts or crunchy Asian salad noodles. Consider adding leftover coleslaw to your favourite sandwich or wrap for a crisp, fresh flavour at lunchtime.

Coleslaw Mixture

1 head cabbage (about 3 lb.)
3 medium carrots, peeled and trimmed
2 cloves garlic, peeled
3 green onions (shallots), cut in 2-in. pieces
1 green pepper, cut in 2-in. chunks

Marinade

1 cup white vinegar
1/2 cup sugar (see note)
3/4 cup oil
1 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. pepper

Slicer: Cut cabbage into wedges to fit feed tube. Discard core. Slice, using very light pressure. (If you prefer a finer texture, you may use the grater.) Empty into a large bowl.

Grater: Cut carrots to fit feed tube crosswise. Grate, using firm pressure. Add to cabbage.

Steel Knife: Drop shallots and garlic through feed tube while machine is running. Process until minced. Add green pepper and process with 2 or 3 very quick on/off turns, until chopped. Do not overprocess. Add to cabbage mixture.

Combine ingredients for marinade in a saucepan and bring to a boil. Pour hot marinade over coleslaw mixture and toss well. Transfer to a large jar, cover tightly and refrigerate. Yields about 12 to 16 servings. Do not freeze.

Note: This coleslaw will keep about 3 to 4 weeks in the refrigerator without becoming soggy. For calorie counters, eliminate all or part of the sugar. Add artificial sweetener to taste to the boiled marinade. If you boil the artificial sweetener, it may produce a bitter after-taste. Coleslaw will not keep as well if made with artificial sweetener.

Thank you to Noreen for this wonderful recipe. This recipe will also appear in the upcoming book The NEW Food Processor Bible, 30th Anniversary Edition (Whitecap Books)

APPLESAUCE CHOCOLATE BUNDT CAKE

Moist and bursting with chocolate flavour, this cake is a great way to use up the apples you have "hanging around" after the Holidays.

8 oz. bittersweet chocolate
1 cup margarine
4 eggs, beaten
1 3/4 cups sugar
1 1/2 cups unsweetened applesauce*
2 tsp. vanilla
2 cups flour
1 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. baking soda
dash of salt

Dice half of the chocolate and reserve. Add remainder of the chocolate to margarine and heat in microwave for one minute. Mix until chocolate is melted. Cool. Add eggs and sugar and blend well. Mix in applesauce and vanilla. Fold in dry ingredients. Mix in diced chocolate.

Spray a Bundt pan (or an angel food pan) with canola oil and pour in batter. Bake in a 350-degree oven for 50-60 minutes or until cake springs back to touch and a toothpick comes out clean. Cool and gently remove from pan to serving platter. If you wish, garnish with melted chocolate, drizzled over top, or sprinkle with icing sugar.

*To prepare homemade applesauce: peel and core 3-4 medium apples, cut into wedges and place in a microwave-safe bowl along with 2 tbsp. water. Cover and cook on high for 6-8 minutes or until apples are soft. Mash until smooth or pureé in processor or blender.

100-year-old is a busy artist

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

If you're looking for Isaac Stricker, who turns 100 years old on Sept. 11, chances are he'll be in the workshop of his Bathurst Manor home working on his stained glass pieces.

Alternatively, he could be in the spare bedroom painting landscapes with oil paints, or bottling the wine he produced from grapes that grow in his garden.

Or he might be at Beth Radom Congregation, where each morning he attends services and has breakfast.

"I need to keep busy. I get up in the morning and do what I have to do. I didn't think about my age until my family started planning my birthday party," he said.

Born in Poland, Stricker left for Argentina, where he lived for 20 years, in 1937. "I wanted to go to Israel, but I missed my turn, because they were only taking married couples. Some people got married, and then got divorced when they got to Israel, but I didn't want to do that."

When he met his future wife Pepi – she died when Stricker was 78 – the only country that would take them was Argentina, because Pepi had a sister there. "We had to leave Poland. We felt like strangers."

He worked as a watchmaker in Argentina, and the couple raised their two daughters, Lola and Dora, and son, Saul, there – he now has six grandchildren and 11 great-grandchildren – until they immigrated to Canada.

"I opened my watchmaking shop at St. Clair Avenue and Oakwood Avenue, and retired when I was 73 because my lease expired."

He moved all his equipment to his home, where it now sits next to his stained glass workshop, in his basement.

His youngest daughter, Dora, said that her father was known for his talent for fixing watches and other pieces of jewelry. "People would approach him at weddings and parties with watches in their hands, asking him to fix them."

He took up oil painting when his wife died. "I took a few classes, and then I did my own thing."

Showing the dozens of landscapes that line the rooms of his home, Stricker said he painted many of them from postcards he picked up in California when he visited his daughter Lola, who lives there.

"When I needed something to do while my paintings were drying, though, I took up stained glass. I get my glass at a special store. I didn't know I was artistic until I started all this. I just wanted to be busy."

Dora said that he takes his work seriously. "He has to be reminded to come upstairs and eat. He donated some pieces to Beth Radom for a fundraiser."

She said that it was only within the last year that her father started taking Wheel-Trans to synagogue and hired a gardener to cut his grass. "I am the mean daughter who insisted upon it, although he does sometimes walk home from shul."

Stricker said the only reason he's celebrating his birthday is because his family is coming from California for the party. "I never think about how old I am."

Jewish outdoor enthusiasts to gather at Tremblant

Compiled by CJN Staff

More than 200 Jewish outdoor enthusiasts are expected to gather in the Mont Tremblant area over the Labour Day weekend for the Mosaic Outdoor Clubs of America's 20th annual international event.

The event, which runs from Sept. 2 to 6 at the Harry Bronfman Y Country Camp, two hours north of Montreal, takes place in a different locales each year, usually in the United States, to unite Jewish adults from around the world with a common interest in wilderness adventure.

Mosaic founder Steve Millmond, who will be on hand to help celebrate the anniversary, was inspired to create the organization after enjoying hikes with Jews in Israel.

"Before Mosaic began, the term 'Jewish outdoor enthusiast' was viewed as an oxymoron in America," Millmond said. "Yet the Jewish people have long embraced the great outdoors, ever since biblical days when Moses traipsed through the desert. So thanks to Mosaic, Jewish outdoor enthusiasts around the world can continue to experience together the awakening of their primal roots as they enjoy the wilderness."

Mosaic is non-profit and volunteer run, with more than 25 clubs in the United States, Canada and Israel.

The festivities include an environmental service project and "green tips" for participants to implement back home.

The Nature Conservancy of Canada (NCC) will also participate in the gathering. NCC's regional vice-president, Nathalie Zinger, will discuss conservation efforts in the region.

Attendees will have the opportunity to hike, bike, kayak, canoe, white-water raft on the Rouge River, rock climb, horseback ride and play a variety of other sports including tennis, basketball and even try canoe hockey.

Also planned are guided nature walks by a naturalist and photographer, nightly entertainment and socializing around a bonfire, and a musical Shabbat and Havdalah service under the stars. The Y Country Camp is set on 650 acres, amid three lakes and two hills. A tour of Montreal before the weekend will also be offered. Mosaic hopes to establish a club here.

This will be Sharon Mittelman's 15th time attending the annual Mosaic event.

"There's nothing like a long weekend where I can forget all about 'real life' and become, once again, a camper. It's a vacation filled with so many things I love to do… hiking, water sports, and spending time outdoors," she said.

"We sleep in cabins, eat at the mess hall, and sit around a campfire. Every year I reconnect with the wonderful friends I've made from across the country, and I always meet new friends and make strong new bonds."

To register, visit www.mosaicoutdoor.org. Included in the cost are cabin accommodations and all meals and snacks, which will be certified kosher, as the camp is.

Cancer survivor discovers love of Judaism and music

Zachary (Zacharia) Salsberg donates a portion of his CD sales to the Starlight Children's Foundation.

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Zachary Salsberg was 11 years old when he was asked to make a wish. Any wish.

His sister hoped for a Disney cruise. But Salsberg wanted a guitar.

Salsberg, now 28, was diagnosed with Burkitts lymphoma, a rare form of cancer, when he was 11. At first, Salsberg's doctor assumed he had the stomach flu.

"I had a stomachache and was feeling flu-like symptoms, but my mother knew there was something much worse going on," Salsberg said. After getting an ultrasound, Salsberg learned that he had a huge mass in his abdomen.

"They did a biopsy, it was a final-stage tumour," he said. "I pretty much almost died. [I had] a collapsed lung, no kidney function. It was just a mess."

It was during his six months of chemotherapy that Salsberg's father called the Starlight Children's Foundation, which works to improve quality of life for children with chronic and life-threatening illnesses.

"They came to my floor and asked me if I had a wish, what would it be," Salsberg said. "For some reason, unbeknownst to myself, I asked for a guitar, an amp and lessons."

After a haze of chemo-induced depression, nausea, hair loss and mouth sores, Salsberg, now in remission for about 17 or 18 years, learned to play his guitar.

"I really just immediately got into it," he said.

Salsberg, who goes by Zacharia when he's performing, spent most of high school in a band called the Steel Toed Sandles.

By his late teens, he started focusing on songwriting and the acoustic guitar.

"I think that I was always drawn toward, you know, storytelling and song crafting," he said.

Wanting a backup plan, Salsberg attended York University, where he went through several programs before settling on psychology, a degree he's still finishing.

In 2006, when Salsberg was in his third year of university, he ran into more medical problems.

"I suffered a major physical trauma. There was severe damage to the right side of my body," he said, adding that, while the trauma remains undiagnosed, doctors thought it might have been due to the amount of sports he played in the past.

"And I couldn't play music for a full year. I couldn't play guitar, I couldn't physically sit upright. I had to drop out of school," he said. "I lost everything that was important to me, save for family and friends."

Trapped in a world of pain, Salsberg started looking to his religion.

"During that time, I started to go back and discover Judaism. I was looking for spirituality. I was looking for just anything."

So the musician took a 10-week course on Judaism given by Aish HaTorah at York University.

"I completely fell in love with it. It gave me a lot of hope and encouragement because my situation was so awful," he said.

Eventually, Salsberg decided to study at a yeshiva in Israel, where he spent two years.

"By then, I had started to get a little bit better and I started to play music again," he said. "I was so inspired, in such a good state of mind, that I wanted to play through the pain."

In Israel, Salsberg met Eli Schwebel, a producer from New York who was visiting the country.

After speaking with Salsberg and hearing him play, Schwebel, who has a studio in Israel, offered to help produce his first album.

"I only had three songs. The next day, I went into the studio and ended up writing 14 songs," Salsberg said.

The CD, called Beautiful Mystery, explores Salsberg's life and illnesses, as epitomized through the title track, Beautiful Mystery.

"That song is just really how I was looking back on my life and seeing… all the difficulties I'd gone through and how they'd always wind up leading towards something profoundly amazing," he said. "I had to go through cancer in order to find music. I had to go through physical and emotional challenges… to find Judaism and… this album."

Salsberg, who sells his CD at concerts and online through iTunes and CD Baby, decided to bring his life full circle and got involved with the Starlight Children's Foundation. He currently donates a portion of every CD sale to the organization and hopes to get a hospital tour going soon.

"I want to continue to play for people and tell them what I've gone through," he said.

Play uses clothes to explore women's lives

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Gemini Award-winner Linda Kash has joined the cast of the multi-award-winning hit Love, Loss, and What I Wore at the Panasonic Theatre.

The play by Nora Ephron and Delia Ephron, based on the best-selling book by Ilene Beckerman, runs at the Panasonic until Oct. 2. Kash, part of a rotating cast, will grace the stage until Sept. 4.

Kash is best known for her 16-year run as the Kraft Philadelphia Cream Cheese angel, which she says she agreed to do because it included flying, and the thought of getting harnessed up sounded like fun.

She is thrilled to be sharing the stage with Lauren Collins from Degrassi: The Next Generation, Cynthia Dale, who starred in Street Legal, Wendy Crewson from Away From Her and 24, and Margot Kidder, best known from Superman and Brothers and Sisters and who Kash says is inspiring.

Love, Loss, and What I Wore began its theatrical run Off-Broadway. It uses clothing and accessories and the memories they trigger to tell stories covering some of life's funniest and most poignant moments.

"The book was written by a woman [Beckerman] who wanted to leave her life's memories to her grandchildren by the clothes that she wore. Nora Ephron and her sister, Delia, explored, reviewed, collected… these stories from women about important pieces of clothing and what [each] means to them," Kash says.

"One of the monologues I do is called The Bathrobe. At the beginning, the woman says clothing means nothing to her… the character has a weight issue. It's quite a departure from the rest of the monologues because clothing is so important in the other monologues. It is only the bathrobe that serves up any memory for her. My other monologue is about a purse… and it's really funny," Kash says.

"Quite a few of the monologues speak about parents, moms in particular, and I just lost my mom in June," says Kash, the daughter of the late conductor Eugene Kash and opera singing star Maureen Forrester. "So, I am just putting my toes back into working because, of course, in any daughter's life – it throws you for a major loop. You have no idea how you are going to react, and I reacted really strongly to my mother's death… it was really tough."

Kash says there are a couple of monologues that hit a nerve with her. "What is clear to me as an actor is I have to open that little wound that is quite fresh. I'm a comedian, I'm quite comfortable with comedy, but there is another colour that I need to play in this, and it's required in the monologue. Otherwise, it would be indulgent. But, it's not easy because it is personal. I think, though, that's what makes older actresses and actors so incredibly interesting, because they have a lifetime worth of experience to tap from. It will be an interesting exploration because it is much rawer than it has ever been for me."

Her entertainment career started at Second City in Toronto. Since then, she's appeared in a number of CanStage productions, and more recently, in Sisters Rosensweig for the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company. Kash's film and television work includes Cinderella Man, Best in Show, Waiting for Guffman, Seinfeld, Third Rock From The Sun, At The Hotel, for which she won a Gemini, and The Joe Blow Show, which she also directed.

In addition, Kash teaches sketch writing and improvisation for Humber College and leads corporate workshops for Beyond the Box. Married to actor Paul O'Sullivan, she is the mother of a blended family of daughters; his – Megan 18, hers – Dylan 15, and theirs – Matilda 10. The couple co-founded a performing arts school called PAPA.

Kash will soon be seen in a short film for Bravo called Rosie Takes the Train. She's also directing an upcoming show about motherhood called Push in which the actresses are all young mothers. She hopes to mount it in November.

For tickets to Love, Loss, and What I Wore, now extended until Oct. 2 at the Panasonic Theatre, 651 Yonge Street, Toronto, call 416-872-1212 or 1-800-461-3333, or go online to www.ticketking.com. For more information go to www.lovelossonstage.ca

THE RIGHT ROAD TO PONTYPOOL RETURNS TO 4TH LINE THEATRE

The 4th Line Theatre of Millbrook, Ont., presents the return of The Right Road to Pontypool, the play by Alex Poch-Goldin that focuses on a Toronto man's dream to establish a summer haven in the village of Pontypool for Jewish immigrant families from Toronto.

The play made its première last year and had a very successful run. The company has decided to restage it to allow more people to see it. Poch-Goldin explains that Pontypool was a summer haven for Toronto Jews, many from Kensington Market, in the heart of Protestant southern Ontario, and that it became a sort of "little Catskills" for Torontonians. Last season's run attracted many people who had spent their summers in Pontypool.

"As a Jew of Russian heritage, discovering this untold history affected me," Poch-Goldin said. "I felt that this story was my story and that I had a responsibility to tell it. Writing The Right Road to Pontypool has been an incredible, eye-opening experience for me, revealing both the dark and lighter aspects of the Jewish experience between 1916 and 1960. Today, it is a cherished memory of a world that was."

The current production is directed by Kim Blackwell and features a cast of 37 including Ellen-Ray Hennessy, Richard Greenblatt, Robert Winslow and Dov Mickelson as the larger-than-life Moishe Bernstein. It runs through Aug. 28. The theatre is north of Port Hope and roughly an hour's drive from Toronto. 1-800-814-0055 or 705-932-4445.

Names in the News: Adam Yauch, an owner of Oscilloscope Laboratories and a founding member of the Beastie Boys, is appealing a rating given by a U.S. classification board for A Film Unfinished, a Nazi propaganda film taken in the Warsaw Ghetto in 1942.

The rating prevents viewers under the age of 17 from seeing the Holocaust documentary unless accompanied by an adult. The rating board explained it made the decision because the movie contains "disturbing images of Holocaust atrocities, including graphic nudity."

"This is too important of a historical document to ban from classrooms," Yauch said. The film was screened at the Sundance Film Festival and at Toronto's Hot Docs festival this year. It's scheduled to be released in Canada in September.

Wickedly satirical film pokes fun at Jews and Muslims

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Infidel, a wicked and timely satire about a Muslim man's identity crisis, reaches Toronto at an inauspicious juncture, when tensions between Jews and Muslims are unfortunately on the rise.

Josh Appignanesi's socially and politically relevant film, which opens here on Aug. 20, is unabashedly irreverent, poking fun at both Jews and Muslims and considering everything within its broad, loopy scope fair game.

Based on an original screenplay by David Baddiel, it is produced by a multicultural team of Muslims, Jews, Christians, Buddhists, Baha'is and atheists.

Above all else, this light-hearted comedy takes gleeful pleasure in puncturing dogmatism (Islamic radicalism), underscoring sanctimoniousness (as exemplified by a blinkered rabbi) and exposing racism (as illustrated by an anti-Semitic Muslim cleric who lashes out at the "Jewish-controlled media" and coyly pretends that he's a moderate).

In other words, nothing is sacred in The Infidel, whose title is really a clever and ironic play on words.

Mahmud Nasir (Omid Djalilj), a second-generation Pakistani Muslim living in London, is happily married to an attractive and much younger woman who has borne him two children.

Although clearly attached to his Islamic faith, he is singularly secular and refuses to wear his religion on his sleeve. As might be expected, he despises Muslim fanatics who arrogantly claim that non-Muslims, or infidels, are beyond the pale.

He particularly dislikes Arshad Al-Masri (Igal Naor), an extremist, know-it-all Muslim preacher. Much to Mahmud's horror and disgust, his son wants to marry Masri's demure stepdaughter.

Amid the turmoil, Mahmud discovers that he was born Jewish, that his real name is Solly Shimshillewitz, and that he was adopted by a Muslim family when he was only two weeks old.

The shocking revelation sets a series of crazy and surreal events into motion.

His head spinning wildly, and with klezmer music blaring mischievously in the background, Mahmud imagines himself dressed in concentration camp garb as an image of a bagel floats across screen.

In his eagerness to learn more about his Jewish background, he surfs the Net, bumping into anti-Zionist and anti-Semitic websites. In a frenzy, he attempts to meet his ailing biological father, an Orthodox Jew. A rigid, unsmiling rabbi stands in his way.

Omid Djalilj, centre, stars in The Infidel.

As well, Mahmud befriends his Jewish neighbour, Lenny Goldberg (Richard Schiff of The West Wing), who has a cynical, perhaps skewed, view of Jews in general and Israelis in particular.

At first, they clash over a parking space – which Mahmud meanly likens to the "occupied territories" – but as Mahmud's curiosity about his Jewish origins mounts, he draws close to Lenny.

In what can best be described as an uproarious scene, Lenny teaches Mahmud how to shrug Jewishly and dance like a character in Fiddler on the Roof. He also introduces him to matzah ball soup, which he doesn't care for, and sits him down to listen to the lush soundtrack from the movie Exodus.

Oy gevalt.

Later, at a bar mitzvah, Mahmud signs a petition castigating the BBC for demonizing Israel and praising Israel for its desire to live in peace with its Arab neighbours.

At the end of the the day, Mahmud remains a fervent Muslim, subscribing to stereotypical visions of Jews and seemingly concurring with a colleague's scurrilous description of the United States as the "United States of Israel."

The notion that he is of Jewish ancestry fills Mahmud with so much dread and anxiety that he initially keeps the secret from family and friends. But when he finally comes out with the unalloyed truth, he feels good about himself and becomes a better person.

The satirical riffs in The Infidel are innocuous and edgy, inducing amusement and even guffaws. In these tense and uncertain times, levity is therapeutic. Regrettably, the jokes in The Infidel do not always conform to good taste. For example, a joke about Rabbi Akiva, a revered figure in Jewish history, falls flat and is utterly tasteless. This, however, is a mere quibble. The Infidel invariably hits the mark resoundingly.

Hilarious novel gets weighted down with numerous characters

The Frozen Rabbi by Steve Stern (Algonquin Books of Chapel Hill)

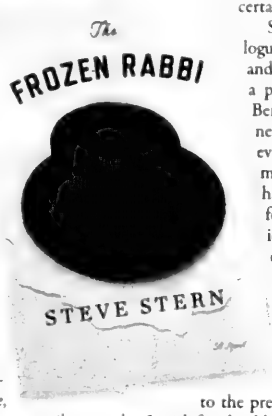
Fifteen-year-old Bernard Karp finds a strange heirloom in the food freezer in the basement of his family's suburban Memphis home: a greenish block of ice containing a frozen rabbi, a Jewish Rip van Winkle lying in peaceful repose as if flash-frozen in the midst of a relaxing afternoon shluff. Confronted at the dinner table, Bernie's father reveals the family secret: "Some people got taxidermied pets in the attic, we got a frozen rabbi in the basement. It's a family tradition."

A century ago in the Karp ancestral shtetl, the holy man was known as Rabbi Eliezer ben Zephyr or the Boibiczer Prodigy for his vast mystical knowledge. One day as he was immersed in a deep meditative trance beside the river, his neshamah travelling the upper realms, he became submerged in the overflowing waters, then frozen as winter set in. Preserved in an icehouse, he was eventually transported to America in a smuggled shipment of fish and caviar.

Steve Stern's fabulist narrative, which rivals anything by Michael Chabon for pure wit and inventiveness, begins in the modern era after a power failure thaws out the Boibiczer Prodigy and brings him back to life. The cryonic rebbe's experience of the "goldene medina" demonstrates the aptness of the Portnoyian contention (courtesy of Philip Roth) that "America is a shikse" that will make even the purest soul stray from the path of righteousness.

Chapters of the book alternate between the recent adventures of Bernie and the rabbi in an America that seems to be forever seeking new heights of crassness and mediocrity, and the historic escapades of various Karp ancestors over the past century as they seek to preserve the ice-block, which has become a solemn and dramatic quest.

Like a semi-comatose patient on life support, the newly cognizant rabbi sits passively in front of the television for weeks, soaking in talk-show trash and infomercials as he regains his strength from the comfort of a La-Z-Boy. "The people, they are such chazzers, all the time gobbling: gobble gobble; they feast on everything that it's in their sight," he observes. "They eat till their bellies swell by them like Goliath his hernia, and shop till their houses bulge from the electronic Nike and the Frederick of Hollywood balconette brassiere, but they ain't satisfied."



Inspired by the elfin mystic with the funny bowler on his head and the funnier bowdlerisms on his lips, Bernie dives into Jewish mysticism and – only in America – quickly becomes adept at gilgul, the transmigration of souls. Meanwhile the rabbi, infected by the low culture around him, tries to catch up on all of the worldly pleasures he missed during his long snooze.

To generate income, he writes a best-selling autobiography called The Ice Sage, markets shtreimls with snap-on raccoon tails, and opens the House of Enlightenment, a storefront business with a six-pointed neon star in the window. Sandwiched "between Uncle Ming's Chinese Take-Out and Layla's Little Piggies Pedicure," the establishment may stink of treif but is immensely successful and, together with his book, catapults the Boibiczer Prodigy onto the media circuit.

Watching the progress of his falling idol, the newly slimmed down and spiritually aware Bernie suspects he is practicing the discipline known as "aliyah tzrichah yeridah, descent for the sake of ascent," an extreme corrective measure he read about in an 18th-century text. But the manoeuvre is spiritually dangerous and its outcome cannot be assured because, as Bernie notes, "Descent is certain while ascent is not."

Stern is a master of Yiddish-inflected dialogue that is reminiscent of Bernard Malamud and deliciously humorous. The book presents a parade of colourful characters including Bernie's ancestors, Shmerl Karp and his business partner Max Feinshmeker, alias Jocheved, a woman who disguises herself as a man to better care for her family's ice-block hand-me-down. Max-Jocheved relies on a few quick sex-change disguises to get the iceman out of serious scrapes. (The holy cake of ice is said to bring a person luck, but it's funny how often the luck turns out to be bad.)

If we attempt to see The Frozen Rabbi as an allegory, the rabbi in the deep-freeze could represent the package of traditional Jewish values handed down to the present generation of secularized American Jewish families like the Karps. The reawakened rebbe seems to summon back to life all sorts of long-dead Jewish responsibilities and obligations. But for many Americans, the allegory seems to imply, the spark of Judaism has long since dwindled and died.

The Frozen Rabbi begins as a lovely book, only there is too much of it by half. The second part of the story seems weighted down like a jetliner with a buildup of ice on its wings. The author introduces too many characters and settings, and too much silly picaresque action. Stern is a very talented writer, but by giving us more he has given us less.

The Frumkiss Family Business by Michael Wex (Alfred A. Knopf Canada)

"Thomas Mann meets Mordecai Richler" is how a press blurb describes this latest novel from the celebrated Yiddishist Michael Wex of Toronto, author of the bestselling non-fiction title Born to Kvetch.

The story centres around Elyokim Faktor, a Yiddish writer and European refugee who arrives in Canada in 1947 and becomes famous over the next half-century as the voice of a children's puppet. The puppet, a dodo bird that kvetches and spouts snappy Yiddishisms on national television, becomes a beloved icon to a generation of Canadian children, like the Friendly Giant or Mr. Dressup.

Touching on the lives of four generations of a big hapless family, The Frumkiss Family Business focuses on Toronto's Jewish community and particularly the enclave of Bathurst Manor. Wex's extensive knowledge of Yiddish culture comes into full play as he gives free reign to his ironic wit and often profane comic sensibility. Even the family moniker "Frumkiss" seems to evoke silliness and bathos in a Dickensian sort of way.

Yes, Wex does remind the reader of Richler at times and chances are this could be his breakthrough novel. His non-fiction has done famously well, but his previous novelistic efforts have not kept pace. However, despite the optimistic insinuations of the publisher, it is still too early to tell whether Frumkiss will do for Toronto what St. Urbain's Horseman or Duddy Kravitz did for Montreal.

Israel should prepare for nuclear attack: analyst

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The probability that Iran or Al Qaeda will launch a nuclear attack on Israel remains low, says an Israeli foreign policy expert.

Nonetheless, Israel should be vigilant and prepare for a nuclear strike launched by Iran or Al Qaeda, both of which want to destroy Israel, adds Chuck Freilich.

Currently a senior fellow at the Belfer Center for Science and International Affairs at Harvard University, he was formerly Israel's deputy national security adviser for foreign affairs and a senior analyst at the Israeli ministry of defence.

In "The Armageddon Scenario: Israel and the Threat of Nuclear Terrorism," a speculative but chilling monograph published recently by the Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Affairs at Bar-Ilan University, Freilich writes, "The primary source of a state-based nuclear terrorist threat to Israel stems today and for the foreseeable future from Iran."

Iran has a deep theological commitment to Israel's destruction, as do groups such as Al Qaeda, Hezbollah, Hamas and Islamic Jihad, he notes in his paper.

But in an interview last week, Freilich said that Iran, which is in the process of developing a nuclear arsenal in the face of United Nations opposition, would more likely use its nuclear capability to manage events in the Middle East rather than attack Israel.

"In the case of Iran, the greater danger stems from the influence that [a nuclear arsenal] will give Iran, rather than the actual chances of a nuclear attack," he said.

"Most experts on Iran believe it is fundamentally rational, even if certainly extremist," he observed. "If this is indeed true, it is hard to imagine that Iran would actually use its nuclear capability against Israel, because of the presumed Israeli retaliation, which would be devastating."

Though unlikely, Iran might provide Hezbollah with nuclear devices to promote Hezbollah's defensive capabilities and enhance Iran's deterrent power and thereby stop Israel from hitting its nuclear sites.

Of more practical concern to Israel, Freilich noted, a nuclear-armed Iran might try to exert influence if another war broke out between Israel and Hezbollah on the one hand and Israel and Syria on the other hand.

Though playing down the possibility of a nuclear assault on Israel by terrorists, Freilich warned that "the risk is extraordinary, and so we must take the threat seriously and take whatever preparations are possible."

In his paper, he says that Al Qaeda, as well as Hamas, Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad, are "millennial movements with dreams of a greater Islamic order, for whom Israel's destruction is a sacred mission."

Freilich quotes Al Qaeda leader Osama Bin Laden as saying that the acquisition of weapons of mass destruction is "a religious duty" and that killing "Americans and their allies is an individual duty for every Muslim."

According to Freilich, Al Qaeda appears to be the only terrorist organization that may be capable of developing a nuclear weapon on its own, although it probably does not yet have the requisite capabilities.

Claiming that Al Qaeda has tried to obtain nuclear technology and materials since the early 1990s, he described it as "the only completely nihilistic actor around and thus undeterrable… and so frightening."

Freilich, in his monograph, says that terrorist groups might acquire the fissile materials needed to build a nuclear bomb by various means.

Countries such as Pakistan and North Korea might sell these materials.

Rogue elements within governments, armed forces and nuclear industries could make illicit sales.

Governments might lose control over existing nuclear stockpiles. Nuclear materials could be stolen or acquired by force or from the black market.

Freilich says that the International Atomic Energy Agency has documented 18 cases of theft of weapons-usable plutonium or highly enriched uranium.

He says that terrorists may attempt to penetrate Israeli airspace with a nuclear bomb placed on a commercial or private plane.

Alternatively, Hezbollah might try to fit its rockets and missiles with nuclear warheads.

A nuclear attack on Israel could be catastrophic, Freilich says. "Just one relatively small bomb detonated in a strategic location, such as Tel Aviv, would have "devastating consequences."

He warns that an Israeli peace agreement with the Palestinian Authority, based on the establishment of an independent Palestinian state, might heighten the risk of nuclear terrorism.

As he puts it in his paper, "A Palestinian state might create a sanctuary for terrorist organizations, which could use its territory, with or without its knowledge and co-operation, to develop and deploy a nuclear bomb on Israel's borders and near major population centres."

He adds in a sombre postscript, "The more Israel is accepted in the region and establishes peaceful relations with Arab states, the more the radicals will be determined to find new ways of achieving their goals."

In his view, Israel has worked hard to prepare for an Iranian or a terrorist nuclear attack. Apart from improving its defences, Israel has conducted exercises simulating a non-conventional missile attack.

Freilich calls on Israel to pay still more attention and allocate more resources to the threat of nuclear terrorism and adopt a "shoot first" policy to deter enemies that wish to destroy it.

Potential perpetrators of nuclear terrorism must be convinced that Israel will retaliate, he writes.

"In the event of a declared nuclear terrorist capability, a stated intention to acquire one, or an advanced suspected one, the known or suspected perpetrator and host country should be attacked with overwhelming and if necessary devastating force, in the attempt to prevent the threat's materialization."

Further, Israel should adopt "a declared retaliatory policy" that holds Iran and/or Al Qaeda responsible for any nuclear attack, regardless of the perpetrator.

'The Schwartz' is an aspiring sportscaster

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

If Launy "The Schwartz" Schwartz plays it right, he'll be the new face of NHL sportscasting in Canada this winter.

The Montreal-born Schwartz – who, despite having lived in Toronto since age two, is an unabashed Habs fan – is pursuing a lifelong dream to become the next big talking head in hockey circles.

This summer, he found out he made the cut for the second season of The Score's reality TV sportscaster contest, Drafted 2.

Its season premiere is on Sept. 14 at 10 p.m. and will mark the start of Schwartz's quest to be the main man behind the hockey mike on The Score next year. The contest winner is scheduled to be named Nov. 30.

In his mind, if all goes according to plan, hockey fans of the future will look back at the list of all-time great NHL broadcasters/commentators and remember the following names: Danny Gallivan, Foster Hewitt, Dick Irvin Jr., Joe Bowen, René Lecavalier, Ron MacLean, Don Cherry and "The Schwartz."

Schwartz, 32, told The CJN he became fascinated with sportscasting as a career in Grade 7, when Bowen spoke at his high school during an assembly.

"It blew my mind," he said. "I thought, 'This is the coolest job,' at least until I told my mom. She advised me to rethink my career aspirations by asking me to look to the future and question whether or not I wanted a job that took me away from my family for much of the year."

At the mention of family, Schwartz reddened with sorrow and recalled how he's had to overcome much personal adversity to get to this point in his life.

His father died of a brain tumour when he was just six years old, and 11 years later, his mother would pass away of a brain aneurism.

Losing parents at such sensitive developmental stages led Schwartz to bear down and pursue his dream with zeal.

"It's still hard during milestones in my life when my parents aren't around. I miss them a lot, especially in good times like these," he said through tears.

Still, Schwartz said he tries to remember the positive lessons he learned from his parents early on. From his father, a collector of Napoleonic artifacts, he learned to try to "achieve something in life that is immortal," he said, while his mother instilled in him a respect for people and for his own inner strength, as well as a pride in being Jewish.

Emblematic of his twin passions, Schwartz proudly sports two giant tattoos – one on each shoulder – of a Magen David and a Montreal Canadiens logo.

"The traditional aspects of Judaism are extremely important to me," he said, adding that although he's secular, "I'm a very passionate Zionist."

He said he decided to use the nickname "The Schwartz" as a way of giving an indirect nod to his Jewishness, as well as to pay tribute to director Mel Brooks' Jewish flair in the movie Spaceballs.

When he isn't trying to become the next face of hockey, Schwartz is a kids' goaltending coach and runs a blog called Hockey54.com, which he promotes as "Facebook for hockey fans."

As of last week, Schwartz led Drafted 2's website-based "Who Has What It Takes" poll with 36 per cent of the vote. His nearest competitor sat at 19 per cent.

Schwartz said one thing that may explain his popularity is his different approach to interviewing players and sports personalities, and the fact he's no rookie.

His love of the game began while playing road hockey as a kid, and he played AA hockey at the "height" of his playing career, he said. But a love for broadcasting pushed him to study journalism at Ryerson University and take internships and co-op positions with Toronto radio shows at Q107 and AM640. All of it served to hone his craft and create a persona that he believes sports celebrities are drawn to.

"Hockey broadcasting, in general, is about emotion," he said. "I try to mix journalistic integrity with fanboy enthusiasm. Why shouldn't the emotion be coming from behind the mike, too? Yes, I'm a fan. But with that in mind, I take my [journalistic] responsibility seriously in order to maintain the trust and respect of the players. And when you establish yourself with them, they take note and come back."

At last year's NHL Awards in Las Vegas, Schwartz and his wife, Dahlia Kurtz – who co-founded Hockey54.com – showed up to the ceremonies and singlehandedly managed to interview more players and NHL brass than almost any other news outlet. It was his second visit to the awards as an interviewer and many players recognized him and returned for interviews with him, remembering him from the previous year. That was a pretty big accomplishment, since the NHL is very "old-school" and doesn't embrace new reporters easily, he said.

Schwartz noted that even if he doesn't win the Drafted 2 contest, he's confident his talent will be noticed just by being on the show.

"This is a reality show, so you never know what's going to happen. But I don't put all my pucks in one net," he said.

"Someone out there will recognize [that] my talent causes fans and athletes to gravitate toward me."

Asked whether or not he's had the opportunity to interview any of the NHL's Jewish players, Schwartz said he hadn't yet, but hopes to interview Montreal's Michael Cammalleri and quiz him about his Jewish roots.

Living wills – a caution

By MICHAEL GORDON

"I have a problem," said the physician on the phone. "I have a long-standing patient suffering from progressive dementia. Years ago she told me of a living will that indicated she did not want tube feedings or 'heroic' measures at the latter stages of her life.

"I read the document. I felt it indicated what she told me. She can no longer eat safely, and her son wants us to insert a feeding tube and is prepared to take legal action to make this happen despite what was written in her living will."

The Senior Side of Life

I mentioned to the physician that we had a number of similar situations in the past few years, and at times were forced to take the legal route and present along with the families to the government's Consent and Capacity Board. It often becomes uncomfortable for all concerned, especially for the staff who feel it is their duty to fulfil patients' wishes when they are challenged by the family members.

"We have to meet to explore the son's reasons to challenge his mother's apparent wishes that were written while she was able to do so and see what can be done to avoid the legal route," my colleague said. "We will try to represent the mother's wishes to fulfil our duty and obligation to her as health-care providers."

I was not surprised, as the ethics and legal literature are replete with cases in which apparently well-meaning children cannot bring themselves to withhold artificial nutrition and hydration (ANH) through a feeding tube because to them, it seems that they are "starving" their loved one to death. Despite explanations by health-care professionals and ethicists to the contrary, the thought of not providing what they interpret as "food and drink" contradicts their instincts to protect their parent, whether or not there are strong religious beliefs held by the acting substitute decision maker (SDM) especially when it's a child.

The concept of an advance directive, commonly called a living will by the lay public, came into existence in the 1980s when the ethical concept of autonomy developed into a dominant theme in North American decision-making. This new ethical force contrasted to what held sway during the preceding decades when beneficence ("doing good") was the predominant theme in health-care decision-making.

Autonomy was accompanied by the complex concept of capacity to make decisions. This has become increasingly complicated by the increasing prevalence of cognitive impairment due to Alzheimer's and other dementias associated with North America's increasingly aging population. With this new equation for decision-making in the context of incapacity to agree to or reject life-maintaining treatments such as ANH, the idea of the living will came into being. The idea was that you could indicate to loved ones what you would want when you could not participate in personal health-care decisions.

Unfortunately, the process frequently fails. To really succeed, you should explain in detail to your SDM what you mean by what you are writing in your living will. To be extra sure, you should discuss with your physician what terms you should use to achieve your goals and to avoid misinterpretation.

If there is doubt that your SDM will adhere to your instructions, you may be better off appointing someone who is not a family member and discuss the matter with a lawyer to ensure that your intentions will be implemented when the need comes. You want to avoid strong, understandable, but misdirected contradictory emotions that lead your loved ones to undermine your expressed wishes.

Survive the holidays without gaining weight

About Nutrition
By LISA WEINBERG

Often at this time of year, countless patients and friends complain about how hard it will be to stick to their "diet" over the many holidays coming up. I believe that with some planning and common sense, you can maintain your eating habits and weight through this time.

Since we know that holidays are coming and know what to expect, we can make a plan that may include working out more often and eating very carefully before the holidays and in between. While we want to enjoy all of the traditional foods we love at the holidays, exercise restraint and practice portion control.

Some ways to avoid overeating are: for those of us hosting meals over the holidays or preparing dishes to take to others, take this as a golden opportunity to include foods that you want to, or can, eat. Make some lighter dishes or offer to bring a lighter dish so that you know there will be options for you.

Second, you can taste everything without over doing it. Remember again plan ahead — if there is going to be at a Rosh Hashanah dinner a soup course, fish course, main course and dessert, consider eating the soup clear, have half of the piece of fish, choose lean protein at the meal like chicken or turkey, limit fatty roasts or fried side dishes, choose vegetables and salads and have just a taste of dessert along with fruit.

Avoid pop, unless it is diet, drink water and limit alcohol. Watch filling up before the meal on hors d'oeuvres like high fat chopped liver or sweet raisin challah with honey and honey cake.

Finally, do not leave tempting leftovers lying around. If there is a lot of food leftover send home care packages with company or freeze for another time, as we all find it hard to resist when it's right in front of us. Shanah tovah!

Pulling a pillar out of the Temple

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

I watched Children Underground and then coverage of Chelsea Clinton's wedding, and I was reminded we are not all created equal, not even close.

Children Underground is a documentary by Edet Belzberg, about five children who live in a subway station in Bucharest, Romania.

For those of us who have homes, family, savings, safety and security, it is unfathomable that an eight-year-old lives on her own, snorts paint to get high, begs for alms and sleeps on cardboard. But that's reality for this little girl and 100 million other street children around the world.

After watching the documentary, I discovered an e-debate on the Internet about Chelsea's wedding cake. Was it $2,000 or $25,000? Her wedding cost between $2 to $5 million. Her wedding dress, a fulsome creation, was made by Vera Wang, not by Oscar De la Renta, as had previously been thought.

The life of the daughter of the former U.S. president Bill Clinton and the lives of street children are about as unequal as one could invent. A loaf of bread to a street kid in Calcutta – there are 11 million street children in India – is what a Mercedes is to an MBA graduate from Harvard. A bath to a 10-year-old Brazilian street kid is tantamount to a weekend on a yacht in Martha's Vineyard to a child of a corporate mogul.

So what? Rich, poor… the disparity of wealth is so obvious, why point it out? What more can we do? The following is a challenge to our community. We can do more.

The High Holidays are approaching. For many, it will be their only time in shul all year. For others, it will be the culmination of a month of spiritual planning. Either way, this period is meant to be very personal – who shall live or who shall die – and gravely important.

It is then that we sense our prayers speak to God and enunciate our lives. During the New Year, many of us feel as if we are standing before our Maker and our words are different – packed with humility and steeped in contriteness.

As citizens of a world that includes Children Underground, let's consider what else we can bring to these holidays. Think about the Romanian child, collateral damage from the Ceausescu regime, who gets a boot to her head and cries like a child would and should.

How about this yom tov we don't purchase new garb, but instead take that money and give it to a charity that helps children, such as Jewish Family & Child, or to One Family Fund, an Israeli organization that supports victims of terror, particularly children orphaned through the actions of suicide bombers. Know that Jewish street kids end up at Toronto's Covenant House. Consider a donation to it.

I know the Temple was laden with gold. I'm aware that we stand before the King of Kings on the High Holidays wanting to do so in finely woven garb. But perhaps this year, we can yank one of those precious pillars out of the Temple and use its worth toward the physical betterment of a child sleeping on cardboard in a hollow edifice, craving for human warmth and touch of love. Maybe in 5771 we determine to forfeit the tailored suits and dresses we are used to and instead drape ourselves in humility. While we are doing so, explain to the Almighty that our modest garb is indeed in His honour.

Learn about the prayers and the reason for the holidays. Forgiveness. Humility. Change. Tzedakah.

Have it fitted. It looks lovely on you.

Jewish community provides a common thread

EDITORIAL

People often refer to "the Jewish community" as if it were a monolithic entity.

As if!

Just like the larger multicultural community, the Jewish community comprises many facets. Among the ways Jews differ from each other is denominational affiliation and level of religious observance, a theme that some of the articles in this supplement touch on.

CJN intern Cara Stern writes about groups that meet the needs of Orthodox Jewish singles who may have limited opportunities to meet other observant singles because of a scarcity of mixed-gender events.

Looking at a different demographic, reporter Rita Poliakov writes about interfaith couples and the issue of maintaining Jewish affiliation for the Jewish partner and children.

As well, contributor Jennifer MacLeod vividly describes her mixed neighbourhood's summer fun fair, where she sells home-made kosher baked goods.

Community is the common thread in these articles. As well, we look at the phenomenon of home-based shuls, Kaddish recitation services, and the future of Bathurst Manor Plaza, the longtime hub of an area with a significant Jewish population.

We also take a look at how the former students of She'arim Hebrew Day School are doing, two years after the school was closed for financial reasons, in a controversial move. She'arim served students with learning disabilities and other special needs.

For a change of pace, Sheldon Kirshner writes about the Jews of Mississippi, a story not so different from those of small communities in Canada.

We may not be monolithic, but we share common touchstones in our religiously and geographically diverse community.

Muffins and Magen Davids: Summer Fun Fair in Arlington Village

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

These days, there's a lot of talk about "finding your tribe," but today, my tribe has found me. I'm squinting into the hot sun on a Sunday afternoon in July, behind a table that is, if not groaning, well stocked with kosher, homemade goodies. All around me in this obscure little park, friends and family from the Jewish community and far beyond swirl and play, occasionally swooping in to buy a muffin.

Fun at the fair: a bouncy castle for kids.

Today is the second Arlington Village Market, Music and Fun Fair, held in Laughlin Park, at the heart of an area often defined by where it's not: south of Eglinton, west of Cedarvale, north of Vaughan Road; kind of close to the subway, a little beyond the nicer parts of Forest Hill.

It's no Bathurst and Lawrence, but there's a growing Jewish presence here nevertheless. The question I always get is, "where do you daven down there?" Like we moved to Antarctica instead of just a few minutes south.

Actually, Arlington Village is loosely bounded by plenty of shuls: Beth Sholom, The Village Shul, Beth Tzedec, Holy Blossom. Beth Lida is relatively close, and even the Forest Hill Jewish Centre has more than a few members living in this enclave.

The name Arlington Village is shiny and new. This area was informally known for years as Cedarvale West, but residents Ellie Bass and Catherine Lucas felt it needed a name of its own and chose Arlington, one of the central streets just west of the Cedarvale ravine, as a focal point. They also started distributing a one-page newsletter and masterminded a series of three fun fairs over the summer.

'People stop to talk about all things Jewish'

"Where do you live again?" I get this a lot at my kids' schools, which are up on Bathurst, of course north of here. They still may not recognize the name Arlington Village, but it is nice to have a place of our own that isn't just a suffix to an existing neighbourhood.

When my older daughter painted grinning Magen Davids on my sign board, along with the words "Kosher Bake Sale," I worried briefly that they might deter people. I thought some might be uneasy at the religious families moving into this area, drawn by its parks, shuls, subway, bike paths, and more.

"What does it mean that it's kosher?" somebody asks in the middle of a flurry of sales: a youngish black woman. I've been mobbed since I got here – not just with the yarmulke crowd, but everybody: black, Hispanic, Asian. I try to answer thoughtfully. "It means that all the ingredients are kosher, everything that goes into it – no pig, certain other animal products. Everything's supervised to make sure nothing else gets in." Not sure where to stop, but I figure that's enough.

I'm happy to be selling baked goods: it makes me conspicuous. I'm surrounded by Jews, many obviously so – the park teems with long skirts, kippot and ball caps – and one bare-headed man remarks in amazement, "I never knew we had so many dati'im [religious people] here."

Former Torontonian Rachel Swirsky is here from Israel (http://www.phony-art.com) selling jewellery in bold, fun designs; Naomi Davids-Brumer, at the table next to me, is mobbed with little girls and their mothers, admiring her handmade hair accessories. Talented Jewish musical performers rock the park, like Mark Weinstock, Little Fingers Music's Charlie Kert and the ethereal-voiced Abigail Lapell (who also happens to be my little sister).

Since I have the food, and the Magen Davids, people stop to talk about all things Jewish. I chat up my weekly backyard kids' Shabbat Party. An older woman approaches to tell me about a kosher bakery on St. Clair. "I don't think it's exactly kosher," I tell her, gently. Indignant, she says they had a large display for Passover. "Maybe the bakery uses kosher ingredients, but they're just not under the COR," I suggest, and her companion agrees as he ushers her along.

Writer adores the mix

My tribe is finding me from all over town, and I love it, but I adore the mix. It's one big reason we live here, despite the obvious difficulty of finding kosher groceries and the lack of religious schools. I love visiting the other vendors, all local and super-friendly, like professional illustrator Sue Todd (http://www.suetodd.com), who sits across from me, displaying and selling her intricate lino-cut prints.

At another table, Stefani, an acquaintance and fellow homeschooling mom, is selling home-sewn hats, papier mâché puppets and other assorted handicrafts. She's already given my younger daughter a free ring. I'm a sucker for puppets and happily hand over some of my profit for a straw-hatted farmer puppet. It feels good to buy it from a neighbour, and I figure the puppet can help out at our next Shabbat party.

The kids here are colour-blind, of course. Religion-blind, all they care about is the bouncy castle, jamming to the music, running, spinning, sliding in the new-last-year playground. At the June fun fair, my son in his yeshiva garb – white shirt, black jacket and pants – stood out like a penguin in the tug-of-war: kids of all sizes, races, backgrounds. Diversity didn't stop them from creaming the other team.

Politicians love this mixed group, circulating, shaking hands, grinning media-friendly smiles in this busy election year. City council hopeful Shimmy Posen and incumbent Joe Mihevc are doing the rounds, along with school trustee candidate Adam Chaleff-Freudenthaler. Current trustee and now council candidate Josh Colle also puts in an appearance.

Synagogues recognize interfaith marriage on the rise

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Sylvia Izzo Hunter spent her childhood living in two worlds. Her mother was Jewish and her father was, well, not.

"My father was I don't know what. Not religious," she said. "It's kind of complicated."

Growing up in Calgary, Izzo Hunter didn't live close to a shul, so she rarely went.

"Nobody in our family did... It just kind of didn't come up," she said.

Holiday time meant celebrating Christmas and Chanukah, Easter and Passover. And that's about it.

"We didn't do anything else really religious."

When Izzo Hunter was 10 years old, around the time her parents divorced, her mother started singing in a Conservative synagogue's choir. It was also around this time that Izzo Hunter started reaching out to her Jewish identity. Which wasn't an easy feat.

"The first time I went to shul was for the bar mitzvah of a son of a friend of [my mom's]. I was probably around eight or nine," she said.

"There was no Sunday school or anything either. You went to a Jewish day school or had no Jewish education."

At 12, Izzo Hunter insisted on having a bat mitzvah.

"I don't remember what made me decide this. I decided I...wanted to get more involved in being actively Jewish."

But even in her bat mitzvah classes, she didn't quite fit in.

"I was kind of a little bit of a fish out of water in my public school. Because of where we lived, I was almost always the only Jewish kid until high school," she said. "In the b'nai mitzvah class, I was the odd one out too because I didn't have two Jewish parents. I was this weird...not really anything."

It was this feeling of being trapped between two worlds that made Izzo Hunter eager to identify with something.

"And what I picked was I am Jewish. I'm going to be Jewish, I'm going to go to shul and learn how to do this thing," she said.

While her level of observance fluctuated over the years, Izzo Hunter's identity stood firm. When it came time to choose a university, she chose York in Toronto because of its large Jewish population.

At York, Izzo Hunter expected to meet a nice Jewish boy. But instead, she ended up falling for a nice boy.

"He's not Jewish, he's not really anything. Religion doesn't really grab him, " she said of her husband, Alex Hunter, who is supportive of his wife's religion.

"He'll participate in whatever we're doing at home. He is pretty friendly to the level of Jewish practice that I'm at right now," said Izzo Hunter, now 36 and living in Toronto.

Hunter even participated in introduction to Judaism courses at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, but he didn't offer to convert.

"I think it was clear from the beginning that he was not headed for conversion, and I'm not comfortable with the idea of someone converting just because they're marrying someone Jewish," Izzo Hunter said. "I didn't feel like it was worth losing this relationship by insisting this was a requirement."

For Izzo Hunter, her daughter's identity was important. Shaina Hunter, now eight, is being raised Jewish.

"If I have a regret about my own childhood, it's not that I didn't have two Jewish parents. It's that I didn't have a stronger sense of the Jewish part of my identity."

Izzo Hunter is determined that this will not happen to Shaina.

While trying to find a place for her daughter in the Jewish community, she came across the Winchevsky Centre, a secular institution with a Sunday school. While Izzo Hunter isn't necessarily secular – she celebrates Jewish holidays and has sung in Beth Tikvah's choir, she did like the centre's sense of community.

School provides Jewish aspect to kids of interfaith couples

"It's more for community than anything else. She's not learning to daven, she's learning to read Hebrew a little bit. She's learning a lot of really interesting stuff [like] the Spanish Jewish experience," she said.

David Abramowitz, who is on the centre's advisory council, has seen a population shift at the school.

"As more of the younger generations intermarried and wanted to retain [Jewish identity] for their kids, we felt we were gaining a population," he said.

For Izzo Hunter, the centre is a place she can feel comfortable.

"I'm always uncomfortable when I go to shul and the big Rosh Hashanah sermon is, 'Don't let your kids marry goyim.' That always creeps me out," she said. "I've been to several services at Toronto shuls where that was the theme of the big sermon of the year; that always sets my teeth on edge a little bit."

At the Winchevsky Centre, this isn't the case.

"It's their decision. In any given year, there may be one or two [children] with intermarried families who will mark Christmas holidays, but we're not interested in that part of their lifestyle," Abramowitz said. "We're glad to pass on a Jewish aspect to their lives."

Izzo Hunter and her family are no longer unique in the Jewish community. According to a 2006 study by Warren Clark, a senior analyst with Statistics Canada, intereligious unions are increasing in the Jewish religious group.

The study, which used data from the 2001 census and the 2002 Ethnic Diversity Survey, reported that, in 2001, 17 per cent of Jewish couples in Canada were in an intereligious union, compared to nine per cent in 1981. The study speculated that this can be attributed to demographics. Since urban centres such as Montreal and Toronto have high Jewish populations, intermarriage could be more likely because of the diversity found in these cities.

Clark also reported that, according to the 2002 Ethnic Diversity Survey, children with intermarried parents were more likely to intermarry.

Toronto's Jewish community hasn't been blind to the rise of interfaith couples.

Temple Sinai, a Reform synagogue, bought about 130 interfaith burial plots in 2008 at the Lambton Mills Jewish Cemetery on Royal York Road. The plots, which provide a place for interfaith couples to be buried, should be ready for use in several months, said Rayner Conway, the synagogue's executive director, adding that this is when the synagogue should have their license for the plots.

"We have member families that need this accommodation. At the time, none of the larger Jewish cemeteries were really entertaining [this idea]. We felt it was a need to service our membership," she said. "We pride ourself to being open and inclusive to interfaith families...We want to offer our interfaith families an opportunity to be buried in a respectful way."

She'arim students two years later: the kids are all right. Or not.

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

"A week doesn't go by where I'm not telling somebody what a shame it is that that school is no longer," says Susan Yalowsky, whose two daughters attended the Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School before it was closed two years ago because of financial difficulties.

For 27 years, She'arim served students from grades 1 through 8 with learning disabilities, attention deficit hyperactivity disorder and mild forms of autism.

At the time of its closing in 2008, 75 students attended the school, and 25 of them graduated that year. She'arim was housed at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, which has been demolished and is being rebuilt as the Prosserman JCC.

In 2008, three programs were created in existing Jewish day schools to serve students who had attended She'arim. For those entering Grade 8, there was a one-year program at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, designed to prepare students for high school.

As well, programs were set up at Netivot HaTorah Day School for Grade 7 students, and at Associated Hebrew Schools for those entering grades 3 to 6. The program is funded by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto at a cost of about $600,000 per year.

But for younger students with needs that might have been met at She'arim, there is no designated program within the Jewish school system.

In April, parents in the new program were invited to meet with Jeff Springer, UJA Federation's chief of corporate operations, who has been overseeing the funding and functioning of the post-She'arim program.

He told them the program would continue for the 2010/2011 year with a Grade 5/6 class and a Grade 7/8 class at Associated. The federation is providing $300,000 of funding for the two classes.

Susan Eklove, right, with her son Ilan

A decision will be made annually about which classes to fund in the future, Springer told The CJN in an e-mail. He said the federation is working with parents to help raise funds for additional classes.

Susan Eklove, a former She'arim parent and a special education teacher by training, is co-chairing an upcoming golf tournament on Aug. 31 (http://www.maxguttmannmemorial.org/).

"My goal is $150,000 to add a class next year, either for Grades 1/2 or 3/4," Eklove said. "There needs to be a quality program for children with learning disabilities, especially for parents committed to sending their children to day school, but I know there's nowhere for children in grades 1, 2, 3 or 4 to go. I'm quite heartbroken about that."

Springer added that the goal is "to raise a total of $150,000 for an additional class in 2011/12, and long-term funding for this additional class to ensure its future viability."

Of the former She'arim students, most of the 15 Grade 8 students who were part of the one-year program at TanenbaumCHAT have continued in the school's pre-existing special education program and "are doing absolutely fine," TanenbaumCHAT's director of education Paul Shaviv told The CJN.

Student needed 'very little' accommodation: mom credits She'arim

Yalowsky says her daughters – Emily, 15, and Sydney, 13 – have had "a great two years." But they wouldn't be where they are without the support they received at She'arim, she added.

Emily was in an academic program at TanenbaumCHAT , with the exceptions of math and Hebrew, while Sydney – the only student from She'arim to proceed to the Toronto Heschel School – needed "very little" accommodation, their mother said.

Both girls are now switching to public school because Jewish day school has become unaffordable, especially with university tuition a consideration for the coming years, Yalowsky said. She said she would like her daughters to continue in some type of Jewish program outside of school hours.

Rebecca Moses, 14, who was a classmate of Sydney's at She'arim, has a two-year jump on entering the public school system.

Although her mother, Ann, had reservations at first about taking Rebecca out of the Jewish school system, she has "totally" changed her mind. "I'm sorry She'arim closed down, but… I have now learned that everything happens for a reason."

Rebecca, Ann said, has done "beautifully" at York Hill Public School, where she attended regular classes for some subjects and special education classes for others. She will enter Grade 9 at Thornhill Secondary School next month.

Among the resources the public school provides is access to a laptop computer with programs designed to meet Rebecca's needs in areas such as reading.

Her mom notes that she has made "a whole new group of friends," and has continued to study Judaic content with a former camp counsellor of hers by phone.

Rebecca Moses

Mark Smiley

Educational consultant Dori Levine, a principal at She'arim from 1989 to 1996, said there are "so many" She'arim alumni who can be counted as success stories. "They went out and became something: married, had families, became independent. They're in careers ranging from accountants to car mechanics to plumbers to doctors to teachers to child care workers. There were just so many who made a life for themselves who wouldn't have had that opportunity [without She'arim]. That was what killed me when the school was destroyed, because I knew many children would go back to sitting at the back of the class."

Sarah, who requested that her last name not be used, attended She'arim from Grade 4 to Grade 8 because of a learning disability. It was only after she started there that she learned strategies to "break down" her work and make it more manageable.

In high school – a Jewish day school where she attended regular mainstream classes – Sarah found classes were "still a struggle, but I was able to keep up enough that I was passing… It probably would have been a lot harder without She'arim."

Home shuls offer comfort, friendliness, congregant says

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

The opening of Beis Malkeinu Congregation, a home-based shul in Thornhill, can be traced back to a dare. A dare that Arnie Gotfryd couldn't resist.

Gotfryd, who runs Beis Malkeinu from his house near Chabad Gate and Bathurst Street, grew up in an assimilated household.

"I thought religion was stupid and didn't participate," said Gotfryd, who is also known as Aryeh."I never spoke to somebody who wore a kippah outside of a synagogue. I spent one hour on shul a year. That was my Jewish life."

In university, he got into an argument with a non-Jewish friend over Gotfryd's policy against dating Jewish girls.

"A gentile friend… called me a bigot," he said. The friend then dared Gotfryd to attend one Jewish event and give Jewish girls a chance. Instead of finding his soulmate, Gotfryd found his religion.

"I thought I was going to meet Jews. Instead, I met Chabad rabbis. They piqued my curiosity. It wasn't their perspectives, it was the teachings. They were so relevant," he said.

At first, Gotfryd, 55, who has a bachelor's degree from the University of Toronto in zoology and a doctorate in applied ecology, spent six hours arguing with the rabbis, determined that they were foolish and wrong.

"I thought I knew everything. What could a rabbi tell me?" he said.

But after a few hours, Gotfryd started to change his mind.

"[They] had answers to all my questions, and questions for my answers," he said. "[The rabbi] left me wondering, maybe there's more to [Judaism]. So I had to explore."

Several years later, Gotfryd, who ended up marrying a Jewish woman, became enthralled by his religion.

Through his Jewish studies, he learned the concept of creating leaders in the Jewish community.

This is what sparked a desire to open a shul.

"My wife and I felt we could dedicate some of our home to outreach," he said, adding that Beis Malkeinu was opened in 1997.

While Gotfryd doesn't like to categorize religion, ("Orthodox, Conservative, Reform are political distinctions and politics make me sneeze," he said), he admitted that his shul is Orthodox and follows Chabad-Lubavitch.

The shul doesn't have a rabbi. Gotfryd and community volunteers lead services four times a week. Beis Malkeinu, which gets a few dozen visitors a week and about 200 in a year, also offers Hebrew classes, lunch-and-learn sessions and lecture series, some of which explore the idea of science and religion.

An important part of Gotfryd's shul is the concept of inclusiveness. The shul tries to offer an environment of comfort and understanding to Jews who may feel alienated or lost in their community, he said.

"I didn't plan this, but eventually we started to deal with post-observant youth – kids who became alienated. Young people need to feel accepted, not judged," Gotfryd said. "A lot of youth will come here but not to other Orthodox shuls because they don't feel they fit."

The size of Gotfryd's shul, which holds about 30 people and is run in his basement, also adds to the comfort level, he said.

"Some people like to be able to reach out and touch the walls. Large places can feel impersonal. Here, you're noticed. You can feel relevant and that's nice."

This is partly why Adam Gorny, who moved to Thornhill two years ago, goes to Beis Malkeinu's Sunday prayer services.

Gorny, 62, first started attending lectures at Beis Malkeinu three years ago, while living in Brampton. Before this, he went to a larger Reform synagogue in Brampton. But it didn't quite feel right.

"[In the Reform synagogue] it seems to be everybody does things on command. You don't have the chance to talk," he said. "There's 100, 1,000 people around you, you don't know who you're dealing with. You try to reach God, but you don't know who's beside you."

Gorny, who now follows Chabad, prefers home-based shuls both because of distance, ("Most of the time to go to [other] synagogues is too far… to walk during Shabbat," he said), and environment.

"We're friends with all the people, we pray together and we eat together on Shabbat," he said. "It offers a much more friendly environment."

Home-based minyanim not a new idea

Arnie Gotfryd runs a shul out of his Thornhill home.

The idea of home-based shuls, or minyanim, where neighbours can get together and daven, isn't new, said Rabbi Steven Schonblum of Beth Radom Congregation, a Conservative egalitarian synagogue.

When Rabbi Schonblum was growing up, having services in someone's basement was fairly common.

"I grew up in this neighbourhood. There were always shtiblach around town and someone who had a large basement or room would start up, I guess you could call it a shul, and they enjoyed the atmosphere in this person's home and started davening there," he said.

Home-based shuls, or shtiblach, are usually found in the Orthodox community, Rabbi Schonblum said.

"You don't see people in the Conservative or Reform world running minyanim out of their basements," he said. "I don't think the concept is conducive to Conservative or Reform Judaism."

This is because Orthodox Judaism encourages daily learning and studying of the Talmud, Rabbi Schonblum said.

Due to this, the rabbi doesn't feel that home-based shuls are threatening larger Reform or Conservative synagogues. Yet.

"If people are going away and spending their time… worshipping in these basement shuls, it'll affect larger shuls. They won't be able to survive," he said.

While Rabbi Martin Berman of Shaar Shalom, a Conservative synagogue, hasn't been personally involved with home-based shuls, synagogue membership is a topic he's familiar with.

"I think every synagogue has worries about membership. Maintaining a large structure requires a large budget. Paying salaries [requires] a large budget," he said.

"[Home minyanim] affect the way synagogues have functioned over the last number of years. If you have a large number of home-based minyanim, a large synagogue can't survive."

Rabbi Berman recognizes the need for smaller, intimate gatherings.

Twice a month, a hashkamah minyan, or early morning prayer group, will meet at Shaar Shalom.

"People need to express themselves religiously," he said. "[A hashkamah minyan] is a smaller, more personal space that people can daven together without a rabbi. These people have certain needs. If the synagogue didn't provide that for them, they might have left and created their own community."

For Rabbi Mendel Chaikin, location of prayer isn't as important as the prayer itself. Rabbi Chaikin is a rabbi at Chabad-Lubavitch of Downtown Toronto, which doesn't yet have a synagogue but offers outreach services to the Jewish community.

Rabbi Chaikin grew up in a home-based shul in Cleveland, where his father was a rabbi.

"It provided regular synagogue services of daily minyan and a Shabbat and holiday minyan plus some classes," he said. "A shul is like a home. Everybody has their style and what they like… everybody finds their niche when it comes to a shul."

Some children at new school are more successful at 'breaking in'

Today she is 23, married, and loves her work as a make-up artist.

"The power of She'arim that set it apart from other special education schools was that… there was always a belief in the possibility of change," said Levine. "There was never a student who had reached the end of the road."

Levine noted that people may question the need for a separate school, because of the possibility of stigmatizing children who go there. While she believes that some children thrive in an integrated program, others "are feeling stupid, or sitting with an aide, or they're withdrawn into a resource room where everybody knows they're different.

"When the policy of inclusion that pervaded the educational community began to be the dominant policy, there was even less support for a separate school," she said.

"There's a place for a school along the continuum of resources for children with special needs."

The services provided by She'arim before it closed – such extras as art and music therapy and social work – "have really not been continued in the [day] school system," said Kathy Manoim, principal of the school from 1996 to 2008.

But Eklove says she "couldn't be happier" with the program at Associated.

Her son Ilan, 12, entered She'arim in Grade 1 and is now going into Grade 7 for his third year in the post-She'arim program at Associated.

"It's a very professional program. The people who are involved are well trained… They really understand these kids."

"There are so many opportunities, and there are nice facilities," said Eklove. "The kids can mingle with other kids, and can gravitate toward where their interests are… They can have gym together and art together."

At the same time, she acknowledged that some children "are more successful in breaking into the school atmosphere than others," a situation another mother lamented in much stronger terms.

Preferring to remain anonymous, Charlene (not her real name) said her child, who has some friends outside of the post-She'arim class, has told her that he has heard it referred to disparagingly.

Charlene has advised a friend whose young child appears to have a learning disability to move her out of the Jewish school system, at least for a couple of years.

"Get her reading going," she told her friend. "Get [Orthodox Jewish day school students] to do their community service and give her Hebrew. Her self-esteem is everything. Forget your Yiddishkeit for now.

"And I'm Orthodox," she added in the interview, stressing the incongruity. "There's nothing in this community for these kids."

As well, Charlene charges that, although students are integrated to a certain extent, Associated is holding back "integratable" kids who would do well in some mainstream classes.

The program at Associated (which is part of the school's Centre for Diverse Learning, commonly referred to as CDL) currently has 20 students in two classes. Two students have graduated.

Among the students are a few who entered the program from Associated, not She'arim. As well, at least two students entered the program from other Jewish day schools.

The school, which uses an "integration coach" to ease the transition for students and teachers, has the final say on who will be integrated, Associated's director of education, Mark Smiley, told The CJN.

"There are children in the [CDL] classes who are academically as strong if not stronger than regular students," he noted. "However, other issues can make it very difficult for them to be in mainstream classrooms."

He said the school does its "utmost" to integrate the newer students into school culture by including them in assemblies and on sports teams, for example.

Eklove considers CDL "a model program" and said her son can "work on his own program in a small class, and if he is able to keep up with the regular class can move into that class. There is opportunity for movement and growth in a sheltered environment. I think that's an excellent thing."

As well, she noted, "if a child in the host school is having a hard time with a certain subject, rather than having to counsel that child out, they can move that child into the special education class."

That said, the program is "new and it's not perfect, but She'arim wasn't perfect either."

Shelli Koenigsberg, who is co-chairing the golf tournament with Eklove and Richard Stoll, said her son Alex, now 10, was "frustrated" when he started school at Associated, because he wasn't learning well. By the end of Grade 2, she said, it was evident that the school didn't have the resources he needed.

Coincidentally, that was the year Associated began the program for post-She'arim students, and the administration agreed to move Alex into the program.

"I don't know if you know how difficult it is to have a child who hates going to school. It's really heart-wrenching," said Koenigsberg. "Within the first half of Grade 3, I couldn't believe the difference. My child was happy. He looked forward to going to school… I'm convinced it was all because of the small class sizes, and because the teachers really looked at each student individually, and understood what they needed."

Why say Kaddish on behalf of a mourner?

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Ron Csillag – a freelance writer and Canadian Jewish News contributor – remembers being shocked and disappointed to receive a phone call from a Jewish institution two days after his father died last October, offering Kaddish recitation in exchange for a charitable donation.

"It was our first full day of shivah. We were all in shock, more or less. I thought it was completely inappropriate and played on our vulnerabilities," said Csillag, a first-time mourner.

He noted that mourners are prohibited from conducting business when they are sitting shivah. As well, he added, "somehow, [the caller] assumes that I won't undertake Kaddish."

A payment for Kaddish recitation is considered a charitable contribution rather than a business transaction, said Rabbi Moshe Stern, spiritual leader of Toronto's Shaarei Tefillah Congregation. He noted that under certain extenuating circumstances – such as when a mourner is the only Torah teacher in a small community, or can prevent great financial loss by means of a telephone call – some business may be permitted, but "generally speaking during the week of shivah, you withdraw from the world."

Avraham Engel, executive vice-president of Toronto's Kollel Avreichim – who makes exactly the type of calls that Csillag received – sees the practice as "a service to the community," but Rabbi Reuven Bulka, spiritual leader of Ottawa's Congregation Machzikei Hadas and author of two books on grieving, believes that such calls during shivah are "at best, questionable."

Rabbi Reuven Bulka

Rabbi Bulka adds, however, that circumstances must be taken into consideration.

The timing is a sensitive matter, said the rabbi. For the shivah – the seven-day mourning period that follows a Jewish funeral – bereaved families "need to be able to mourn properly, and this is a distraction," he added.

But because Kaddish is said at three services a day, every day, beginning just after burial, "you have to act almost immediately – you don't want any days of Kaddish to be lost," said Rabbi Bulka. He hasn't heard of such calls in Ottawa, which has a smaller Jewish community than Toronto.

Like Csillag, Rabbi Bulka, whose congregation is Orthodox, inferred that a call during shivah "presumes that the other person is not saying Kaddish... I think that people have to do due diligence [before they call.] They have to find out what the situation is.

"It's a delicate situation...The person is already in a devastated state. That just adds to the despondency of the moment and is truly inappropriate. Maybe the thing to do, and I'm not even sure that that's the right thing, is for these people to have some sort of arrangement with the funeral home, or even to speak to the rabbi" to ask them to be in touch in a case where Kaddish recitation is needed.

Michael Benjamin, of Toronto's Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel, told The CJN that requests at the funeral home regarding Kaddish recitation have diminished to less than five per cent. He attributes the decrease to the fact that it has become common for women to say Kaddish in the non-Orthodox world. "The need to go to outside agencies has decreased."

When there is a request, newly bereaved families are referred to their synagogues or to institutions including Ner Israel Yeshiva.

"When we discuss the details of the funeral, we talk about the fact that the first Kaddish will be recited at the cemetery," said Benjamin. "We know what the family constellation looks like, and we know their [Jewish denominational] affiliation. We tailor the discussion based on where the family is on the religious spectrum."

Young generation key to synagogue sustainability

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

Synagogues in the Toronto area are fighting to attract young people in order to maintain their numbers and their place in the community.

The biggest challenge is finding a way to appeal to young people in a world of materialistic values – an issue that is fairly consistent across faiths, said François-Pierre Gingras, a retired University of Ottawa professor of political science with a specialization in sociology and religion.

"Our world is more materialistic, and the emphasis is on the individual and getting the most out of life while doing the least possible things," he said. "It varies slightly from one country to another, but it's a worldwide trend."

He said his expertise is not specifically in Judaism, but there are parallels in the trends for all religions in Canadian society.

Rabbi Martin Berman of Shaar Shalom Synagogue echoed these sentiments, saying young people are consumer-oriented and therefore wish to pay for services rendered, rather than to support a synagogue on an ongoing basis.

But "part of membership to a synagogue is an act of tzedakah," he said. "If no one maintains the synagogues, they won't be around when people want them."

Despite the lack of interest, Gingras said, there are still young people who find meaning in organized religion, and they tend to focus on the basic ideas such as the element of charity and helping others, which is a large part of Judaism.

The synagogues with steady or growing numbers tend to credit their success to their appeal to younger families. For example, Adath Israel Congregation has been fairly stable with around 1,900 members, said Bernie Rabinovitch, executive director of the Conservative synagogue.

He attributed the congregation's stability to the shul's location – Bathurst Street and Wilson Avenue, an area where many young families are moving – as well as the synagogue's programs for young families and children, and activities that promote social networking and subsequently word-of-mouth referrals.

It also helps to have a young chairman of their leadership committee, Rabinovitch said.

"We're keeping our ear close to the ground," he said, adding that many of the young people feel comfortable having grown up in the synagogue, as evident from their number of multi-generational families.

Aging demographic is a challenge for congregations

Rabbi Wayne Allen

Randal Schnoor

Beth Sholom Synagogue is finding similar results, with a steady membership of just fewer than 1,000 members over the last five years, largely due to the young families in the neighbourhood, said Barbara Berke, executive director for the Conservative synagogue.

They must make the synagogue relevant to its members, she said, and they do it through family programs and services.

"Our challenge is to be sensitive to the changing needs of the demographics," she said. "We can't blanket everybody."

Rabbi Berman said Shaar Shalom Synagogue's challenge is countering aging demographics. Although the shul's numbers are steady around 550, the congregation is mainly filled with older generations and has few young families.

Carol Van Thyn, a secretary for Solel Congregation of Mississauga, said the Reform temple also has a fairly stable size.

"Because we're the only Reform synagogue in Mississauga, where else are they going to get a Jewish education?" she asked.

With about 330 members, the temple's membership isn't large, but High Holidays tickets are offered separate from membership.

And that is when most Jews are expected to attend synagogue, if at all, according to a 2001 census report by the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Members consist of family units and individuals, and thus the numbers are not indicative of the actual number of people.

Although synagogues may report high levels of membership, this does not equate a high attendance rate, according to the census report.

About 76 per cent of Jews living in Toronto are not regular attendees of synagogue, defined as going to a service at least once a month, the report stated, and the rates are similar to Montreal attendance rates.

Orthodox Jews and "individuals with high levels of ritual adherence" are most likely to attend synagogue, while intermarried Jews are least likely.

"In an Orthodox shul, there's no question that there's a more active membership," said Chuck English, co-chair of the membership committee for Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto, an Orthodox synagogue in Thornhill.

However, he said the shul has felt a small decline in membership over the past few years. Currently, it has about 685 members, a reduction of about 40 from last year.

Beth Tikvah is also facing some of the same hardships, according to Rabbi Wayne Allen.

"We are at a stage where we have plateaued, and there has been evidence of a slight decline," he said, adding that he doesn't know of a single synagogue in Toronto where there is "an overwhelming injection of young families, at least not in the Conservative movement."

This leads to the big question: where are they going?

One answer is that Jewish day schools are taking over the synagogue's role, such as through providing a means of social networking with other Jews, said Randal Schnoor, a professor for the Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies at York University.

He said there is an increasing number of parents asking their children's elementary school teachers to help arrange a bar or bat mitzvah since they don't belong to any synagogue.

Schnoor co-wrote a book with Alex Pomson about this phenomenon using Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School as a case study. He said he is writing another book on how this affects the same students' transitions to high school.

He will then try to understand what happens to these students once they leave these institutions, he said. Will they join synagogues?

David Reed, professor emeritus of pastoral theology at the University of Toronto, said one problem is that culturally, younger generations feel they cannot trust their institutions – any of them, not just religious ones.

"Fifty years ago, we believed that we needed our institutions to protect us from the vagaries of our individualism," he said. "Today that's almost completely reversed."

But attitudes are changing once again, he said, and there is some evidence of late teens and young adults reconsidering their views and going back to these institutions.

And many will return to synagogue once they get married and begin to raise a family, as evident from historical patterns, said Rabbi Berman, though he added that people are getting married later in life.

Regardless of the causes, one thing seems clear: if shuls are going to maintain their size or grow, they must find ways to attract younger people and make them feel it is worthwhile to join a synagogue community.

A visit beyond boundaries

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

Young disabled people crossed language and culture barriers in a unique 10-day exchange experience.

Two Israeli students visited Canada from Renanim, a school in Kiryat Shmona for people with either developmental or physical disabilities, which was destroyed in the Second Lebanon War. A rebuilt version of the school is set for completion in September, said Elaine Goldbach, a social worker for Reena.

Reena is a social service agency for people with developmental handicaps, and aims to give them a setting in which they can experience some independence while keeping themselves safe.

Sandy Keshen, Reena's CEO and president, visited Israel on a mission to help Renanim, said Arlene Margolese, manager of volunteer, faith and cultural services at Reena.

While there, Keshen got the idea to connect Renanim and Reena, both of which have similar philosophies.

In a show of solidarity between Israeli Jews and the Diaspora, Reena organized a 10-day tour that brought two students, Yosef Shmuel and Assaf Biton, both of whom are developmentally delayed, to a Reena group home.

Three Reena clients, Ryan, Zachary, and Hersh, planned and toured the city with these visitors.

"They opened up their home to the visitors, inviting them to stay with them and were wonderful hosts throughout the visit," Margolese said.

Although the clients had very minimal knowledge of Hebrew, and the visitors didn't speak English, they were able to bond through the shared experiences – and even pick up a bit of each other's native languages, Margolese said.

The clients get a lot out of the tour, Goldbach said. "They feel a sense of ownership, and they're involved in the planning."

Although this is the first part of the program, Margolese said she's sure it won't be the last.

"We're hoping this is the beginning of something wonderful," she said. "This year, they came to us, and hopefully in a year, or a little longer, we'll go to them."

But that's not the only goal.

"More importantly, we've established a very close relationship," she said. "We've shown them that the Jewish family is not just [in Israel]. It's everywhere."

The group visited tourist attractions in the Toronto area, as well as Niagara Falls. Among other places, they saw the CN Tower, Ontario Science Centre, and the Rogers Centre for a Toronto Blue Jays game.

But their favourite activity was almost unanimous: Canada's Wonderland. It wasn't originally on the itinerary, but the visiting students wanted to go there, so they altered the plans.

Udi Susan, a teacher at Renanim who accompanied the students on the tour, said it was an important experience for them.

"They're far away from home and family," he said. "It's something they haven't done before."

He bonded with the Reena clients throughout their stay. On one of the last days of the tour, the group ate at Café Sheli in Thornhill, Ont., and at the end of the meal, Ryan jumped on Susan, tackling him playfully.

This restaurant is just one of many companies that gave discounts or donations to Reena to ease the financial cost of sponsoring the exchange students.

"A lot of the Jewish community has been very generous," Margolese said.

Although this exchange was the first in this project, it turned out to be a great success.

"Our guys have been really enthusiastic about the students," said Aaron Spodek, a community social worker for Reena. "The staff provided facilitation in the communicating, but it really hasn't in any way jeopardized or hindered the activities of the students."

And the clients clearly appreciated the opportunity.

"I'm starting to get to know them. I know there's the language barrier, but I'm doing the best I can and enjoying my time with them and likewise," Zachary said.

The new friends added one another on Facebook, and the clients said they would do their best to keep in touch with their Israel friends.

"It's been great. We've been joking around and having a great time," Ryan said. "It will be heartbreaking when they leave."

Orthodox Jews seeking soulmates through singles groups

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

Orthodox Jews looking for love can meet their match through singles groups.

Yeshiva University's YU Connects program aims "to help single undergraduates and alumni meet prospective life partners through singles events and a matchmaking website," said Efrat Sobolofsky, director of the program in New York City.

The program began in 2008, though an international May event helped expand the membership, including one gathering in Toronto.

"It was moving out from being just an individual program to reaching out to different communities to see how they could be more involved and more helpful by increasing opportunities," Sobolofsky said.

"It was kind of like a weekend to alert everybody and raise consciousness that we could all be more helpful and mindful," she said.

"We're trying to break some of the cycles in dating," said Rabbi Kenneth Brander, dean of the Yeshiva University Center for the Jewish Future.

For example, he said, people tend to look for a spouse using a "laundry list of what they want and really aren't looking for somebody who will complete them."

He called it shopping for a spouse instead of looking for a soulmate – a trend that he said is commonplace in the Orthodox community.

"We live in a world with so much information sharing and so little communication," he said. "We're trying to educate communities and leaders about these issues and how they can deconstruct this paradigm."

Aliza Abrams, 27, a participant in the YU Connects program, agreed with these statements and described her generation as the iPod generation, wanting to pick and choose exactly what they want in a person.

"[YU Connects is] working with singles in a productive way to show that it's not about finding a laundry list," she said, "but there's still a lot of work to be done."

She said the website hosts profiles of singles. When a connector decides two people might make a good match, they allow them to see each other's profile. From there, the singles can simply decline if they don't like the potential match's profile.

But the problem is "people are not necessarily good writers," Abrams said. "Not everybody can necessarily write the best description of themselves and not everybody is photogenic."

Therefore, she said events are much better since they can actually meet the potential match face-to-face.

Brooklyn resident Elie Goldstein said he would never have met his fiancée, Chaya, if it hadn't had been for the event. On paper they seemed too different, he said, but through spending time with her at the May Shabbaton, they really got to know each other.

No one is a perfect match, but if you look at the person as opposed to the profile, you can find ways to compromise, he said.

The two are to be married next week.

The worldwide events are not necessarily for Yeshiva University students and alumni, although the "connectors" must have been formally educated in mental health training from the university.

One part of the May event took place in Toronto.

However, organizer Jen Novick said it became more of a social event than a singles event because it brought together married couples in addition to singles.

It's important to have singles groups in Toronto, she said, because some of the communities are so divided socially even if they are so close geographically.

For example, she said some of the Orthodox community in the Downsview area might not know the Thornhill Orthodox Jews. These events allow them to connect.

Although she said she doesn't think any singles found their match at the event, she wouldn't rule out hosting another gathering.

'It's important to engage both members of interfaith couple'

For Rabbi Eleanor Steinman of Temple Sinai, it's important to engage both members of an interfaith couple, even if the non-Jewish partner can't be a member of the shul.

"The importance of keeping the other partner involved has a lot to do with the Jewish family...Though a parent might not be a Jew, they can still have a tremendous impact in supporting the child's religious education," she said.

For Rabbi Steinman, this philosophy means walking a fine line.

"We firmly believe we always need to be in the process of widening our tent and maintaining our culture. It's a balance," she said.

Beth Tikvah Synagogue, a Conservative shul, has also begun to walk the line. The synagogue has had members who were part of interfaith families and, around four times a year, runs a support group for couples and parents of couples who have intermarried.

The group, called "Married Out, Not Opted Out," is an iniative of Beth Tikvah's Men's Club and the Federation of Jewish Men's Clubs.

"People talk about their feelings and dealing with complicated issues such as blending families of different faiths," said Rabbi Wayne Allen of Beth Tikvah.

The program was taken on by the synagogue "in the hopes we'd be able to work with the principle that we should never give up on any Jew, and that in today's day and age, marrying out of love is not itself an indication of the abandonment of Judaism," Rabbi Allen said, adding that non-Jewish partners are welcome to attend services and events at Beth Tikvah.

Moe Horenfeldt, a member of Beth Tikvah's men's club and a keruv co-ordinator, or facilitator, of the program, isn't a stranger to interfaith marriage. In 1995, his oldest son announced that he was marrying outside of his religion.

"He told us and it damn near killed us," Horenfeldt said of himself and his wife. "It was gut wrenching."

Horenfeldt turned to Rabbi Allen for advice.

"If it wasn't for Rabbi Allen, we would have lost the kid. He said, 'You've got to keep them close.'"

The marriage didn't work, but his son remarried another non-Jewish woman. The couple currently lives abroad, but tries to come home for Passover.

"He's our kid... I think he has a feeling towards Judaism and we don't want to disturb that."

Rabbi Chaim Boyarsky of the Chabad Student Network in Ottawa, is critical of interfaith marriage.

"One of the reasons that we don't encourage or allow intermarriage is it's very hard for it to work," he said. "People say they may not care about Judaism, but deep down, they do care, and eventually it does come out."

> 'You may not anticipate how hard it's going to be'

According to Rabbi Boyarsky, differences that seem small become significant over time.

"Marriage is more than love at first sight. We believe marriage is a union of souls... In order to strengthen the whole concept of marriage, we marry for common goals," he said. "A young couple gets married and say they're in love... they'll work out the minor details of Christmas and Chanukah... they don't realize there's more to it."

When Izzo Hunter got married, her mother gave her a similar warning.

"My mother said to me, 'I'm not going to tell you don't do this, because you two clearly love each other. But you may not anticipate how hard it's going to be for you,'" she said.

If her daughter decides to marry outside of her faith, Izzo Hunter will probably have the same talk with her.

"My hope is that she will decide being Jewish is an important thing for her, but my other hope is whether or not she does, she will find something, some way, to be happy."

This year, go back to where it all began...

Networking is important for singles

"I'm a social worker by profession. I like working with people, and I like helping the community," she said, describing this event as a great cause. However, she said next time she would open it to a broader range of people.

A lot of singles said they already knew each other, she said. "If it were to happen again, I would make it more of a singles event than for married couples."

Rabbi Brander stressed he is not an advocate of the idea that every person must be married by a certain age, but rather that everybody who wants to marry should have the opportunity to do so, he said.

Although groups like YU Connects bring together young Jews looking to find a partner, Ronda Stoller Wunsch said she wanted to give the same opportunities to an older demographic.

'It can be difficult to find a match'

"There was a group of singles that was complaining nothing was being done for the over 40 crowd," she said. "It was all for younger singles."

That's why she started her new group dedicated to pairing Orthodox friendly singles over 40.

She explained the parameters as including anybody who likes religious Jews and is Orthodox-friendly.

She described herself as ultra-Orthodox, though she admitted a dislike for the term. She insisted the group does not welcome anti-religious people, though members' degrees of Judaism can range from having a Jewish identity to full Jewish observance.

Although there tends to be a greater number of women than men involved in singles groups, she said, her barbeques generally attract more men than women.

"I haven't figured it out unless it's just that they're big meat eaters," she laughed.

"Personally, I really believe in the importance of networking," she said. "You might not meet anybody that you like but they might know somebody who might be suitable for you."

She said it can be difficult to find a match in the Orthodox community because there are not a lot of mixed events, and some people will only go on dates if a family member, friend, or matchmaker refers the person.

Anybody who decides to attend an event should come with an open mind, she said. The fact that the events are held about every two weeks means that people can really get to know a person through group meetings.

Some attendees are looking for potential marriage partners, while some just want to meet new people and expand their peer group, she explained.

With groups like these actively inviting new members, Orthodox Jews should find it easier to meet their soulmate.

Neighbours and friends gather in Arlington Village

Meanwhile, back at my table, I'm fending off flies, reciting my price list. "How many muffins can I get for 50 cents?" a young girl asks. "One – they're 50 cents each." She hands me 50 cents, but there's been a misunderstanding and she expects two muffins. "That's $1, then." "Oh, well, just one."

To broaden the net, and be on-trend, I've labelled some items as vegan. The beer bread, the brownies, and my masterpiece: the crispy-crusted, savoury onion pletzl that is more sourdough focaccia than my bubby might have liked. They're not only pareve, but eggless, fishless, vegan, and I figure it could be a selling point.

Sadly, a woman buys a vegan brownie only to be disappointed that it's not healthy or life-saving or gluten-free or otherwise particularly virtuous. Frosting made with Tofutti cream cheese is vegan, but health food, it isn't, to the delight of kids whose parents bought them one as a "semi-healthy" snack. Better than Twinkies, maybe.

But it all tastes great, and I'm seeing – and feeding – neighbours and friends from as far afield as Thornhill, talking about food, bread, and Judaism and everything else under the sun. What could be more heimish on the loveliest Sunday in July? Eventually, I'm cleaned out: beer bread, muffins, brownies, pletzl – it's all gone, but it's 6 p.m. already; time to pack it in.

> 'It doesn't get better than this'

It doesn't get better than this. When my friend Ellie Bass – another Village Shul member – announced the first fun fair, I offered to bake because I felt we needed a kosher presence, to show we're proud to live here, and also, selfishly, to make sure my own kids would have something to eat.

What I've discovered is so much more than just a kosher presence; I've reconnected with the reason that I and so many others want to live our lives down here.

The Arlington Village Market, Music and Fun Fair represents the best of Jewish life west of Cedarvale and south of Eglinton: a neighbourhood squarely within two worlds, a full Jewish life in a vibrant, multi-racial and multi-ethnic setting.

The next fun fair – this summer's last – is happening on August 29. Stay tuned on Facebook (search for "Arlington Village Connections") for all the exciting details.

'Optimal thing' is for mourners to say Kaddish themselves

Rabbi Bulka said that he has dealt with families "who couldn't say Kaddish and wanted it said, and that's fine."

However, he added, "the primary, optimal thing is for the people who are responsible to say Kaddish to do so." Children are obligated by Jewish law to say Kaddish for 11 months for a parent who has died, in the presence of a minyan (a traditional prayer quorum of 10).

Aside from the concept of obligation, the basis for saying Kaddish is "the idea that the person continues to affirm the meaning of his life by connecting to God," said Rabbi Bulka. "How's he going to effect that by having someone else do it for him?"

That said, if there are no children, or if a mourner wants to say Kaddish but has limitations – a doctor working in an intensive care unit, for example – grieving relatives are "not only within their rights [to arrange for someone to say Kaddish], but it would be the right thing to do", said Rabbi Bulka.

"Then of course there are those who could and should, but for whatever reason don't want to," he added. "The common denominator is... to take the saying of Kaddish seriously."

Rabbi Bulka said he knows of a number of minyan regulars who say Kaddish on behalf of others at no charge.

He's even said Kaddish for others himself on occasion. He recalls one instance when a congregant anticipated not being at shul for a medical reason. "If you're not in tomorrow morning, I'll say the Kaddish [on your behalf]," the rabbi told him.

Rabbi Moshe Stern

Ron Csillag

Rabbi Stern told The CJN that, in cases where congregants ask him, he arranges to have Kaddish said "reluctantly," and encourages them to say Kaddish themselves.

It's a meaningful way for a son to honour the memory of a parent, said Rabbi Stern. A daughter may say Kaddish, he added, but she has no "chiyuv" [religious obligation.]

Engel told The CJN that the Kollel, an institute for advanced Judaic studies, established 40 years ago, instituted a "Kaddish foundation" following requests by people in the community who wanted Kaddish recited for loved ones.

He places calls to shivah homes a day or two after the funeral, gathering names from newspaper notices or Jewish funeral home websites, and always asks," 'Have you made arrangements [for Kaddish]?" he said.

"In a lot of cases they have a son, or other people in the family that are saying Kaddish."

About 99 per cent of people are "very thankful" for the call, according to Engel.

The Kollel sends a confirmation letter and statement to the person who arranges for the Kaddish to be said. "There's no pressure on anyone to give any money."

The suggested donation for 11 months of Kaddish recitation is $500, and the money goes toward running the institution, paying rabbis and funding scholarships, he added. If someone is unable to pay, "we still take on the Kaddish," said Engel. "The thoughts are that [the person's] soul should have an aliyah. The saying of the Kaddish should elevate the soul of the departed."

"It's better if a child says it, but in a lot of cases, the child doesn't want to, or can't say it. Sometimes there are conflicts with school or work, and they're not able to do it on a regular basis. If there's no member of the family [to say Kaddish], that's where we come in."

In proportion to the Kollel's annual $2 million a year budget, the funding received through the Kaddish Foundation is "minuscule," Engel said.

The name of each deceased person is assigned to a rabbi on the Kollel faculty, Engel explained. The rabbi keeps the Hebrew names in front of him during the service. "It's a great mitzvah, and part of [the rabbi's] duties to service the community."

As for Csillag, he and his family ended up contacting an institution that had not been in touch during the week of shivah.

Why say Kaddish for a total stranger?

At the end of our interview on Kaddish – almost as an aside – Rabbi Bulka raised a question I hadn't thought to ask: "What's the business of some total stranger saying Kaddish?

"You should know the operating logic," he said. "The operating principle is that every single Jew is interconnected with every other Jew... We're responsible for each other. We are guarantors for each other.... it expresses a beautiful idea."

His words took me back to an evening two years ago, when I was saying Kaddish for my father, and was scheduled to cover a talk by an Orthodox rabbi from Israel.

I wanted an aisle seat so that my tape recorder could pick up the speaker's words more clearly.

Given the timing of the Minchah/Ma'ariv service at my synagogue, which was before the talk, I thought the best seats might be taken by the time I arrived. I called the rabbi's contact person to ask if he could save a spot for me.

It occurred to me that explaining the reason for my delay might be awkward if he was from a community where it was not the custom for women to say Kaddish.

But there was no hint of discomfort or disapproval on his part.

No problem, he told me, before adding, to my complete surprise, "Do you want me to say Kaddish for you?"

I was caught off-guard by his question and the genial tone of his voice. To be honest, having a stranger say Kaddish for my father would not have felt right, but I was touched by his offer.

Now, I understand it.

Community plaza to be gentrified... maybe

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Located in the heart of Bathurst Manor, the Bathurst Manor Plaza – also called Wilmington Plaza by locals – is an enduring community gathering spot and familiar ground for residents who need a quick haircut, some groceries at the convenience store, pharmaceuticals or some cash.

But possibly not for much longer, as the plaza's owners are pushing for a complete overhaul of the plaza.

Situated at the corner of Overbrook Place and Wilmington Avenue, the little strip plaza houses decades-old shops and services – the barber shop, tailor shop, bakery and bank have all been staple resources for locals – and once boasted a grocery store, but is now looking a little forlorn.

The plaza's restaurant is frequented by many "Manorites" and provides a homey vibe for its clients; and the Shoppers Drug Mart is an invaluable resource for ailing citizens who rely on the store's pharmacy to fill their prescriptions.

But the plaza has seen better days. Currently, its expansive parking lot is pockmarked by huge potholes, the building's facade is faded, and no less than three stores – the hardware store, grocery store and women's clothing store – have closed up shop and moved elsewhere, causing the plaza to look as if it's slowly morphing into a ghost strip.

All the while, the neighbourhood continues to grow and was recognized as one of the Top 5 areas with the most appreciation in property value in the city earlier this summer by the Toronto Real Estate Board.

On June 29, Toronto's City Planning office held a community consultation meeting with locals to present a plan to rezone the plaza and turn it into a "mixed-use" area. Nearly 350 residents were in attendance.

The building's owner, Kilbarry Holdings Corp., wants to build two six-storey buildings able to accommodate a total of 350 residential units on the upper floors, while maintaining commercial spaces on the ground floors.

Additionally, the owner wants to build 44 townhomes on the site and allot 542 parking spaces to accommodate tenants and customers.

Similar plans to remodel the plaza had been submitted by the owners in 2006 and again in 2007. Each time, locals – a working group consisting of eight residents representing the community's interests – voiced numerous concerns about the rebuilds, and the plans were postponed for more revisions.

According to Cassidy Ritz, the Toronto city planner involved on this file, the most recent meeting proved no different in outcome.

At the June 29 information session, objections to the owner's rebuilding proposal ranged from concerns about a dramatic uptick in traffic congestion and building heights, to the decrease in commercial space allotted, Ritz said.

Ritz told The CJN she was scheduled to meet this week with members of Kilbarry Holdings Corp. and their legal representative, Adam Brown, to get more information about infrastructure issues – such as water main servicing – and parking planning.

Calls to Brown were not returned prior to deadline.

She said while there's no fixed timeline to complete a new plaza, the city would like to close the file on this "soon."

"But the next city council meeting is not until the end of August and there will be no decision made on this until after the [Oct. 25, municipal] elections, when a new council will be sworn in," she said.

In the meantime, it's likely Wilmington Plaza will remain as it is for at least another year, she added.

Bathurst Manor
By Karen Shenfeld

The streets of our childhood carried names of English towns.
We skipped up Wilmington to the public school,
chanting the blocks aloud:
Searle, Brighton, Acton, Combe.
Home was an L-shaped bungalow,
floating on a sea of grass.
Screen doors slammed shut
as we called each other out to play.
We didn't miss a beat, jumping
double Dutch on double driveways, our skirts, upside-down parachutes.
We buried our heads in folded arms, counting down from ten
like Cape Canaveral commanders.
Alone, I traced my finger along the silvered curls of a wrought-iron banister.
I saw colours tremble in the sprinkler's rain.
On our garage's yellow brick,
I used a charcoal chip to scrawl a heart –
my initials and his.
I listened for my ball's bounce, bounding back to my cupped hands
as I spun around the world.
When the summer air cooled like bath water,
we stood behind a sheared hedge,
squinting through the deepening dusk to wait for the wishing star.
What sadness
when the street lamps flickered on,
and our parents hollered bedtime.
We headed in as fireflies flew from ditches, their green luminescence
flashing coded signals of their secret selves.

Toronto poet Karen Shenfeld grew up in Bathurst Manor.

A part of local history

Paul Truster, 54, a lawyer who grew up in the Manor but now lives in Scarborough, said he'd be sad to see the plaza torn down and replaced, but understood times change.

"Naturally I'm sad to see a part of my childhood, and of local history, erased. But that's in the nature of things, and if it were my money involved, I'm sure I'd do whatever made the most sense financially," he said.

Truster said he recalls the plaza's lot being turned into a small amusement park every summer during his youth.

He's also somewhat of an unofficial expert on one of the plaza's most infamous incidents, "the very public murder of Jack Blanc by the bank robber Matthew Kerry Smith (the 'Beatle Bandit') in 1964," he said. "This was national news for over a year. I'm writing and drawing a graphic novel about the case and its repercussions, which I hope and expect to have published by July 24, 2014, the 50th anniversary of the murder."

By that point, all vestiges of the original plaza could be history.

The plaza as it currently stands and concept rendering proposed by Rafael + Bigauskas Architects.

Schools and shuls change Lebovic campus plans

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

As construction for the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus continues, several institutions are finding it difficult to raise funds or pair with partners to be part of the facility.

The $150-million campus, which is part of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Tomorrow campaign, spans 50 acres of land near Bathurst Street and Rutherford Road in Vaughan. Its first phase includes the new Kimel Family Education Centre, which currently houses the northern branch of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

Last year, Beit Rayim Synagogue and School, a Conservative shul in York Region, planned to partner with the Robbins Hebrew Academy (RHA), formerly known as United Synagogue Day School, and move to the campus.

It was reported that the two institutions were planning to join TanenbaumCHAT by spring 2010, but RHA changed its timeline, said Federation spokesperson Howard English.

The Schwartz/Reisman Centre, part of the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus near Bathurst Street and Rutherford Road, should be built by 2012.

"[RHA] did not feel that it was in a position to have a building on the campus," English said. "It was supposed to be partnering with Beit Rayim in a joint-use building… it placed Beit Rayim in a position without a partner."

Claire Sumerlus, RHA's head of school, said the school was unable to meet Beit Rayim's deadline and still has more pre-planning to do before moving to the campus.

"We still have some work to do learning the community… We haven't finished the fundraising," she said, adding that she doesn't know where the spring 2010 deadline came from.

"What we said was we would be there in the future and that is absolutely our intention. These things take time," she said. "I think everything about Lebovic was uncertain… We're hoping to move in for this fall. We just aren't ready. We have lots more homework to do."

That homework includes questions about curriculum and the community, Sumerlus said.

"It's really important to us to be up there, but it isn't a simple process of just building a building. One has to determine the curriculum and what… the population in the area want," she said.

Beit Rayim is still planning to move into the campus, but will likely rent space in the Schwartz/Reisman Centre, which should be ready by 2012, said Irving Siegel, president of the synagogue.

The centre, which will be 100,000 square feet in size, is part of the campus's second phase and will include the Phil Granovsky Sports and Recreation Pavilion, the Goodman Childhood Education Centre and a community arts centre.

For Siegel, being a part of the campus is essential.

"We feel that… [the campus] is going to be the anchor for the Jewish community as we go into the future," Siegel said.

Bialik's plans are delayed

Beit Rayim's Hebrew school is currently operating out of Ross Doan Public School on Weldrick Road in Richmond Hill, but hopes to partner with another institution at the Lebovic campus.

"We're moving full steam ahead with getting on Lebovic. Our plans have been altered a bit. Rather than setting up a building as of this spring, we are now planning to go into a rental situation in the new building," Siegel said, adding that partnering with RHA is still an option.

According to English, Beit Rayim is currently trying to partner with another organization, which can't be named at this time.

"We're pretty confidant that the space that was allocated for [RHA] and Beit Rayim will eventually be used," English said.

Temple Kol Ami, a Reform synagogue in York Region, has also changed its plans to move into the Lebovic campus.

"When [the sale] of our property [on Dufferin Street in York Region] fell through, we didn't have the money to move there," Kol Ami president Cy Charney said.

While the temple's staff and members are disappointed, Charney is optimistic about the shul's future.

"It was unfortunate. We'd love to have been there, but... we can't lick our wounds," Charney said, adding that the temple will continue to hold services and house its Hebrew school at Leo Baeck Day School in Thornhill.

"We're going to beautify our sanctuary and make it wonderful," Charney said. "If anyone has $15 million dollars they want to give us, we'll go back to the campus. [Right now], we're dealing with reality."

Temple Kol Ami was initially supposed to partner with Bialik Hebrew Day School, but will no longer be doing so, said Shana Harris, Bialik's head of school.

While Bialik still plans to open a building on campus, it won't accomplish this by 2012, its original target.

"We would not be ready for that, but we're raising money. Until we get the money that we need... we can't commit," Harris said, adding that she didn't want to comment on why Bialik is not partnering with Temple Kol Ami.

Prosserman JCC to expand healthy living programs

Compiled by CJN Staff

The Prosserman Jewish Community Centre says it will be dramatically expanding its focus on healthy living thanks to a $62,000 provincial grant for new health-promotion initiatives.

The funds will be used to deliver a series of community presentations and seminars that will teach, promote and build skills in areas such as physical activity, healthy eating, mental health, healthy parenting, cancer care and aging.

The presentations will feature discussions by a panel of experts, followed by smaller group seminars on health promotion subjects that will take place for eight to 10 weeks. The presentations will be free, and the seminars will be modestly priced, with subsidies for low-income participants.

The first program starts in November.

The series is part of the Prosserman JCC's Mind/Body/Soul initiative, in partnership with Mount Sinai Hospital and Jewish Family & Child.

"As our community continues to grow, the range of services required to address that growth is expanding as well," said Ted Sokolsky, president and CEO of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

"Promotion of healthy living is clearly a critical need which is being fulfilled by the Prosserman JCC and its partners in this innovative initiative. We thank the Ontario government for making this possible."

The Prosserman Jewish Community Centre opened in July 2009 on UJA Federation's Sherman Campus, at 4588 Bathurst St., in mid-town Toronto.

Housed in a fully accessible building, which is the first phase of the new facility, the Prosserman JCC features a fitness centre (http://www.prosserman-jcc.com/fitness) with state-of-the-art equipment, as well as group exercise classes and other health and wellness programs.

Mississippi Delta's Jews live in the land of the blues

Beth Israel Temple was built in 1929. [Sheldon Kirshner photos]

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

CLARKSDALE, Miss. — The sun beats down hard on the Mississippi Delta as I drive past shimmering green fields of cotton, rice, corn and soybeans.

The Delta, a flat alluvial plain in the northwest corner of Mississippi stretching from Vicksburg in the south to the border of Tennessee in the north, is a rich agricultural area in the poorest state in the United States.

Before the U.S. Civil War in 1861, when Mississippi was one of the wealthiest states in the union, African-American slaves toiled in vast plantations owned by an elite of white planters. Slavery was abolished during the Civil War, but the systems that supplanted it, sharecropping and tenant farming, were almost as oppressive.

Isolated from mainstream American culture, the Delta, dubbed "the most Southern place on earth" by one observer, developed its own distinctive musical traditions. The blues, in particular, was forged on the anvil of desperate poverty and hardship and derived its inspiration from 19th-century work songs, spirituals and ballads.

Clarksdale, one of the Delta's principal towns, played a defining role in the formation of the blues. The blues and Clarksdale are thus inextricably linked.

Clarksdale's Delta Blues Museum is the state's oldest music museum and commemorates legendary entertainers from Muddy Waters and W.C. Handy to B.B. King and Sam Carr. The facility is in a converted railway depot from which countless African-Americans migrated to the north in search of equality and better opportunities.

Clarksdale, which is on the Mississippi Blues Trail and deep in the heart of Dixie, is also the site of the Ground Zero Blues Club, the co-proprietor of which is Hollywood actor Morgan Freeman, a native of Mississippi.

The Riverside Hotel, a haunt of African-American blues musicians prior to the 1960s civil rights era and formerly a black hospital, and the Cat Head Delta Blues & Folk Art shop, a remarkably interesting store filled with CDs and artifacts, are also found in Clarksdale.

Historically, Mississippi's minuscule Jewish population was concentrated in the Delta, says Stuart Rockoff, director of the history department of the Goldring Woldenberg Institute of Southern Jewish Life in Jackson, the state capital.

By the mid-20th century, Clarksdale's Beth Israel Temple, a Moorish-style building erected in 1929, was the largest synagogue in Mississippi, according to a story in the Clarksdale Press Register published in 1994.

The 1920s were the heyday of Mississippi's Jewish community, observes Rockoff, whose institute provides educational, cultural and rabbinic services to isolated communities and preserves the Southern Jewish experience.

Magnolia State population down to 1,500

George Hirsberg and his wife, Goldie, at the Delta Blues Museum in Clarksdale

The Jewish population of Mississippi, a state once synonymous with the worst excesses of racism, reached its peak in 1927, with 6,420 Jews, and has since declined steadily. By all accounts, only 1,500 Jews live in Mississippi today, concentrated in Jackson, with some 600 Jews. But more than 70 years ago, when segregation seemed indestructible, the Delta was the centre of Jewish life in Mississippi.

The Delta's Jewish population in the 1930s was about 2,300. Apart from Clarksdale, where the renowned playwright Tennessee Williams grew up, Jews lived in towns such as Cleveland, Greenwood, Yazoo City, Marks and Indianola. Many of the dry goods shops there were owned and operated by Jewish merchants.

With the decline of Mississippi's rural economy, the rise of national retail chains and the flight of college-educated Jewish professionals to Sun Belt cities such as Atlanta and Houston, the Jewish community in the Delta contracted drastically, says Rockoff, who was born and raised in Texas.

By his estimation, there are no more than 200 to 300 Jews left in the Delta today, the majority of whom are seniors.

Clarksdale itself, whose population of 19,000 is African-American by a two-thirds margin, is down to merely seven Jewish families.

Its ornate synagogue, decorated with stained glass windows engraved with the names of long-dead donors and adorned with posters with verses from the New Testament, was sold several years ago and has been converted into a church.

Jews from what is now Germany arrived in Clarksdale, in Coahoma county, shortly after its founding in 1869. They were joined by Jews fleeing czarist oppression in the Russian empire and by a mixture of Lebanese, Italian and Chinese immigrants, some of whose descendants still live in Clarksdale.

Not being farmers, the Jews became artisans, tailors, pedlars and shopkeepers.

Clarksdale's first synagogue, at 69 Delta Ave., was opened in 1909, when the future of the Jewish community seemed limitless. Shortly afterward, Abe Isaacson, a circus performer, stopped in Clarksdale with his troupe.

Isaacson, whose papers are deposited in Clarksdale's Carnegie Public Library, wrote, "I was curious to know how many Jewish families lived in this small town, which numbered about 4,500 people at that time. So I made the acquaintance of one of the [Jewish] storekeepers, who had a place of business on Sunflower Avenue. He told me that there were 14 or 15 Jewish families in town, mostly newcomers from Russia and Poland."

Most of the families, he reported, were poor and could hardly make a living. "Some were pedlars in the country, walking with heavy packs on their backs for miles and miles."

Beth Israel's cantor, the Rev. Freiman, had a variety of duties, wrote Isaacson. He chanted prayers on Saturdays and high holidays, conducted marriage ceremonies, bar mitzvahs and funeral services, and taught children Hebrew prayers.

Beth Israel's original building was sold to a lawyer to help pay for a new shul, which was finished in the year the Great Depression began. Today, the beige-brick building with green-trimmed windows is vacant, said Kappi Allen of the Coahoma County Tourism Commission.

Jews adapted to Southern way of life

According to Isaacson, a Reform rabbi from Chicago was hired to lead the new congregation. "He did away with the old Hebrew language prayer books... and brought with him a number of prayer books written in English [that] our older citizens didn't like at all. He also objected to people wearing hats in shul."

> 'It's a small town, and you had to make a living'

After World War II, Clarksdale's Jewish population was almost 300, says Rockoff.

Fully integrated, the Jews of Clarksdale adapted to the Southern way of life, remaining silent in the face of racist Jim Crow laws and regulations.

"It's a small town, and you had to make a living," said George Hirsberg, a 73-year-old chartered accountant who was born in Clarksdale. His ancestors immigrated to the United States from Latvia in the 19th century and his grandfather, Jacob, a pedlar, settled in Clarksdale in the 1880s.

By 1970, 100 families belonged to Beth Israel, which is located at 410 Catalpa St. Many of its congregants were doctors, lawyers and accountants, like Hirsberg, whom I met through Allen at the Delta Blues Museum one hot and sunny morning last month.

Hirsberg's wife, Goldie, 70, was born in Hattiesburg, a town in southern Mississippi, and has lived in Clarksdale for the past 50 years or so.

By the mid-1990s, with cotton farming not as lucrative as it used to be and with Clarksdale having effectively become a bedroom suburb of Memphis, Tennessee, about an hour's drive away, Beth Israel's membership had declined to 19 families. The synagogue could no longer be maintained.

Goldie Hirsberg laments the precipitous decline of Clarksdale's Jewish community.

"We were very active," she said in a soft Mississippi drawl. "We did everything."

Her husband also feels a sense of loss. "Until 15 or 20 years ago, this was a vibrant community," he recalled. "We had a full-time rabbi, and now we have nobody."

Nonetheless, the Hirsbergs intend to remain in Clarksdale. "It's home," said George. "We don't have any plans to move."

The old and now vacated Beth Israel Temple.

Larger institutions offer more services than home shuls

While some people enjoy the atmosphere of larger shuls, others see the benefit of smaller ones, Rabbi Chaikin said.

"When someone goes to a home-based shul, it's very cosy… the community becomes very close. In a big shul, you're a drop in the bucket," he said.

Rabbi Wayne Allen of Beth Tikvah, a Conservative synagogue, understands why some people would choose home-based minyanim, but still sees a need for larger synagogues.

"They're not shuls, they're minyanim that are operating in homes. A shul is an institution that offers a wider variety of services," he said.

"Home-based minyanim provide an opportunity for individuals to come together for the purpose of prayer, but it rarely offers an opportunity for other things, for social activities, educational activities. Those essential services are provided by larger institutions."

Still, the rabbi recognizes the benefits of a smaller place to pray.

"I think they serve a convenience need for people who are looking for something that is more neighbourhood-based. Most of the synagogues, especially larger ones, are not neccesarily where the Jewish communities are living," he said.

"Some like the intimacy of a smaller group rather than the large facilities that have enormous numbers… and people feel they are just another person rather than a valued individual."

Home-based shuls in York Region have recently faced an issue of bylaws.

The City of Vaughan is currently considering amending zoning bylaws that would affect shuls operating out of residential homes. Amendments to the bylaw – Bylaw 188, would mean that the minimum lot frontage would change from 20 metres to 30 and the lot would have to abut a street with a minimum right-of-way of 26 metres or more.

Home shuls face bylaw issue in York Region

Parking changes could also be implemented through a separate zoning bylaw.

These changes could mean that shuls like Beis Malkeinu would not conform to the new bylaw.

Ward 5 Councillor Alan Shefman, a proponent of the amendment, said home-based shuls could cause safety concerns.

"There are a number of situations where businesses establish in residential homes and residents get very upset. Things like increased traffic, parking. Religious institutions sometimes get themselves in the same sort of situations where there may be events taking place… that overwhelm the area," he said. "One of my greatest concerns is safety. Looking at the size of even large homes, there's a limited capacity for people to be in that location."

Shefman admits that large parties cause similar situations, but says that this is different.

"[This is] on an ongoing basis, where people are praying or gathering," he said, adding that, in terms of parking issues, while Orthodox Jews don't drive during Shabbat, they do during other services or events.

Before going through with the amendments, Shefman and the City of Vaughan will consult with the community, most likely in late fall.

Gotfryd, who attended a June 1 committee meeting open to the public about the issue, doesn't think his shul poses a problem.

"Even though a few [community members at the meeting] were strongly against parking issues, none of them had a a problem with people praying. It was all about access to parking and safety of children… and that can be [ensured] by enforcing existing bylaws," he said.

"The government has no right to tell people where to pray, and they realize that."

Israel, PA to resume direct talks

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton announced last Friday that Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) will resume direct negotiations for the establishment of a Palestinian state. The talks will be inaugurated at a two-day summit in Washington that follows an 18-month lull in the negotiations.

In addition to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, U.S. President Barack Obama has invited to the summit Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, Jordan's King Abdullah II and former British prime minister Tony Blair, head of the Middle East Quartet – the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations.

Obama will hold separate meetings with each of the leaders at the White House on Sept. 1, and will then host a joint dinner. The inauguration ceremony will take place a day later under Clinton's auspices. The event will probably include speeches by the leaders and initial negotiations about the first round of talks, which are likely to take place shortly thereafter.

Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, left, and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas are scheduled to meet face to face in Washington on Sept. 2. [Flash90 photos]

Sources close to Netanyahu said on Saturday that most of the negotiations will take place in Israel or the Middle East region and not in the United States.

Both Clinton and U.S. special Mideast peace envoy George Mitchell said the negotiations will aim to reach a permanent settlement and the establishment of a Palestinian state within a year. They said the negotiations will focus on all core issues: Jerusalem, borders, refugees, security, settlements and water.

Clinton noted that there will be no preconditions. Nor did she mention the Sept. 26 expiry of the freeze on settlement construction in the West Bank.

PM expresses sympathy for Schalit

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Prime Minister Stephen Harper said he wishes Canada could do more for kidnapped Israel Defence Forces soldier Gilad Schalit.

He made the remark while on a stopover in Toronto last week, where he attended a "cultural media roundtable" for reporters representing the city's faith communities.

Aside from The CJN, present at the table were journalists from Indian, Sikh, Italian, Polish, Greek, Korean, Chinese and Caribbean news outlets.

The CJN was allowed two questions, both of which were submitted ahead of time.

Asked about what Canada is doing to help Israel secure information about the condition of kidnapped Israel Defence Forces soldier Gilad Schalit – a captive of Hamas in Gaza for more than four years – Harper said he wished there was more to be done.

Stephen Harper

"We have called repeatedly for his release, [but] the regime that holds him is not one that is terribly given to respond to international pressure or respect international law in any way, shape or form," Harper said.

"We have great sympathy for him, his family and all those who know him. He stands as a symbol and remembrance that terrorism is a very real fact in Israel's day-to-day existence. He is a symbol of that reality and of the complete lawlessness of those in that region who threaten Israel's existence."

Regarding Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's quest to acquire nuclear weapons, Harper was asked whether he thinks the government's recently augmented economic sanctions against Iran are working and whether there's a set time frame to allow political deterrence to work before more action is taken.

He said the Canadian government continues to be "very worried" about Ahmadinejad's regime, although it has "no quarrel" with the Iranian people.

"We sympathize deeply with the widespread democratic and human rights abuses that exist within that country. That said, that regime, in our opinion, unequivocally wants to gain nuclear weapons. And Iran gaining this capacity, would be a very grave security threat to the region and the world."

Munich Planner Dies

AMMAN — Amin al-Hindi, a planner of the 1972 attack on Israel's Olympic team in Munich and one of the founders of the Palestinian security services, died Aug. 17 in Amman of liver and pancreatic cancer. He was 70. Eleven Israeli athletes were kidnapped and later killed during the Munich Olympics, along with five Palestinians and a German police officer. The massacre's main architect, Mohammed Daoud Odeh, died in July at age 73.

L.A. Bomb Scare

LOS ANGELES — An Aug. 16 bomb scare closed streets near the Israeli Consulate in Los Angeles. Police checked two unattended suitcases outside the building and cordoned off part of Wilshire Boulevard, where the consulate and other Jewish organizations are located, for several hours. The area was declared safe just after noon. On Dec. 18, 2007, the building, which houses the consulate, the Jewish Agency, Young Judea and the Israeli Scouts, was evacuated after a bomb threat that turned out to be a false alarm.

Nazi App Removed

SAN JOSE — Google removed Nazi-related applications from its Android downloads after protests from Jewish users. Google removed the apps from search results Aug. 13, PC Magazine reported. Google said in a statement that the apps were "upsetting" and violated its terms of service. The apps came up in a search for the word "Jewish" in the Android App Marketplace. An Adolf Hitler-themed app was selling for $2.99 a download.

Imams Visit Camps

NEW YORK — Eight U.S. Muslim leaders who visited concentration camps and met with Holocaust survivors signed a statement condemning Holocaust denial and anti-Semitism. The Aug. 7-11 trip, which aimed to help fight Holocaust denial among Muslims, featured visits to Dachau and Auschwitz. Among the participants was Laila Muhammad of Chicago, daughter of American Muslim leader W.D. Muhammad and granddaughter of Elijah Muhammad, former leader of the Nation of Islam. The trip was sponsored by Germany's Konrad Adenauer Foundation and the Center for Interreligious Understanding, a New Jersey-based interfaith group.

Heroes Wanted

NEW YORK — The Jewish Federations of North America has opened voting for its community hero nominees. One community hero of the year and four finalists will be named at the federations' General Assembly in New Orleans Nov. 7-9. Judges will pick the winner from the 20 nominees who get the most online votes. That person will win a $25,000 grant for his or her work. The 2009 campaign garnered 500,000 votes for hundreds of nominees.

Black Artists Sing Jewish Classics

Mayoralty candidates attend seniors debate

What started off early as a concerted attack on front-running mayoralty candidate Rob Ford eventually moved smoothly into a debate on issues of concern to seniors as Toronto's would-be mayors engaged in a debate at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation last Thursday morning.

Organized by the Association of Jewish Seniors (AJS) and the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC), the Aug. 19 event featured the five leading candidates: Rocco Rossi, George Smitherman, Joe Pantalone, Sarah Thomson and Ford.

In his opening remarks, Rossi told the 200 gathered seniors that the most important quality in any candidate is "the truth." The remark was aimed at Ford, who earlier that morning had confessed to being charged with possession of marijuana and driving under the influence while on a trip to Florida in 1999.

Rossi's remark drew jeers from the crowd, who seemed to want a debate on the issues and appeared uninterested in character attacks.

"Tell us what you stand for," shouted one senior from the back of the hall.

Smitherman's opening statement also took aim at Ford for remarks he made last week about the ability of the city to take in new immigrants when it's having trouble, he said, serving its 2.5 million existing citizens.

"Diversity is our strength. This is an issue that's important to the Jewish community," Smitherman said. "We can count on organizations like Baycrest, UJA Federation and Mount Sinai. I want to discuss the things you need as seniors in order to thrive and live in dignity."

Thomson, founder of Women's Post magazine, opened by saying she would bring a fresh perspective that combined her history of success as a businesswoman with the goal of running the city like a "well-run household," saying it needs to spend money but take care of people at the same time.

In the course of answering questions posed by moderator Michael Friedman, CJPAC's director of operations, Rossi –

The core of the problem

From the editor's desk...

A small, somewhat innocuous-looking item regarding Palestinians in Lebanon made the round of international news emanating from the Middle East last week. Indeed it appeared so unexceptional that most western media overlooked it altogether.

But the story itself and the far-reaching truths that are the factual foundation for the story deserve a great deal of publicity. For they are far from innocuous.

Indeed they touch the very heart of the burden that makes peace between Israelis and Palestinians so heavy a lift.

Lebanon's Parliament enacted legislation that allows Palestinian refugees to apply for work in a wider category of employment fields than they had previously been permitted.

The Beirut Daily Star, curiously relying on an Agence France Press (AFP) report, wrote the following about the legislative initiative: "Lebanon's Parliament adopted Tuesday [Aug. 17] a law granting wider employment rights to some 400,000 Palestinians in the country, revoking a ban that had barred the refugees from tens of professions for years."

The law cancels former restrictions on employment for Palestinian refugees. They will now be considered as "foreign workers" who will have the right to work in a wider array of job categories along with other officially recognized foreign workers. In some cases, too, social security benefits will be made available to them as well.

Certain jobs, however, will still be denied them, such as physician, lawyer and police officer, and they are not allowed to join the army. These positions are reserved for Lebanese citizens alone.

Although some human rights groups applauded the Lebanese lawmakers for their initiative, the situation for Palestinians in Lebanon is still, for the most part, a portrait in penury and misery.

As the Beirut Star article pointed out, "the thorny issue of the Palestinians is far from resolved, as they continue to live off UN handouts in destitute conditions in a dozen camps across the country and are still deprived of health care, the right to own property and the right to citizenship, among others."

The precise number of Palestinians living in Lebanon is unclear.

According to the Beirut Star, "the UN agency for Palestinian refugees [UNRWA] estimates Lebanon today houses 400,000 Palestinians, but Lebanese officials estimate no more than 300,000 refugees actually reside in the country as UNRWA does not strike off its lists those who emigrate."

Since the vast majority of the Palestinians who live now in Lebanon were born in Lebanon, it is quite appropriate to ask why they are still considered refugees. Lebanon's ongoing policy of maintaining their status as stateless persons is in keeping with the policies of the Arab League after Israel's War of Independence in 1948 to enable Palestinians to consider themselves perpetually aggrieved and victimized by the Jewish state.

In his According to Reports column in The CJN last week, Paul Michael's cast a brilliant, high beam of light onto the 63-year-old claim by the Palestinians to the enveloping, wrap-around mantle of refugee status and of the role of UNRWA as the hard-bitten, ideologically politicized seamstress of that mantle these past three score and more years.

Michaels pointed to an Aug. 7 column in the National Post by Robert Fulford that exposes UNRWA's work as "a historic con game."

Michaels noted that through the interplay of the United Nations High Commission on Refugees, which deals with helping refugees around the world except for the Palestinian refugees, who have their own aid agency, the UNRWA, the United Nations has effectively "no practical interest in resolving the Palestinians' refugee status. Above all, the insistence of the 'right of return' [even in principle] of millions of Palestinians to present-day Israel is a prescription for ongoing conflict with the Jewish state, if not its destruction."

The ongoing existence of UNRWA is evidence of the impossibility of Israel ever receiving fair, balanced, equitable treatment at the hands of the United Nations General Assembly and its committee systems.

UNRWA's existence is also evidence of the cynical, uncaring, unfeeling dispositions the members of the Arab League truly bear for their brethren Palestinians.

Last week, a second somewhat innocuous-looking item regarding Palestinians made the round of international news that makes this ever so plain for all the world to see.

According to AFP, "UNRWA warned that it is running an $84-million deficit that could soon force it to shut schools and clinics in the Gaza Strip. Adnan Abu Hasna, a spokesperson for UNRWA, said, 'This will force UNRWA to take steps towards closing institutions, schools and clinics in the Gaza Strip beginning in September.'" He added that Arab states are to blame in part, having paid only for 1.5 per cent of UNRWA's budget when they pledged to pay 7.5 per cent, but that Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and the United Arab Emirates had paid their dues.

Fulford was so absolutely correct in referring to UNRWA as a "historic game." But as history will yet show, the individuals who were most conned of the truth, most deprived of their futures by UNRWA, were the Palestinians.

Friends group offer unique mission to Israel

Golfers tee off in Caesarea

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The first hole at the Caesarea golf course is a dogleg right with bunkers on either side that, with the wind behind you, plays at 5,770 miles, longer than your standard opening hole.

Well, for Israeli club members it doesn't play quite that long but for a small group of Canadian and American golfers, getting to the tee box at the first hole in Caesarea is something more than a short drive to the local country club.

About a dozen North Americans will venture on to the new Pete Dye-remodelled course in early October as part of the first ever Friends of Tel Aviv University Golf Mission to Israel. They will play two rounds of golf at the Caesarea Golf Course, which was recently named as one of Rolex World's Top 1,000 Golf Courses.

The rest of the mission will mostly consist of traditional activities, but not entirely, said Vanessa Valkin, executive-director of Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University (CFTAU), Toronto chapter. In addition to golf, participants will enjoy cycling in Jerusalem, a visit to the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange, viewing of Bauhaus architecture in Tel Aviv, meeting with Israeli venture capitalists, visiting TAU and attending a sports event. "The only lazy thing they'll do is an afternoon at a wine farm, tasting and dinner," Valkin said.

The impetus for the unusual mission came from CFTAU board members Jeff Wagman and Phil Hart, who are golfing afficionados, she said. While golf sets the mission apart from other organized visits to Israel, those who don't wish to test their skill on the course can instead relax with a spa treatment at the golf club or visit the nearby Ba'hai Gardens in Haifa and the ancient Galilean city of Tzipori, she said.

Valkin acknowledges that interest in the mission has been modest so far. "It may be that people ask, 'do I need to go to Israel to play golf?'" she suggested. But golfing is only one of the activities and the course is unique in that it is near the ancient Herodian city, which features numerous excavations and ruins.

Valkin said the golf mission is in keeping with a new trend of including unusual experiences in Israel.

Last spring, many visited the Dead Sea for an outdoor opera concert at Masada, she noted.

"People want to support Israel, visit in Israel, but they have familiarity with it. They want to do different things. That's why we offered something different and fun."

That's something Jerry Adler is happy to confirm. "The general sense is that Canadian Jews and non-Jews are going to Israel for umpteen different reasons" and not simply to show support and boost morale in time of conflict," said Adler, manager of marketing and public relations for the Israel Government Tourist Office.

Recent missions have included a cycling trip and visits with a cultural aspect – concerts, opera, dance recitals and museums – are proving popular.

This year the Jewish National Fund is focusing on the "greening of Israel," he said.

"[Israel's] Ministry of Tourism is celebrating 100 years of green," highlighting how Israel reclaimed desert and conducted ecologically sound development, including water purification and relying on locally grown produce. "We're trying to show the world that Israel is one of the first regarding being green and having a small carbon footprint," he added.

For Hart, the mission is a way of bringing more attention to TAU, which boasts an enrolment of 30,000 students. "We're trying to create a little more awareness in the GTA by coming up with interesting programs that no one's done before," he said. "My goal is to make sure we do missions every year or every other year and put a good slant on it and make it interesting. We'll do things people don't know about."

Tel Aviv University was established in 1956. Its faculty is known for research into many fields, including particle physics, astronomy, cell biology, biotechnology, genetics, agriculture, fibre optics, as well as in the humanities, social sciences, medicine and law. CFTAU supports the university through fund raising and by raising its profile locally.

Community leader, pioneer, Wilfred Posluns z"l helped shape Jewish Toronto

Visionary philanthropist personified the value of tzedakah

By Daniel Horowitz

Rarely, if ever, does a surname become synonymous with community, but in the case of Wilfred (Wilf) Posluns z"l, who passed away on Sunday, August 15, 2010, that's precisely the case.

A past chair of UJA Federation, a past two-time chair of the annual United Jewish Appeal Campaign, and a past chair of UJA Federation's Endowment Fund, the vision, generosity and compassion of Wilf Posluns helped make Toronto's Jewish community what it is today - one of the world's most successful and flourishing Diaspora cities.

A recipient of UJA's prestigious Shem Tov Award, presented to Jewish Toronto community leaders representing the highest levels of excellence in volunteer service, Wilf, a former CEO and Chairman of Dylex Ltd., worked tirelessly on behalf of several organizations in Toronto including UJA Federation, UIA Canada, Associated Hebrew Schools, Baycrest Centre, Mount Sinai Hospital, Beth Tzedec, Israel Bonds, Royal Ontario Museum, the Toronto Chapter of Hebrew University and many more.

"I believe in giving back to the community," Wilf wrote in his 2004 Book of Life story for The Jewish Foundation. "We must continue our work here to support Israel, because not only is Israel dependent on the Diaspora, the Diaspora is dependent on Israel. I take great comfort in knowing that my family will continue to live their lives with the values of tzedakah that my grandparents and parents passed on to me. It is our obligation to take care of our own community. When you do good deeds for others, you certainly get a lot back."

Wilf's vision and knowledge of what makes a great community was a subject of Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl's eloquent and touching eulogy.

"The Talmud teaches that one plants trees for the future," said the rabbi. "Years ago, Wilfred and Joyce purchased land on The Bridal Path for a home. They didn't yet have the resources to construct what would become an impressive statement of contemporary design. Wilfred imagined the way the house would be situated and had specific trees planted on the lot. He would bring the family out to see the location and show them the trees, explaining that someday the trees would be big, that one had to see beyond the immediate, to imagine what one wanted, and to work to realize that future. I would hear him say, 'The builders of this community dreamed big. They undertook more than they thought they could handle.

Wilfred Posluns z"l

At the 2007 groundbreaking ceremony for Sherman Campus, Wilf grabbed a shovel along with his family (from l to r) Wendy Posluns, David Posluns, Felicia Posluns and Lynn Posluns.

But they understood they would grow into the future. The synagogue is a critical element in the future of our community. We have to plant well for good growth.'"

Wilf held numerous leadership positions at UJA Federation, one of which resulted in him putting its Endowment Fund, (today the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto), on the map. The seeds he planted eventually grew the Foundation to where it is today, with assets close to $200 million.

It was also Wilf's determined and visionary leadership as well as his fundraising acumen that created the Lipa Green Building in 1983, ultimately changing the face of Jewish community life in Toronto. And, his willingness to co-chair the UJA Emergency Campaign during the first Lebanon War in the summer of 1982, was a testament to how deeply Wilf cared about Israel and Jewish Toronto.

"Wilfred was an inspiring leader in every sense of the word," says Steve Ain, a former CEO of UJA Federation who worked with Wilf for many years. "It didn't just mean that he held leadership positions; it meant that he got others to follow him, whether it was campaign giving, community action or support of Israel. He was one of the architects of the modern-day UJA/ Federation. He was an incredibly generous person, both in money and in time, and was never willing to settle for second best."

"I had great affection and respect for Wilf Posluns. I knew him since I was 28, and I have always regarded him as an inspiring leader and role model," says community leader and past UJA Campaign chair Ronnie Appleby. "He was, in my view, the pre-eminent fundraiser for the next few decades and I learned a lot from him. Wilfred's philanthropy is also legendary and examples of his gifts are reflected in many institutions here and in Israel. Wilfred Posluns was one of the greatest leaders in the history of the Jewish community of Toronto and his impact will have a lasting influence on everyone he touched."

"Who we are today as a Jewish community, our treasured network of agencies, schools and services and an infrastructure with few equals in the entire Diaspora Jewish world, have more to do with the efforts of Wilfred Posluns than anyone could fully comprehend," said Ted Sokolsky, President & CEO, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Hoping deeply, but without expectations

With cleverly directed visual effect and rhetorical flourishes of hope and possibility, the American administration last week orchestrated the announcement that the leaders of Israel and the leaders of the Palestinians will return to direct, face-to-face, peace talks on Sept. 2 to be hosted in Washington by U.S. President Barack Obama.

To ensure the appropriate atmosphere of weighty historical moment for the occasion and perhaps as a form of pre-negotiations, last minute pep talk, Obama is scheduled to meet separately with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, as well as with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, Jordan's King Abdullah II and the Quartet's Mideast envoy Tony Blair.

U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton will then pick up and wield the gavel of bilateral dialogue the next day.

In making the announcement, Clinton and U.S. special Middle East envoy George Mitchell said the aim of the process is to reach a permanent settlement of the conflict, including the establishment of a Palestinian state, within a year. The core issues of the negotiations are Jerusalem, borders, refugees, security, settlements and water.

Netanyahu told the Israeli people on Sunday that "he will arrive at the negotiating table with goodwill to reach a peace agreement." He intends to "surprise all the critics and skeptics," but emphasized that he needs a Palestinian partner to succeed.

In contrast, Abbas warned that "it's impossible to conduct negotiations alongside settlement construction." He wrote to Obama, Russian President Dmitry Medvedev and the high representative of the European Union on foreign policy, Catherine Ashton, threatening once again to walk away from face-to-face negotiations if Israel does not maintain the current freeze on construction in the West Bank.

And so we have returned to where we were almost two years ago before Palestinian leaders turned their backs on direct negotiations with Israelis.

In the circumstances, it is impossible to be optimistic.

We can only be hopeful, but with the accompanying, self-protective sigh of very cold expectations chilled to near frozen by years of shameless prevarications by Palestinian Authority leaders, murderous intentions and actions by Palestinian Hamas leaders, unceasing incitement against Jews and the Jewish state by all strata of Palestinian leaders and, it must also be said, by the potential stymieing effect of hardscrabble coalition politics in Israel.

But at least the Palestinian Authority and the government of Israel will be talking to each other across a table in one room.

Perhaps, in the byzantine, shuk-based haggling of politics, posturing, illogic and stiffened ways of the Middle East, that's how progress is measured.

The Jews of Krakow, Poland, celebrated their first bar mitzvah in 35 years when eighth grader Eric Strom and his family made the trip from Stamford, Conn. The event came about after the leader of Krakow's Jewish community asked a visiting group of Jewish leaders from New York City to, "Send us a bar mitzvah. Send us life."

Women treated as second-class citizens

The "they" that the letter writer so contemptuously refers to in "'Assault' at the Kotel" (Aug. 5) are called "women." They represent more than half of the Jewish population, and they have for too long been treated as second-class citizens by right-wing Orthodoxy.

Many in the modern Orthodox community encourage women's participation in davening, such as through women's Torah readings and partnership minyans. The Torah cannot be made tameh. There is no halachic reason preventing women from having a Torah reading, carrying the Torah or davening aloud as a group. Instead of assaulting or arresting women who wish to daven at the Kotel, why don't we just distribute blindfolds and earplugs on the men's side?

Independent minyanim

In his column, Martin Lockshin highlights many of the positive features of the independent minyan movement ("Are independent minyanim the future?" July 15). Much of the column is based on the work of Rabbi Elie Kaufner.

The analysis tells us that these minyanim have a "strong allegiance to the traditional prayerbook" and are run by "a group of knowledgeable Jews." Furthermore, services are led by those with a "tuneful voice and solid Hebrew language skills." Apparently there are no dues or membership fees to contend with and "people can feel much happier in a benevolent meritocracy than they do in a democracy."

A weakness of the independent minyanim that is not mentioned is that within their structure, there seems to be no need for halachic authority (regardless of the stream of interpretation). Not having a guiding figure for a tfillah experience negates much of the traditions upon which the very prayers are based.

A second issue regarding independent minyanim revolves around the question of resources. One has to wonder why the idea of all these "knowledgeable Jews" and their "tuneful voices and solid Hebrew skills" leaving their respective synagogues is worthy of such praise. It is unfortunate that the participants themselves do not realize that they add to a synagogue/temple community by their mere presence, let alone through their knowledge, skills and voices.

Letter deserved stronger rebuke

While I am glad that Canadian Jewish Congress responded to the letter criticizing its support of Kulanu Toronto in Toronto's recent Pride Parade, I was a little concerned by the temperate nature of the response. (CJC's Aug. 12 letter, "Anti-Israel forces in the gay community," was a response to the Aug. 5 letter "Homosexuality prohibited by Torah law.")

The CJC justified its participation in the Pride Parade and its support of Kulanu, because Kulanu is committed to Israel's well-being and carried the flag for Israel at the parade. However, the two signatories failed to mention that the CJC is a community organization that values all members of its community, and that Kulanu is an invaluable resource for gay Jews in Toronto that deserves the support of the Jewish community as a whole. Unfortunately, the response has left members of the gay Jewish community with the impression (mistaken I hope) that the CJC supports Kulanu because it carries Israel's flag in the gay community, not because of the vital role that it plays within the Jewish community.

The CJC also failed to reject the inflammatory and prejudicial content of the letter "Homosexuality prohibited by Torah law," which called homosexuality a "human ill" and suggested that the CJC should support "sex reorientation programs." Such a hate-filled and misinformed letter required a much stronger rebuke. While I am glad that the CJC responded to the letter criticizing its support of Kulanu in the recent Pride Parade, I was a little concerned by the temperate nature of the response.

Homophobic attitude unacceptable

I am an 86-year-old grandmother who, after reading Rabbi Moshe Stern's comments in the article "Orthodox statement on gays released" (Aug. 12), felt appalled, sickened, saddened and ashamed to be a Jew. Rabbi Stern said he accepts homosexuals into his shul "like I accept any sinners."

I presume, according to the Bible, we are all sinners. However, although Exodus 35:2 says whoever works on the Sabbath must be put to death, I have not observed this command being carried out "religiously" today. The homosexual population is approximately seven to 10 per cent of the overall population. That means that many members of the rabbi's congregation must feel humiliated, insulted and persecuted – by their fellow Jews!

This homophobic attitude in today's world is completely unacceptable to me, whose ancestors were persecuted and rejected. How can we as Jews behave this way toward our brethren? I consider this attitude and behaviour an abomination.

Article fuels speculation over possible strike against Iran

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

If the United States doesn't attack Iran's nuclear facilities within the next eight months or so, Israel probably will.

So says journalist Jeffrey Goldberg in the September issue of the Atlantic magazine in an article that is fuelling debate and speculation among many Middle East experts.

Goldberg bases his conclusion mainly on three premises: in the Israeli view, Iran will be in a position to produce a bomb by next spring or very soon thereafter; Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is taking persistent Iranian threats to wipe Israel off the map seriously and is resolved to prevent a second Holocaust; and Netanyahu and Defence Minister Ehud Barak argue that even if Iran doesn't use the bomb, a nuclear threat hanging over Israel could destroy the Zionist enterprise, with Israelis leaving the country and prospective immigrants staying away.

Goldberg makes much of the prime minister's reverence for his 100-year-old historian father, Benzion Netanyahu, who sees history in terms of successive threats to the existence of the Jewish people. And it is true that Netanyahu at times depicts himself as a latter day Churchill, whose life's mission is to save his people.

Nevertheless, Goldberg gives many reasons why Israel would think twice before launching an attack on Iran.

On the tactical level, a strike against Iran's well-protected and far-flung nuclear facilities might have limited effect. Also, the operational complexity of having to fly great distances, over American lines or Arab territory, is a military planner's nightmare.

Far worse, though, on the strategic level, is the fact that attacking Iran without an American green light could lead to a major rupture between Jerusalem and Washington. And if distanced from or even abandoned by America, Israel could quickly become a pariah state isolated on the international stage.

The widespread international condemnation of Israel's action against a Turkish "peace" vessel last May is an indication of where things could go.

Moreover, any Israeli strike against Iran would almost certainly trigger a major regional war, with Israel under missile and rocket attack from Iran, from Hezbollah in Lebanon, and also possibly from Syria and Hamas in Gaza. That, in turn, could lead to spiraling oil prices for which Israel would be blamed. And Iran and its proxies almost certainly would unleash terror attacks against Jewish targets worldwide.

For reasons like these, outgoing Israel Defence Forces chief of staff Lt.-Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi is said to be unenthusiastic about launching an Israeli strike. Although the Israel Defence Forces reportedly has conducted simulation exercises as far afield as Greece, and is continually fine-tuning its operational plans, Ashkenazi would prefer not to have to carry them out.

Ashkenazi is not the only senior military man with doubts.

Maj.-Gen. Giora Eiland, a former national security adviser and one of Israel's sharpest military analysts, argued in a much-touted position paper late last year that there is no way Israel would risk harming its key strategic relationship with the United States for the lesser gain of putting Iran's nuclear program back by a few years. Moreover, he said, if there is to be a military strike, the chances are that the Americans would prefer to carry it out themselves.

According to Eiland, some U.S. Army chiefs maintain that since America would be affected by the fallout of any strike, it should bring its greater military prowess to bear to ensure success.

In Eiland's view, for Israel to have a realistic strike option, the following conditions would have to pertain: a clear failure of the current sanctions against Iran; American unwillingness to take military action despite what some of the generals have been saying; and American understanding for Israel's need to act. Then Netanyahu would have to make his own personal calculus – bearing in mind that failure could leave the Gulf unstable, Western interests undermined, Israel blamed and isolated on the world stage, and worst of all, Iran's drive to acquire nuclear weapons accorded a degree of legitimacy.

Ze'ev Maoz, a political scientist at the University of California, Davis, and at the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya, adds another concern. In a mid-August article in Ha'aretz, he suggested that an attack on Iran could lead to international pressure on Israel to dismantle its presumed nuclear arsenal and to sign the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. If Israel refuses to buckle, it could be ostracized, Maoz wrote, and if it does buckle under pressure, it would be losing a key bargaining chip for the creation of a new regional security order.

So given the risks an attack on Iran would entail, would Israel consider a nuclear balance of fear with Iran?

According to Maj. Gen Yitzhak Ben Yisrael, former head of military research and development in the IDF and the Defence Ministry, in such a balance the advantage would tilt hugely in Israel's favour. He told JTA that the Iranians are trying to build a fission bomb that at around 20 kilotons would be about the size of the American bomb dropped on Hiroshima in 1945.

Foreign experts assert that Israel possesses fusion bombs that can be from 50 to 250 times more destructive than the 1945 atomic bomb.

In late 2007, Anthony Cordesman, a senior researcher at the Washington-based Center for Strategic and International Studies, published Iran, Israel and Nuclear War: An Illustrative Scenario Analysis, in which he tried to gauge the outcome of a nuclear showdown sometime in the next decade. His bottom line: Israel would be able to survive and rebuild, while Iran would not.

According to Ben Yisrael, the Iranians are very well aware of this disparity and therefore would be unlikely to start a nuclear war against Israel.

"Maybe the Iranian man in the street doesn't know these facts, but the engineers working on the Iranian bomb certainly do. And so does [Iranian President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad," Ben Yisrael told JTA.

Nevertheless, Ben Yisrael, like most Israeli analysts, is adamantly opposed to Iran acquiring the bomb for two reasons: The Middle East almost certainly would go multinuclear in its wake, exponentially increasing the chances of someone mistakenly pressing a nuclear button. In addition, terrorists might get their hands on a nuclear device with no balance of fear possible.

Indeed, most Israeli analysts see compelling American reasons for action. They argue that the Obama administration would be loath to see a Middle East nuclear arms race undercutting the president's vision of a nuclear-free world. It also is crucial for America to prevent Iran from using a nuclear umbrella to promote terror and extortion against the West, or terrorists from getting their hands on a dirty bomb, or Iran from using its nuclear posture to gain control of Middle East oil supplies in the Gulf.

In addition, the failure to stop Iran from going nuclear could lead to a loss of American prestige and influence in the region, with wavering Gulf states moving from the American to the Iranian orbit.

So if sanctions don't work, and if a popular uprising in Iran led by the opposition Green movement fails to materialize, the Israeli leadership's hope is that America will see the necessity of taking military action, despite the ongoing wars in Afghanistan and Iraq. The Israelis are careful not to spell this out, since they don't want to be seen as pushing for an American attack.

Israeli analysts point out that what would be very difficult for Israel to achieve, militarily and diplomatically, the United States could achieve much more easily. According to Goldberg, Netanyahu himself often tells visitors "the secret" that the U.S. Army is much bigger than Israel's.

Netanyahu in his meeting with Obama in early July was heartened, according to aides, by what he heard from the president on Iran. Indeed, it appears that U.S. policy is to prevent Israel from going it alone, with Joint Chiefs of Staff Chair Adm. Mike Mullen urging Israel to bite the bullet, while Obama reassures Israeli leaders that he will not allow Iran to get the bomb.

But what if Israel and the United States differ in their estimates of the Iranian nuclear timetable? Or if the United States proves reluctant to attack when Israel feels that time is running out?

Will Israel, because of the threat posed by a nuclear Iran, then take the risk of acting alone? And, crucially, will the United States then give Israel a green light to attack?

For now, so many variables are in play that Netanyahu and Obama themselves are probably still unsure of the answers.

'Muslim Jews' and 'Christian Jews'

In his latest book, Faith and Power, the distinguished Jewish scholar of Islam Bernard Lewis reminds readers that for most of the last 1,500 years, "creative Jewish achievement was entirely in the hands of Christendom and Islam, and it is these two different traditions that we see coming together in Israel at the present day."

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

The dominant force in Islam is Shariah, which is almost identical with what we understand as Halachah. Some Jews want to make the latter the law of the State of Israel, corresponding to Shariah in Muslim countries.

By contrast, after centuries of deadly wars between Christian denominations, Christendom developed the notion of the separation between church and state. In that scheme of things, religion isn't state-controlled but private and personal. The Muslim way exclusively dominated earlier times. The Christian way is a function of modernity.

"There are historically two kinds of Jews," writes Lewis, "the Jews of Islam and the Jews of Christendom." In the Diaspora, the two lived in different parts of the world with minimal interaction. Jews in Muslim countries adapted to the ways of Islam. Emancipated Jews in the modern West thrived without state interference. In Israel, the two have met.

This leads Lewis to assert that most of today's internal tensions in the Jewish state can best be understood as encounters "between the Christian Jews and the Muslim Jews." The former are the proponents of such things as civil marriage and religious pluralism. They oppose religious political parties. The latter are staunch advocates that the rule of Halachah is to be enforced by the state.

Many current controversies purport to have come about in order to protect the soul of Israel. Recent battles include the proposed changes to the conversion bill, the discrimination against the Women of the Wall, the wish to expel Israeli-born children of non-Jewish workers, the difficulties of some couples to be allowed to marry in Israel, etc. Lewis would say that these aren't religious but cultural divisions that stem from the two, often opposing influences on Israeli life.

As a growing number of Muslims are settling in former and still nominally Christian states, similar divisions are surfacing there, too. For example, the debates in Paris and elsewhere over headgear for Muslim women and in New York over the site of a mosque near Ground Zero reflect them.

In this scheme of things, I see myself as a "Christian Jew" and hope that so do you. If the Muslim way of Judaism wins the day, liberal Jews will be forced out of Israel.

Who, or what, is in the details?

As part of the Toronto Summer Music Festival, I recently attended a master class in piano taught by the world-famous pianist Menahem Pressler. I'm in that category of proverbial arts fans who don't know too much about music, but know what they like. And that always reminds me of my favourite New Yorker cartoon of a man in an art gallery looking perplexed at a painting. The caption reads: "I know art. I just don't know what I like!"

Seymour Epstein in Toronto

Pressler had each young pianist play a full piece and then meticulously reviewed the performance, almost note by note, making strong corrections in musical domains that were meaningless to me. What I, the outsider, noticed most was that I could hardly distinguish the corrected version of a few bars from the original performance. The maestro would not continue until he was satisfied with the correction, but it all sounded the same to me.

And that reminded me of a story from my undergraduate years at the Jewish Theological Seminary of America. The late Rabbi Louis Finkelstein was the chancellor in those days, and the legend was that he was once visiting a concert pianist friend and when the host offered cookies and tea, Rabbi Finkelstein asked to see the cookie box in order to check the ingredients for kashrut. His friend was shocked and asked how such a minor detail could make a difference in his religious life. Finkelstein parried by asking his friend if he would mind changing a note or two in his upcoming concert of Mozart at Carnegie Hall!

And yet another story comes to mind. When, in the 1980s, I was serving the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) in Morocco, I decided that I wanted to learn shchitat ofot, the ritual slaughter of chickens. I wasn't sure where the JDC was going to post me next, and I thought that such a skill might be useful. (In case anyone is considering coming by my house with a live chicken, let me inform you that I never concluded the course, and that I buy my chickens in a kosher meat store like the rest of you.) But soon after I memorized the laws of slaughtering, my teacher, Rabbi Shalom Eidelman, started me on the knife. I was to learn how to sharpen the knife so that it was entirely smooth to my palm and my fingernail.

The Zen of it was that the master would pass his nail along the blade and identify four nicks to be corrected. Then the student would similarly inspect the blade and try to identify the same nicks. Needless to say, I felt nothing on the first many tries. It was a long time before I could sense the nicks, and even longer until I learned how to correct them with careful sharpening.

In all these cases, an outsider looking in has difficulty understanding the complexity of detail, the vocabulary of a particular universe of discourse and the absolute need to follow the rules. This is especially true in cross-cultural situations. The codes of any one culture (e.g. Judaism or Islam) or sub-culture (e.g. Reform, Sephardi or haredi) are unique and create barriers in both directions.

The codes and norms of your own culture sometimes prevent you from being able to understand and appreciate those of another group. And the particular language and concepts of the other are, at times, so alien that you cannot break the code. If and when you do, an entirely new universe opens up for you to understand and evaluate – sometimes to appreciate, sometimes to critique.

I must learn to read music…

Gefilte fish and the alchemy of atonement

My grandmother made gefilte fish the old-fashioned way. She would first select her fish from those swimming around the fish tanks of the fishmonger. To keep the fish as fresh as possible, she would preserve them in the bathtub of her small apartment until she was ready to begin her cooking preparations. I know this by family lore only. My uncles recall having to bathe at the local gym while the future delicacies spent their final days swimming in the tub of a Brooklyn apartment.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

By the time I was born, Bubbe had yielded to pressure from her offspring and had the fishmonger kill the chosen fish. This I remember. When I was two, Bubbe took me with her to buy fish. I was so traumatized that I refused to eat gefilte fish again until I was well into my twenties.

By then, Bubbe relegated the making of gefilte fish to a twice-a-year event. It was a labour intensive procedure that demanded physical stamina and strength, as she would chop the fish down to tiny pieces with her hokmesser (chopping knife) in a wooden bowl. Even when food processors became available, Bubbe would insist on chopping her fish by hand. Her various grandchildren urged her to modernize her technique so that it would be easier on her – and perhaps with a self-interested wish for her to cook the delicacy more often.

She tried the food processor method once, but then went back to her old hokmesser and wooden bowl. It doesn't taste the same when chopped in the food processor, she kept repeating. Her grandchildren teased her about her stubbornly old-fashioned ways. Of course it tastes the same, we would giggle. And it's easier.

Today, as all foodies recognize, the great chefs tell us that the way food is handled prior to cooking makes a crucial difference in the final product. A fish or a meat dish will taste very different depending on whether the items have been chopped, diced, ground, cut by hand, or put in a blender or food processor. In the alchemy that is cooking, even the sharpness and shape of the knife can have an effect. Gurus of grilling, for example, extol the virtues of preparing meat for burgers by cutting beef into tiny cubes, rather than putting it through a grinder.

So it seems that Bubbe, alehah hashalom, was correct, and we ever-so-modern grandchildren were wrong. But this isn't intended as a nostalgia piece about how Bubbe always knows best. It's about the alchemy of atonement and forgiveness.

At about the time that her grandchildren were teasing her for clinging to outmoded ways, Bubbe was struggling with the waning of her powers. Thinking back, it strikes me that our remarks – although not intended in this way – must have hit on her sensitivities and fears of becoming useless. By then, Bubbe was forgetting to put in key ingredients when she prepared her special dishes.

We weren't children, but we were young, and perhaps heedlessly hurtful.

As Rosh Hashanah approaches, and one's heart turns in the direction of wrongs needing to be made right, it occurs to me that Bubbe's forgiveness should be sought. But by the time her grandchildren had gained sufficient life experience to realize we had wronged her, she was no longer around to accept our contrition. And so the hurt we tendered remains – repented perhaps, but unforgiven, not because forgiveness was refused, but because it had become too late to seek it.

And so it is. The Yamim Nora'im, the High Holidays, turn our minds and hearts to review, repentance and forgiveness, but also to mortality, to the limitations of all things human. With the noblest of intentions, we tend to those precious to us. We mop up as best we can, but we always contend with the frayed edges of things, the boundedness of our understanding, the finiteness of human time.

Bubbe's forgiveness for our heedless remarks is an opportunity lost. But the alchemy of atonement is such that perhaps we can retrieve from it a sense of compassion for others, acts of chesed, of loving kindness, in our time and in her name.

Nazi propaganda in the Arab world

On May 23, 1941, when Germany was preoccupied with preparations for its imminent invasion of the Soviet Union, Adolf Hitler issued a directive instructing the foreign ministry to intensify Arabic-language shortwave radio broadcasts to the Middle East.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The broadcasts, which were originally launched in October 1939, following Egypt's and Iraq's decision to sever diplomatic relations with Germany, were part of an ambitious propaganda effort to strengthen Germany's relations with Muslim forces deemed hostile to Britain. To Hitler, the "Arab freedom movement" was one such force, "our natural ally."

Germany's broadcasts, steeped in anti-Semitism and designed to appeal to Arab nationalism and Islamic religious traditions, offered a mixture of news, commentary and music. They lasted until the winter of 1945.

These broadcasts are the subject of Jeffrey Herf's fascinating and brilliantly researched book, Nazi Propaganda for the Arab World (Yale University Press), which draws on previously unused and little-known archival resources. Herf, a professor of history at the University of Maryland, says that these broadcasts were compiled and disseminated by Arab exiles and German Orientalists in Berlin and were meant for an audience of both secular and pious Arabs.

Although Hitler's turgid manifesto, Mein Kampf, and that notorious czarist Russian forgery, The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, had been translated into Arabic long before the outbreak of World War II, they did not figure prominently in Germany's broadcasts.

"Rather, it was a selective reading of the Koran and a focus on the anti-Jewish currents within Islam, combined with Nazi denunciations of western imperialism and Soviet Communism, that offered Nazi propaganda its points of entry to Arabs in North Africa, Egypt, Palestine, Syria, Lebanon and Iraq and to Muslims in the Middle East in general," Herf writes.

In short, Germany portrayed itself as an Arab ally, a soulmate of Islam and an uncompromising enemy of Zionism.

Significantly enough, the most important public face of Germany's broadcasts was Haj Amin el-Husseini, the grand mufti of Jerusalem. Appointed to his position by Herbert Samuel, Britain's first and only Jewish high commissioner in Palestine, Husseini established contact with German and Italian officials during the 1936-39 Arab Revolt.

Fearing arrest by the British, he fled to Lebanon in 1937 and to Iraq in 1939. After Rashid Ali Kilani's failed pro-Axis coup in Baghdad in 1941, he made his way to Tehran, Ankara, Rome and, finally, Berlin.

There he met Hitler, Foreign Minister Joachim von Ribbentrop and Heinrich Himmler, the head of the SS, and became a paid propagandist for the Nazi cause.

Among the German officials he worked with were Fritz Groba, who had been Germany's ambassador in Iraq from 1937 to 1941; Erwin Ettel, an SS member who joined the Nazi party a year before Hitler's accession to power in 1933, and Wilhelm Melchers, the director of the foreign ministry's Middle East department who had worked in Germany's consulate in Haifa.

The wartime broadcasts they collectively produced harped on several related themes: The war was a Jewish plot to establish a Jewish state in Palestine that would expand into and dominate the Muslim world. Jews were attempting to destroy Islam. An Allied victory would benefit Jews and spur the formation of a Jewish state in Palestine, whereas an Axis triumph would liberate Arabs from the twin curses of British colonialism and Zionism.

Merging Nazi and radical Islamist anti-Semitism, the broadcasts were explicitly violent in tone and intention. As a 1942 broadcast declared, "This is your best opportunity to get rid of this dirty race, which has usurped your rights and brought misfortune and destruction on your countries. Kill the Jews, burn their property, destroy their stores, annihilate these base supporters of British imperialism."

In accordance with this vitriol, the broadcasts attacked the 1917 Balfour Declaration, rejected the partition of Palestine into Arab and Jewish states, and claimed that Jews would not be satisfied until they made "every territory between the Tigris and the Nile Jewish" and removed "the Cross and the Crescent from all Arab countries."

Urging Muslims to act resolutely, the broadcasts urged Arabs to unite in "sacred duty" to "repulse this Jewish menace."

Whether the broadcasts mitigated Arab anger over Germany's Transfer Agreement with the Zionist movement is debatable. Signed in August 1933, the accord made it possible for German Jewish emigrants to take property and funds to their new home in Palestine. Germany's consul general in Jerusalem, Walter Doehle, criticized the agreement, warning it risked turning "existing Arab sympathy" for Germany into antagonism.

Due to its provisions, tens of thousands of German Jews immigrated to Palestine, infuriating the Arab leadership. Chastened by the harsh reaction, Germany reduced Jewish emigration to a trickle – 900 in 1940 – and stopped it altogether by 1941.

By this juncture, Herf points out, German troops under Gen. Erwin Rommel had landed in North Africa, and Germany had funnelled weapons and munitions to the coup plotters in Iraq. One of them, Yunis es-Sebawi, worked on an Arabic translation of Mein Kampf.

Haj Amin el-Husseini meets Adolf Hitler in the autumn of 1941.

The landing of the Afrika Korps in Tunisia and Libya enabled the Germans to spread propaganda throughout North Africa. The effort was spearheaded by Konstantin Alexander Freiherr von Neurath, the son of a former foreign minister, and Hans Alexander Winkler, an Orientalist who had been a member of the Communist party.

The coup in Baghdad, which touched off a pogrom, was nipped in the bud by Britain, forcing Germany's ambassador in Iraq to flee.

As for the plotters, they fled to Turkey and Iran. Shortly afterward, the British army and Free French forces entered Syria from Iraq and Palestine, defeating the Vichy France force. (Moshe Dayan, a young Jewish fighter from Palestine, lost an eye during that military campaign).

As a result of these setbacks, Germany's influence in the Middle East waned. Nonetheless, the German envoys in Saudi Arabia and Yemen remained in their posts.

Driven out of Iraq, Husseini popped up in Berlin, where he proclaimed his friendship with Germany and his hostility to Britain, Jews and communism.

On Nov. 28, 1941, he met Hitler, telling the Fuehrer that he was "admired by the entire Arab world," thanking him for the sympathy he had displayed for the Palestinian cause and voicing the opinion, as well as the hope, that Germany would win the war.

In reply, Hitler intimated that he intended to extend the scope of the Final Solution to Jews living outside Europe, namely to the 700,000 Jews in the Middle East, including Palestine. Buoyed by Hitler's comments, Husseini laced his broadcasts with the most vile and vicious anti-Semitism and played a vital role in the creation of a Bosnian Muslim SS Waffen division in February 1944. Known for its brutal methods, it was dissolved 10 months later as the tide of the war turned against Germany.

According to Herf, Nazi officials who had collaborated with Husseini fared rather well during the postwar period in Germany. Melchers had a hand in organizing West Germany's new foreign ministry and served as the German ambassador to Iraq in the mid-1950s.

Interestingly, Germany's anti-Semitic broadcasts found an echo in the writings of Sayyid Qutb, an influential Egyptian Islamic fundamentalist who fused European and Islamic anti-Semitism.

Herf speculates that Qutb may well have listened to Nazi broadcasts during the war. He is probably right.

Transit high on the agenda

the former CEO of the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Ontario and a former national director of the Liberal Party of Canada – said that for 100 years, no mayor has been elected in Toronto who didn't first serve on council, and he aims to change that legacy.

On the question of transit, Rossi said he's against declaring the TTC an essential service, which would limit its employees' right to strike. "We have to get beyond the politics and get to the business of transit."

Smitherman, the former MPP for Toronto Centre and provincial cabinet minister, said he would support making the TTC an essential service and would also allow seniors to "ride free" between 10 a.m. and 2 p.m.

Thomson said Toronto should build up its transit system based on current fares and figure out how to lower costs and fees later. Free transit is a lofty goal, she said, but the city has to first figure out how to get there.

She also suggested adding rush-hour tolls on the Gardiner Expressway and the Don Valley Parkway, and putting the extra revenue toward training city workers and expanding affordable housing options.

Ford said seniors should have access to free transit, suggesting that the money for such an initiative could come from revoking the 21,000 free Metropasses that are currently in use.

"The majority go to TTC employees that get to ride the bus for free. All councillors get them for free," he said, adding that, if elected, he would change this. "If anyone's riding the TTC for free, it should be seniors."

Pantalone, who supports Toronto's Transit City plan, agreed that transportation is an important issue for seniors.

"Seniors have a particular role to play in our society, and using transit is part of it. In Toronto, transit is the biggest problem we have, and Transit City is the best solution," he said, referring to an initiative of the current council under Mayor David Miller.

As part of the Transit City plan, Toronto would build eight new light-rail rapid transit lines that would extend to underserviced neighbourhoods, and would extend the subway to York University and into York Region.

As for the security needs of the Jewish community, Rossi said the city is obliged to protect its citizens, which is why Toronto's police budget is "close to $1 billion" and would remain one of the top budget items if he's elected mayor.

For his part, Smitherman said that the "security of anyone in our community is the business of everyone. We need to make sure the police are there to serve and protect."

With respect to seniors getting value for their tax dollars, Smitherman reiterated that he'd extend free transit to seniors and that if elected, he would consider it "essential" to exercise "wage restraint" at City Hall over the next few years.

Rossi said that while he's "not against" labour and unions, he thinks it's impossible and unfair for the city to "sustain [municipal employees' salary] increases" at the current rate.

On the housing question, Smitherman said it would be his "priority" to ensure the elderly are supported in their "current homes" instead of being forced to move for financial reasons.

"We want to help them stay in the places where they feel loved already," he said.

Rossi acknowledged that subsidized housing could be "part of the answer" to accommodating the needs of seniors, but he emphasized the need for the city to "partner with the private sector" to get housing projects done on time and on budget.

Candidates respond to questions

The candidates at last week's debate were presented with five questions, chosen jointly by Association of Jewish Seniors and the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee as ones that are of paramount concern to seniors.

• Given that a large number of seniors live on fixed incomes and have limited savings, how would you manage the city's finances to ensure that they're protected from future financial demands? Do you believe that the privatization of city services has a place in those considerations?

• What is your transit plan for Toronto and how do you propose to pay for it? Would it include declaring the TTC an essential service?

• The Jewish community must commit significant financial resources toward private security to protect its synagogues, day schools, and community centres. As mayor, how would you assist the Jewish community with security issues, including the cost?

• There is a belief among Torontonians that the quality of city services is poorer today than in years past. e.g., the demise of once-a-week garbage pick-up and delays in clearing snow. How will you ensure Toronto residents get good value for their tax dollars and receive the high quality of services they are entitled to?

• Housing is an important issue for seniors. Many are struggling to either maintain their homes or meet the financial demands of annual increases in rental fees on their apartments. Do you believe more should be done to stimulate the development of affordable and subsidized rental housing, and if so, what would you do to encourage this development?

AJS VP comments on debate

If elected, Pantalone said he'll fight for better services for seniors, including snow removal, adding that seniors are more vulnerable to injuries as a result of poor upkeep of city streets.

"We want to improve services for seniors… When there's [cracks] in the sidewalk, rather than patching it up, the city should come in once, with cement," he said.

According to Ford, the city can't afford to build more subsidized housing units, but there are many empty apartments for rent that may be too expensive for seniors.

"What we have to do is subsidize people's rent and move them in," he said, adding that the city can't maintain subsidized housing.

"[The units] are not safe. There's cockroaches. We cannot build more public housing," he said.

Pantalone said that, if elected, he would freeze property tax for seniors with household incomes of less than $50,000, which would enable them to stay in their homes.

Ruth Goldsmith, the AJS vice-president in charge of communications, who was at the debate, said she was disappointed by some of the candidates' answers.

"None of the candidates really got to grips with the day-to-day responsibilities of running a city. They were full of clichés," she said.

In particular, Goldsmith wasn't impressed with Ford.

"He struck me as being out of touch with the community, out of touch with what people really want. He got kudos for saying, 'I'm going to cut taxes.' Anyone can cut taxes, but if we want affordable housing, good transportation, we have to be ready to pay taxes," she said.

"On the other hand, he's saying, 'I'm going to cut spending.' Where's the money going to come from?"

Goldsmith also questioned Pantalone's leadership abilities.

"I think he's a very well-meaning man… but as a leader, he doesn't seem to have a vision for the city," she said.

Case Ootes

Election sign motion on council's agenda

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

Toronto-Danforth Coun. Case Ootes has put forward a motion to allow candidates for city council to put up signs one day early in order to avoid a conflict with the holidays of Shmini Atzeret and Simchat Torah, as well as Shabbat.

The motion, seconded by York Centre Coun. Mike Feldman, would allow candidates in the Oct. 25 election to put up signs starting on Sept. 29 at midnight, as opposed to Thursday, Sept. 30, the date of Shmini Atzeret.

Simchat Torah falls the next day, on Oct. 1, and is followed by Shabbat, which would put observant Jewish candidates and volunteers at a disadvantage, because they couldn't put up signs until after Shabbat on Oct. 2.

Some candidates have suggested voluntarily postponing putting up signs until Oct. 3, but Ootes' motion would create a city-wide change. The issue was on the agenda for the final meeting of the current council, scheduled for Aug. 25 and 26.

Abbas has a credibility problem heading into talks

In the July 29 CJN, this column presented Mideast analyst Jim Lederman's reflections about what the foreign media overwhelmingly fail to cover in their reports from Israel – namely, newsworthy stories about the thoughts and actions of the majority of Israelis.

Lederman also reflected about what the media fail to report about Palestinian society and governance. Space then did not allow the inclusion of those comments. But with attention now turning to the possibility that direct negotiations between Israel and the PA could resume, it's timely to turn to his remarks.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Lederman began by pointing out a tremendously important development that most foreign correspondents (and many Israeli journalists, too) failed to report about: Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' decision in June to "indefinitely postpone" municipal elections in the West Bank, which were scheduled to be held in July.

Why was this story important? According to Lederman, "Last October, Hamas vetoed the very idea of new elections in Gaza. It not only feared competition from Fatah, it also needed to shut down all political debate. Although Hamas initially gained its legitimacy through elections, it could just as easily lose its right to rule if it fought an election after all the suffering Gazans have endured under its rule.

"Despite Hamas' opposition to elections of any sort, Mahmoud Abbas hoped he could still use municipal elections in the West Bank to show that Fatah had remained the primary political force among Palestinians. A resounding Fatah victory, or even a small majority in municipal elections, could have given Abbas the opportunity to claim that he has the legitimacy he needs to compromise with Israel.

"And so Abbas declared that municipal elections would be held, as scheduled, in the West Bank in late July. But on June 10, only an hour before the time for the submission of party electoral lists was set to expire, he cancelled those elections.

"The reason was simple. Fatah had been unable to get its act together. The party couldn't come up with a single list of candidates, so its vote was in danger of being split again, as it had during the previous general elections that Hamas had won by achieving a plurality. But intra-Fatah disorder was not [Abbas'] only problem. He couldn't even craft a viable party platform.

"In short, Fatah is in dire straits. It behaves as though it has learned little or nothing from its electoral defeat in 2006. [Abbas'] throne has no legs. He cannot even count on the backing of his erstwhile supporters. That is why he has turned over much if not all the diplomatic decision-making to the so-called monitoring committee of the Arab League. To his dismay, however, he found that not only did the committee approve the idea of direct talks with Israel (which Abbas opposes), the committee did so after bowing to intense pressure from the Americans and the EU.

"The crucial question that needs to be asked is the following: if Abbas cannot legitimize his own rule through elections, how will he be able to legitimize any concessions he may have to make as part of the negotiations with Israel? Not only that, he cannot even pretend to be presenting a common Palestinian front. As each day passes, Hamas' theocratic dictatorship in Gaza, which opposes any concessions to Israel – including, foremost, recognition – is becoming ever more entrenched.

Mahmoud Abbas

Lederman admitted that Netanyahu has his own constraints. "However, he does have vehicles such as a vote of confidence in the Knesset or even new general elections to legitimize any concessions he may feel required to make.

Lederman concluded: "Given all the divisions within the Palestinian camp and their incapacity to overcome those divisions, the greatest problem that American mediators face is not how to extract further concessions from Israel, but rather how to legitimize any of the concessions that the Palestinian leadership will have to make as part of a peace deal."

CHALLENGES.

THE WORLD TODAY IS FACED WITH URGENT THREATS AND CHALLENGES FUNDAMENTALLY DIFFERENT THAN THOSE OF THE LAST DECADE.

A global movement that seeks to revise history has emerged, questioning Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state.

And many members of our next generation wonder why being Jewish is so important.

The future of Jewish life depends on our bold, determined response and how well we equip our next generation to deal with these daunting challenges.

This year, it is vital for United Jewish Appeal to raise an additional $2.5 million for programs that intensify the commitment among our young to Jewish identity, including our bond with Israel, to Jewish learning and to the Jewish community.

Programs that train young online activists, reduce Birthright Israel waiting lists, send more Jewish kids to Jewish camps and encourage volunteerism for social causes.

Programs nurturing the strength that has fortified us as a people for thousands of years.

With your support, UJA Campaign 2011, now underway, will offer thousands a fresh start on the journey to Jewish commitment and identification with the Jewish People.

Ottawa's oldest shul welcomes new rabbi

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Congregation Beth Shalom in downtown Ottawa will be ushering in the new year with a new rabbi.

After several years searching for just the right match, Rabbi Scott Rosenberg was appointed senior rabbi and arrived in the city in early August.

Rabbi Scott Rosenberg

The formerly Orthodox Beth Shalom, Ottawa's oldest synagogue, recently became the first eastern Ontario member of the Canadian Council of Conservative Synagogues.

Rabbi Rosenberg, a native of Brooklyn, N.Y., began his rabbinic career in Houston, Texas, following his studies at the Jewish Theological Seminary, where he earned a master's of arts and was ordained in 1984. He comes to Ottawa after a successful 22-year career at Temple Reyim in Newton, Mass.

Rabbi Rosenberg is certified as a specialist in Jewish divorce law by the Joint Bet Din of the Rabbinical Assembly and has served as head of the Rabbinical Assembly of New England's rabbinic court in matters pertaining to Jewish family law. In 2003, he was appointed to the Joint Bet Din of the Conservative Movement and he plans to continue these activities.

"I felt an affinity for Canada," Rabbi Rosenberg said. His father was born in Toronto and he has family there, so moving to Ottawa will be a homecoming of sorts.

"The idea of being involved in Jewish life in the capital city is exciting. There are opportunities to build relationships which are not available in other cities," he said.

Shul president Ian Sherman said he's delighted to welcome Rabbi Rosenberg to Ottawa.

"I look forward to the strength of the relationships that he will nurture with the members of Beth Shalom as well as the Ottawa community at large.

"Rabbi Rosenberg has an impressive pedigree and his experience within the pulpit was in evidence from the moment we first met with him. He's gentle, kind, diplomatic and assertive in a very professional manner. Our executive committee and board of governors are very confident that Rabbi Rosenberg brings the right experience to our current environment as a progressive, traditional Judaic, Canadian Conservative synagogue," Sherman said.

Sherman also praised the interim leadership of Rabbi Arnold Fine, who's led the congregation for the past two years, saying he "has been a pillar in our community for over 30 years."

Rabbi Rosenberg has been warmly welcomed by the city's other Jewish clergy, most of whom he has already met, and said he looks forward to meeting clergy of other religions as well, as he believes strongly in promoting interfaith relations. "I have a global understanding of what role we take, especially in Ottawa where we have such a diverse international population," he said.

With a history of involvement in a wide variety of both religious and civic organizations, including the Boy Scouts, Rabbi Rosenberg said he'll be seeking opportunities to become involved in his new community. "Once I have an understanding of the community, I can partner with our lay leaders and the membership to determine what is best for Beth Shalom," he said.

Rabbi Rosenberg and his wife, Amy Goldman, have three children, Alex, Michael and Elan.

Will Iran sanctions work?

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Foreign companies doing business in Iran could get around Canada's newly expanded sanctions by making their operations in this country subsidiaries of a parent in Iran, warned Mark Dubowitz, executive director of the Washington, D.C.-based Foundation for Defence of Democracies (FDD).

Dubowitz, a Toronto native, was a panelist at an Aug. 15 conference on the possibility of Iran's imminent acquisition of nuclear weapons, sponsored by the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research (CIJR).

Dubowitz said this legal loophole must be closed if the new measures announced by Prime Minister Stephen Harper in July under the Special Economic Measures Act are to be effective in reining in Iran's nuclear program.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs and International Trade has named Paul Hunt Canada's new ambassador to Israel. He replaces Jon Allen, who assumed the post in 2006.

Hunt moves to Israel after serving for three years as ambassador to Brazil. He joined the foreign service after stints with the government of Ontario, General Motors and several federal government departments. He has served in a variety of posts with the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA), including director of industrial co-operation programs for Africa and the Americas, director general for Sahel and the Cote d'Ivoire program as well as vice-president for Africa and the Middle East.

Hunt is expected to present his credentials in late October.

Commenting on the appointment, Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) chief executive Shimon Fogel said, "we look forward to working with him. He's had a distinguished career. He has some familiarity with the region and we expect he'll seek to build on the bilateral relationship."

Fogel said he hoped Hunt's tenure should "reflect the quality of the relationship that has emerged in the past years."

Turning to Allen – Canada's third Jewish ambassador to Israel – Fogel said "he put in a tremendous amount of effort in trying to enhance Canada's profile in the trade relationship and in other bilateral initiatives. He always tried to be accessible and hosted many of our groups. He was very gracious with his time and we wish him the best."

In Israel, Gerald Steinberg, a professor in the political science department at Bar Ilan University, said that, "while serving at CIDA, including a stint in which he had overall responsibility for Middle East, [Hunt] had an opportunity to see the damage resulting from wasted and misdirected aid funding, particularly for radical Palestinian groups, their supporters... and for UNRWA. This experience can help him in extending Canada's leading role in the long overdue closure or fundamental reform of these failed structures."

Jewish groups help flood victims in Pakistan

By FRANCES KRAFT

Last week, Jewish federations across Canada set up relief funds for flood victims in Pakistan, as did Ve'ahavta – the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee.

Both the federations and Ve'ahavta will funnel their aid through the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), which is collecting funds to provide victims with food, clothing, medicine and other necessities.

Linda Kisclowicz, executive vice-president of UIA Federations Canada, told The CJN that the JDC works with "partners on the ground" in Pakistan. JDC provides aid in countries around the world for victims of natural and man-made disasters. It also helped Pakistanis after the 2005 and 2008 earthquakes and implemented relief efforts in Haiti following the earthquake this year.

"We always believe we have a broader responsibility to help people who are in serious need," said Kislowicz. "The impact of this is enormous, and it keeps getting worse every day."

As of Monday morning, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto had raised $11,400 for the Pakistan flood relief fund that it set up two days earlier, said Howard English, the federation's vice-president of strategic communications.

English clarified that the money allocated for relief in Pakistan is separate from money collected in UJA's annual campaign and does not affect campaign allocations.

Avrum Rosensweig, Ve'ahavta's president and founder, said the magnitude of the recent crisis is very tragic. "We wish everybody well, and we hope dearly that the Jewish people can play an important role in making it better for these men, women and children, and that we establish strong friendships and partnerships on the ground in Pakistan."

Rosensweig said that Jewish involvement is important, despite the fact that "people [there] are not necessarily considered our friends.

"I don't see it as helping our enemies. I see it as helping people at the worst time of their lives."

That is the primary reason, he noted, but he said he also hopes that "there will be an understanding that the Jewish people are playing a role."

As of last Friday, the morning after its fund was established, Ve'ahavta was funnelling donations through the JDC, and looking into other opportunities as well, he said.

By Monday morning, the organization had raised about $3,000.

Flooding began late last month, and at least 1,600 people have been announced dead. More than 20 million people have lost their homes, and more than 6,000 villages and towns have been swept away by the floods, as one-fifth of the country is under water.

Orthodox statement on gays welcomed

Rights advocate gives his blessing

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Longtime gay-rights advocate David Brody, a practising Orthodox Jew, hails the statement on acceptance of homosexuals signed by what is now more than 170 Orthodox rabbis and others as "an extremely progressive" development, but he regrets that it doesn't approve "affirmation ceremonies" for same-sex couples.

"I never thought I would see such an open-minded document in my lifetime," said Brody, who is in his late 60s and has been a member of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim for many years. He's hopeful that in time further steps will be taken toward full equality for gays and lesbians.

Shaar Hashomayim's Rabbi Adam Scheier and assistant Rabbi Yonah Berman are among the signatories of the Statement of Principles on the Place of Jews with a Homosexual Orientation in Our Community, released in July and signed by mainly modern Orthodox rabbis, as well as educators and mental health professionals, from the United States, Canada and Israel.

The other Montreal signatory is Rabbi Mordechai Glick, a psychologist and leader of a small Côte St. Luc congregation.

Brody said he has always felt welcome at Shaar Hashomayim, but the statement affirms that he's respected as any other Jew in the community, except in its denial of recognition of his choice of partner.

"Why can't our rabbis bless two people who pledge their love and fidelity and pursuit of the values of Judaism... Same-sex unions should not be compared to heterosexual marriage," said Brody.

Rabbi Scheier said that is "not where we are right now." To him, the significance of the statement is its attempt to reconcile Jewish law's prohibition of homosexual acts with the recognition that "wonderful members of the community," like Brody, should be welcomed as full members.

There will be no noticeable changes at the synagogue, the rabbi said, because its practice already is in keeping with the principles that were drawn up after six months of discussion. Although Rabbi Scheier is modern Orthodox, Shaar Hashomayim is independent of any denomination, but follows traditional Judaism.

For Rabbi Scheier, 31, the statement is "a beautiful affirmation of what forward-looking congregations such as Shaar Hashomayim have practised for many years: the unwavering commitment to Jewish law coupled with a deep sensitivity to all members of our community, regardless of sexual orientation.

"We have no synagogue policies – ritual or otherwise – that discriminate against homosexuals, and the statement affirms our commitment to this openness."

Rabbi Scheier is also president of the interdenominational Montreal Board of Rabbis, but did not endorse the statement in that capacity.

Brody's other caveat about the statement was its inclusion of mental-health professionals, which he said leaves the impression homosexuality is a disorder or a personal choice. "I think it would have been more appropriate to include sociologists," he said. (The statement affirms the right of homosexuals to reject therapies that some rabbis, it acknowledges, believe can "change" them, noting that most mental-health professionals today believe they are ineffective or even damaging.)

Both Rabbi Scheier and Brody agree strongly with the principle enunciated that Jewish gays and lesbians should not be pressured to marry a person of the opposite sex because it has been shown to have harmful consequences for all involved.

Brody has spoken at Shaar Hashomayim on growing up Orthodox and gay, and Rabbi Scheier wrote words of praise in the introduction to Brody's novel, Mourning and Celebration: Jewish, Orthodox and Gay/Past & Present, which he published last year and imagines what it would have been like to be a young gay man in a 19th-century shtetl.

But he adds, "I go to synagogue not as a gay person. I go as a Jew. I have no agenda."

Rabbi Glick, founder of Congregation Ahavat Yisroel, comes from more traditional Orthodoxy and an older generation than Rabbi Scheier. At one time, he thought that psychotherapy might be able to change sexual orientation, if that's what a person wants.

Today, he's not so sure. There is some evidence of its efficacy, he said, but sufficient scientific research has not been conducted, he said, for him to recommend it.

Rabbi Glick likened the gay-rights struggle to that of black people for full civil rights.

"I know some gays and their issues and problems. I'm also sensitive to the fact that people do not change their attitudes easily, particularly among religious people," he said. "I regard this as still being an evolving issue."

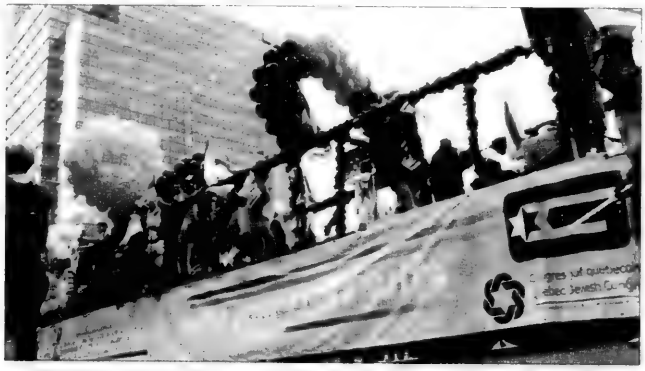
For him, this is an important development because it publicly states that "Jews are Jews, and should be welcomed and part of the synagogue. But it's not anything ground-breaking, it just reminds people that we have to go out of our way to be more welcoming."

While homosexuality is not condoned by Orthodox Judaism, the individual with that orientation must be accepted, he said. "The two things should not be mixed up."

He said he would have no problem with same-sex couples coming to his congregation, either.

A notable absence from the list of signatories was Rabbi Alan Bright of Congregation Shaare Zedek, who has been outspoken in his support for the full inclusion of gays and lesbians in his synagogue's life. He even wrote to Pope Benedict a lengthy letter explaining why he believes homosexuals must be accepted as full participants in Jewish religious life, and urging the pontiff to reconsider the Roman Catholic Church's position on homosexuality.

"I was not approached on this matter or asked to sign it. Of course, I would have," Rabbi Bright explained. "Perhaps you should ask the rabbis who were party to it. I would like to know the reason."



SHOWING SUPPORT: The Montreal Jewish gay group Ga'ava (Hebrew for pride) and Quebec Jewish Congress (QJC) had a large, colourful float in the gay pride parade through downtown Aug. 15. The side panels read: Tel Aviv – Zone de liberté pour LGBT Juifs, pointing to Israel's tolerant attitude to homosexuality compared to much of the Muslim world. Among those on board was QJC president Adam Atlas, seen holding a poster near the left. QJC condemned the presence of Queers Come Out Against Israeli Apartheid, but stressed that the main reason for its participation was to support gay rights. The protest group's appearance was marginal.

CJC opposes honour for late Ottawa mayor

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jewish Congress has sent a letter to Minister of the Environment Jim Prentice outlining its case against bestowing federal honours on former Ottawa mayor Charlotte Whitton.

Congress believes Whitton's outspoken anti-Semitism, at a time when Jews were desperately fleeing Nazi Germany, should preclude any posthumous recognition.

"Clearly she is is not deserving of honours," said Congress CEO Bernie Farber. "She was single-handedly responsible for ensuring Jewish orphans not be admitted into Canada… That weighs so heavily on her integrity that no federal honour should be bestowed on her."

Charlotte Whitton

Whitton was elected mayor of Ottawa on multiple occasions in the 1950s and '60s and, according to the online Canadian Encyclopedia, was a "driving force behind the Canadian Council on Child Welfare (later the Canadian Welfare Council and the Canadian Council on Social Development) from 1920 to 1941. A noted feminist, she was a pioneer in promoting women's integration into the political sphere."

Whitton was recommended for federal honour – a plaque outlining her achievements would be set in a public place – by The Famous 5 Ottawa Committee, a volunteer organization named for five prominent Canadians who fought for women's rights: Emily Murphy, Nellie McClung, Irene Parlby, Henrietta Muir Edwards and Louse McKinney.

The Famous 5's recommendation was directed to the Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada.

Larry Ostola, director general of National Historic Sites for the board, said that on average, 200 subjects, including persons, places and events, are submitted for consideration each year, with the board narrowing that group to 60 or 70 for further research. The board meets in June and December to deliberate and make recommendations. Ultimately the minister makes the decision whether to award an honour, he said.

In 2007 and 2008, the most recent years for which data is available, the minister approved 41 and 45 designations, respectively.

Farber said Whitton is undeserving of federal recognition because she was motivated by "pure unmitigated anti-Semitism" and "lobbied strenuously" to keep Jewish orphans out of Canada.

He said historians Irving Abella and Harold Troper, in their book None is Too Many, documented her role in the Canadian National Committee for Refugees (CNCR) in attempting to bar Jewish orphan refugees.

Congress officials at the time called her "an enemy of Jewish immigration" while one Congress official said Whitton "'almost broke up the inaugural meeting of the CNCR by her insistent opposition and very apparent anti-Semitism,'" Farber said.

Bernie Farber

An opinion piece co-authored by Farber and Mitchell Bellman, president and CEO of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa, notes that "Whitton was not merely a passive 'product of her generation'… she embraced the anti-Semitic zeitgeist of 1930s Canada and acted on her beliefs to the doom of hundreds of Jewish child refugees. Her mindset that would exclude orphaned children as refugees during the war based solely on the fact they were Jews makes her, in our view, ineligible for any citations or honours."

Calls to the Famous 5 Committee for comment were not returned.

Coast to Coast

Stephen Harper, centre, shares a laugh with MP Bob Dechert, left at a cultural media roundtable discussion with members of the press last week in Toronto. At right, Senator Salma Ataullahjan. [Jason Ransom photo]

'Foolhardy' for the world to underestimate Ahmadinejad

Harper added that Canada can only be effective in this matter if it continues to work "closely" with its allies, particularly through the G8 and NATO, to bring about tougher sanctions and resolutions.

"I can't answer your questions about how long we will give [the new sanctions] to work and what's next. I can only tell you that we… will continue to consult with our allies on what the appropriate step forward is. But I can't stress enough to the Canadian people, and to the global community when I've spoken to other world leaders, that I think it would be foolhardy for the world to in any way underestimate either the determination of [Ahmadinejad's] regime to acquire nuclear weapons or the threat this regime holding nuclear weapons would pose to all of us. And other leaders are certainly aware of my view on that score," he said.

Harper was joined at the roundtable by Bob Dechert, Conservative MP for Mississauga-Erindale, and recently appointed senator Salma Ataullahjan. The event was held at a hotel near Pearson International Airport, and reporters were limited to asking one or two pre-submitted questions of interest to their readerships.

Other topics raised included concerns about a renewed recession, recognizing foreign professional qualifications – "I think we're making some progress, but we concede more needs to be done," Harper said – and credit card companies' interest rate charges, a concern for new immigrants who often rely on the cards.

Harper said the government is concerned "about some of the practices that are out there in terms of the credit card industry, and we've been trying to use some degree of persuasion to adjust those practices."

Asked whether there would be a fall election, he said, "Not if I have my way. We need to stay focused on the economy and not get pushed into a bunch of political games. So I've been very clear. I'm not planning to call an election this fall."

The prime minister also fielded questions about how Canada views refugees from abroad, and specifically about the hundreds of Tamils who arrived in Victoria last week aboard the ship Sun Sea.

"It's important to stress that the vast majority of people who come to this country, not just from the Indian subcontinent, do so because they see a land of tremendous opportunity for themselves, their children and their descendants. They come here to belong to Canada and contribute to the country while maintaining their roots and connections with those they've left behind. That cannot be forgotten," he said.

"Regarding the Sun Sea, Canada is a place of refuge, but I think Canadians get concerned when hundreds of people start arriving by boat without any attempt to go through an application process or pursue normal travel channels. And there is considerable evidence in this case that this was an illegal operation with a secret exchange of money to engage in human smuggling," he added.

"Canadians expect [the government] to protect our sovereignty and security and that we take whatever steps are necessary to deal with this growing phenomenon of trafficking in human smuggling. If we have to strengthen laws to give ourselves more tools to deal with it, we will."

Time to end the silence

By RABBI J. BENJAMIN FRIEDBERG

Guest Voice

On Aug. 3, 2010, Gilad Schalit completed 1,500 days in captivity under Hamas, somewhere in Gaza. That is more than four years. "Captivity" is not the appropriate word; "hell" would be a more accurate description.

As a Hamas prisoner, Schalit would not know how many days have passed since his kidnapping, nor would he know day from night, nor would he know whether his family is alive or dead. In all probability, he is in a windowless room since he was nabbed by Hamas and/or its affiliates.

Schalit and two other soldiers were at an Israeli army post in Israel near the Gaza Strip. Some Hamas terrorists burrowed under the border, came up suddenly on the Israeli side, killed Schalit's two companions and kidnapped him. Other than a less-than-a-minute video of Schalit to prove he is still alive and for which Israel paid 20 female prisoners, we know absolutely nothing about Schalit.

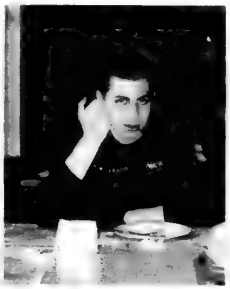
Is he still alive or is he dead? We don't know. Is his health still firm or is he sick? We don't know. Mentally and emotionally, is he still strong or, as is more than likely, has there been deterioration? We don't know. Why don't we know? We don't know because Hamas has kept Gilad completely isolated from the rest of the world: no contact with his family, no correspondence, no visits – all these deprivations are completely contrary to international law. If there ever was a case of denial of human rights, of the breaking of international law and of sheer inhumanity, the case of Gilad Schalit is it.

The CJN article "Red Cross admits Schalit failure" (Aug. 5) outlines the efforts of the International Committee of the Red Cross to visit Schalit in the Hamas prison, as is the organization's right and duty, and states that the Red Cross has been refused by Hamas. The Red Cross claims it has made intense efforts and applied strong pressure to see Schalit. That could be. In any case, whatever efforts have been made by the Red Cross have been repulsed.

But except for the odd voice such as The CJN – in its Aug. 5 issue, as well as Norma Baumel Joseph's July 15 CJN column, "Is he really MIA" – and some Jewish Tribune reporting, the Schalit case has elicited a loud silence, especially in North America.

All the left-wing organizations so ready to accuse Israel falsely of human rights violations against the Palestinians remain close-mouthed in the Schalit case. So many professors in academia who condemn Israel, again wrongly, and call for boycotting contact with Israeli universities, suddenly are at a loss for words in this case. The unions, some of them having suddenly decided to flog Israel for its supposed maltreatment of the Gaza Arabs, have nothing to say in this case.

But the strongest silence comes from the Jewish communities here, and that includes Toronto, which really has a wonderful Jewish community, and normally is a leader in fighting for Jewish causes. This silence is true of the community-structured organizations, and even more seriously, it is true of the synagogues, which should really lead in this matter. Since it really is a clear case of pidyon shevuyim, the redemption of Jewish captives, it is every Jew's obligation to be involved.



Gilad Schalit

The time has come for us, our community, our synagogues and organizations to lift up our voices loud and clear, to raise a banner on which Schalit's name is inscribed, that he must be treated with minimal humanity, that his family and the international organizations such as the Red Cross may visit with him, and that ultimately he be freed. Let us make his name and his case known across our city and land and beyond, through our efforts. Let us indeed pressure the International Committee of the Red Cross to go beyond its minimal efforts up to now. Let us indeed bombard the press and media to publicize his case. I assume there are ways of doing that.

Let us indeed confront the left-wingers and dare them to put the Schalit case on their agenda. Similarly, we have to make the professors find their tongues and the unions their sense of fairness.

We are silent here, but the Israelis are not. For some time, with or without Schalit's parents, there have been daily efforts on behalf of Gilad in Israel by a variety of groups and individuals.

As you may know, Hamas wants Israel to pay a ransom of more than 1,000 Palestinians imprisoned in Israel. They have been tried and convicted, include many terrorists with Jewish blood on their hands. There is a fierce debate in Israel on this matter. To decide to give in to Hamas would create some terrible dangers. Not to give in leaves Schalit where he is. It is a terrible dilemma, but our activity on behalf of Schalit should not include telling the government of Israel what to do. Our task is to publicize his case and pressure the right parties. We have to remember how the Jewish communities made the Sharansky case famous and helped in his release. (Natan Sharansky, now chairman of the Jewish Agency, was a Soviet refusenik and prisoner.) I know the two cases are not exactly the same, and that Hamas is not the Soviet Union, yet there are things we can do.

Now what do we do? First of all, the organized Jewish community must set up a body to deal with this. It should provide publicity and information and try to influence the press, academia and government agencies that could be involved. For instance, demonstrations and the like should be arranged. The synagogues, working through their Israel action committees, should provide information to their members and should call their people to demonstrations when necessary. The synagogues can be the arm to call upon the churches to join in this rescue effort, especially the left-wing churches that are so busy criticizing Israel. If the churches will not co-operate, then we have to ask ourselves, "What is this interfaith business all about?" Synagogues should also approach the "moderate" mosques and imams for their assistance in this matter.

To carry this further, any anti-Israel demonstration on campus or anywhere else should be challenged by a Jewish counter-demonstration pressing the case of Schalit, among other things. As well, the Jewish schools should teach their students about the matter. Many Jewish schools stress tikkun olam. Here is a wonderful opportunity to practise tikkun olam and the mitzvah of pidyon shevuyim.

The time of keeping silent is over.

Obituary

Dylex founder recalled as a 'true leader'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Wilfred Posluns, who died Aug. 15 at age 78, is remembered by family and friends as a true giant in the community.

He was co-founder in 1966, along with his brothers Irving and Jack, of Dylex Ltd., a $2-billion international retailing and manufacturing business, and was also managing director of Cedarpoint Investments and director of Wet Seal Inc.

His community involvement included being a member of the advisory council of United Israel Appeal and the board of governors of Mount Sinai Hospital, as well as serving Baycrest as treasurer, a member of its board of directors, and chair of its foundation.

Wilfred Posluns

He was also involved in such organizations as what is now UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, as well as Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation, the Jewish Camp Council, Canadian Friends of Hebrew University, United Way and Princess Margaret Hospital.

Through the Posluns Family Foundation, of which he was president, he distributed funds to such organizations as Baycrest, Princess Margaret Hospital, the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, Associated Hebrew Schools, B'nai Brith Canada and Beth Tzedec Foundation.

Born in Toronto in 1932 to Louis and Leah Posluns, he graduated with a commerce and finance degree from the University of Toronto and worked as a stockbroker before joining his family's clothing manufacturing business in 1961.

Within five years, Dylex was formed, an aggregate of retail and manufacturing businesses that would become the largest specialty retail conglomerate in Canada, with more than 1,000 outlets – including the Tip Top Tailors and Fairweather clothing chains – and employing more than 10,000 people.

In his eulogy, Posluns' son, David, said his father was not only imposing physically, "he was a giant in the community, a giant in the business world, and a giant influence on his wife, children, grandchildren, in-laws, brothers, nieces, nephews, friends and business associates.

"He was a man of principle, passion, deep-rooted values, clarity, predictability, vision, optimism and compassion. [These are] characteristics of a true leader, [and] not surprisingly, he was the leader in every undertaking he pursued."

Posluns said his father was also a mentor and adviser to countless individuals. "He got involved when needed. He helped people resolve their disputes and manage their personal finances when they got into difficulty."

He was dedicated to his family, Posluns said, and together with his wife of 57 years, Joyce, he dedicated himself "to providing a loving nurturing home and stable family environment.

"To anyone who interacted with him, they would say he was deeply family-oriented, a builder, a consensus-maker, a competitor, a romantic, a generous benefactor, a champion of the abused, and a strong supporter of the community and the State of Israel."

New machzor aims for accessibilty, inspiration

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

This Rosh Hashanah, worshippers in Conservative congregations across North America will find themselves using a new machzor. Among them are two Canadian synagogues, Ottawa's Agudath Israel Congregation, and Hamilton's Beth Jacob Synagogue.

More than 150,000 copies of the High Holidays prayer book, Machzor Lev Shalem, have been pre-sold, representing orders from nearly 130 of some 650 affiliated congregations, of which 21 are Canadian.

The strong interest might stem from "dissatisfaction with all previous machzors," said Rabbi Stuart Kelman of Berkeley, Calif., a member of the committee that produced the prayer book.

Rabbi Dan Selsberg of Hamilton's Beth Jacob – a 300-family egalitarian congregation that has used the High Holiday Prayer Book, known as the Silverman machzor, for some 50 years – said that he was struck by the fact that editor Rabbi Morris Silverman's dedication in the machzor was dated September 1939.

"You could hardly have a more chilling date in Jewish history," Rabbi Selsberg said, referring to Germany's invasion of Poland and the beginning of World War II. "The world that we live in is radically different from the world we lived in then, while the prayers remain in large part the same… It was time to bring in a perspective that understood the world that Jews in the 21st century live in."

He noted in particular marginal notes and insights that enhance the new machzor.

"I couldn't be more excited," Rabbi Selsberg said. "It's a physically lovely book, which is not the most important thing, but it's not insignificant either. The printing is very clear. The translation is very clear. It's faithful to the Hebrew, and doesn't gloss over difficult passages. There are wonderful comments and poems along the sides, often from people who don't make it into Jewish prayerbooks, [like] women and modern voices."

Agudath Israel's Rabbi Charles Popky, whose congregation in Ottawa also had the Silverman machzors, has used Lev Shalem for teaching since May.

He likes it for its commentary, meditations and use of contemporary English, and he believes the new book will be "much more engaging," both for those who are familiar with the service and those who aren't.

Rabbi Popky also thinks the new machzor's inclusion of prayer alternatives suits his 550-member congregation, where women participate in all aspects of the Torah services, but don't lead formal Shacharit and Musaf services or count in the minyan.

For example, Lev Shalem has two versions of the Amidah on the same page – the traditional prayer that refers only to the patriarchs, and one that includes the matriarchs.

Although Agudath Israel does not include the matriarchs when the Amidah is repeated at services, "certainly when an individual is praying silently, [he or she] may recite whatever he or she feels comfortable with," Rabbi Popky said. "It's comfortable for those who are more traditional and for those who want a little more creativity."

Posluns lauded as great role model

He was also known to love his garden, cottage and action movies, David said.

In a statement after Posluns' death, Mark Gryfe, president of Baycrest Foundation, noted that in recognition of Posluns' longstanding commitment to Baycrest, he was named an honorary director of the centre and the foundation. At the 2010 annual general meeting this past June, Gryfe said, Baycrest presented the inaugural Wilfred Posluns Award for Foundation Leadership, "appropriately enough to his daughter, Lynn, in whose work at Baycrest he took so much pride."

On a personal level, said Gryfe, "Wilfred was a mentor who guided me both professionally and personally. Tough on the outside, I got to know him as the big teddy bear he really was.

"[He] was responsible for bringing me to Baycrest, and until his final week was in constant contact, providing counsel and making sure all was good."

Tommy Ehrlich, a business associate and close friend, said that although he was 26 years younger than Posluns, "I was involved with him for 30 years, and he was always there to provide advice.

"He had the uncanny ability to get to the heart of complex matters, and he was honorable and fair. He was a great role model both in business and in the community. He leaves a big, big hole."

In addition to his wife, Joyce, and son David, Posluns is survived by his daughters Wendy and Lynn, daughter-in-law Felicia, and sons-in-law Lewis Mitz and Ken Crystal, as well as 14 grandchildren.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Digital Jewish calendars

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

When I was growing up, one of the sure signs of that Rosh Hashanah was on the way was the stack of fresh calendars piled on the counter at the bakery. Flip through the months and you were bound to see a new shot of sunrise over Masada or perhaps sunset at the Kotel. You can still get a calendar the old fashioned way by walking into your nearest bakery or Judaica store. Or you can do it the easy way, via the Web.

Jewish & Digital!
By Mark Mietkiewicz

I highly recommend the web-based Hebcal interactive Jewish calendar. Plug in the name of your city and customize whether you'd like the Hebrew date, holidays or that week's Torah portion to appear. Click and you have a personalized calendar. And if your travels take you off the beaten path, just type in the longitude and latitude of your destination and presto, instant Jewish calendar for Norway or Nepal. [http://bit.ly/jcal01]

The Ezras Torah foundation is well known for its information-packed wall and pocket calendars. That calendar is now available online and as a download. The real benefit of this calendar is the detailed explanation about major holiday-related customs for the coming year and specific notes about possible exceptions. (Donation requested.) [http://bit.ly/jcal02]

Andrew Tannenbaum's 50-Year Yahrzeit Calendar Calculator does exactly what it promises. Plug in a date (using either the Jewish or civil calendar) and the page generates a list which tells you when the yahrzeit will fall. [http://bit.ly/jcal03]

Users of Firefox know about the thousands of plug-ins that allow you to customize the browser to your liking. Thanks to the Hebrew calendar plug-in, today's Jewish date is always but a glance away at the bottom right of my browser. Works for both Macs and PCs. [http://bit.ly/jcal05]

As you can see, there are many sites that will allow you to convert between the Jewish and civil (Gregorian) calendars. But what if you need to know when this year's first day of Rosh Hashanah falls on the Muslim, Persian or Mayan calendars? No worries. Punch in the date at this site and you get your answers:

- Muslim: 30 Ramadan 1431
- Persian: 18 Shahrivar 1389
- Mayan: 12.19.17.12.6 19 Mol 2 Cimi

[http://bit.ly/jcal04]

Rather than looking everything up on the web, you may want a stand-alone calendar program. Kaluach3 for Windows is excellent (and free). It lets you look up birthdays and yahrzeits and can be set for hundreds of cities around the world. [http://bit.ly/jcal06] Check out the great Tichnut page for a summary of other Jewish calendar programs – some free, some not – that you can download. [http://bit.ly/jcal12]

And let's not forget our handhelds. Barry Bernstein's iLuach for iPhone features a perpetual Hebrew calendar, candlelighting times, the complete text of the Tanach and more. [http://bit.ly/jcal08] Siddur & Zmanim for iPhone combines weekday prayer book with Jewish calendar functionality. [http://bit.ly/jcal09]

BlackBerry users can install Ronen Lalevy's Jewish Hebrew Calendar. [http://bit.ly/jcal14] As for the Palm, I've been using Penticon's Luach for years. [http://bit.ly/jcal11] Note: there are many BlackBerry and Palm models so the above apps may not work on all of them.

Although the programs I've mentioned do a fine job of calculating dates, even the Internet still can't create a free glossy calendar that comes with lovely photos of sunrise over Masada or sunset at the Kotel. Maybe that bakery shop calendar isn't threatened, yet.

The value of giving

In committing to give away more than 99 per cent of his wealth, U.S. billionaire Warren Buffett challenged the world's wealthiest people to make a greater commitment to philanthropy. This month, his peer pressure bore fruit, as 40 American billionaires signed the Giving Pledge to donate at least half of their wealth to charity.

CLASS ACT
By Daniel Held

The infusion of hundreds of billions of dollars into the fight against diseases, malnutrition, poverty and other needs will serve as a tipping point in these struggles. The value of the donations can't be measured in dollars, but rather in lives saved and changed. Moreover, beyond the impact of these donations, the power of the example must be recognized.

Buffett leveraged his own commitment to pressure others to follow his lead. While Judaism advocates for anonymous donations, we also realize that charity is peer-driven. Had Buffett followed the Rambam's principle of giving anonymously – assuming for a moment that one could silently slip $60 billion into the pocket of a handful of charities – he would have forfeited the leverage of his donation and been unable to pressure other billionaires into giving. I've often had students question donor walls in schools or naming rights for a new building. While we value anonymous giving, we must also realize that honouring those who give encourages greater philanthropy.

As remarkable as it may be for Buffett to give away 99 per cent of his wealth, he acknowledges that doing so will not have any impact on his or his children's standard of living. They will continue to live blessed lives cushioned by wealth. A UJA fundraiser once told me that he considers small donations, made by youth, students and those with fewer financial resources, to be "meaningful donations." While donations in increments of $18 may not build buildings, they do build a base of committed supporters.

It's said that 80 per cent of charity comes from 20 per cent of donors. While fiscally it would be prudent for charities to focus their fundraising efforts on the small cadre of big donors, doing so weakens the overarching mission of the charity. Small donors serve as evangelists for a cause. They devote their time to volunteer, they carry the message of the charity to their friends and relatives, and cultivating an ongoing relationship with a small donor may one day pay dividends with a larger commitment.

Moreover, for Jewish charities, small donations are a form of affiliation. Even if a synagogue were underwritten by a mega-donor or if day school tuition were subsidized by a philanthropic fund, membership dues and tuition fees would still serve as an important form of relationship building between the family and the institution. Every $18 donation I make connects me to the mission of the charity and its community of supporters.

Especially during uncertain economic times, our community must seek out small, meaningful donations. Allow me to cite one successful example. The Jim Joseph Foundation recently partnered with Mechon Hadar, a study institute in New York City. A $1-million Jim Joseph grant will match every new donation to Mechon Hadar dollar for dollar. Through the program, small donors feel that they're getting more boom for their 18 bucks, Mechon Hadar is building a database of supporters they can turn to year after year, and the Jim Joseph Foundation is not only offering the charity an infusion of cash, but helping to build an infrastructure of supporters. In the long run, making an investment to court small donors and building lifelong donor-charity relationships will serve the charity, the donor and our community.

While Buffett should be applauded for his positive example to pressure 40 billionaires to give away their fortunes, we must continue to value $18 donations alongside $18-billion dollar commitments.

Jewish Life

Gearing up for a new year

The new school year begins Sept. 7. For Rabbi Chaim Boyarsky and the Chabad Student Network of Ottawa, this means a lot of preparation. Since Rabbi Boyarsky and his wife, Yocheved, came to Ottawa in 2008, they have striven to provide a welcoming atmosphere for Jewish students, regardless of whether they were born and raised in Ottawa or are from elsewhere in the province, the country or the world.

On Campus
By Justin Dahan

Their mission is to provide an open environment in their home at 29 Gilmour St. where Jewish students can form bonds with other Jewish students, whether they are religious or secular.

Sarah Librach, a graduate of the University of Ottawa, says Chabad has "given me the opportunity to practise Judaism in ways that both comfort and inspire me. It has given me the opportunity to connect with Jewish students all across Canada and has provided me with a place to call home. I am so thankful for Chabad and everything it has provided, from Shabbat dinners to enlightening conversations. Chabad has truly been my home away from home."

Of course, Chabad also provides a chance for Jewish students to learn about and gain a stronger bond with their religious roots. University of Ottawa student Adam Walters is thankful that Rabbi Boyarsky meets him on campus during his lunch break to help him put on tfillin.

"This has undoubtedly brought me closer in my relationship not only with God and the rabbi, but also with myself as a unique Jewish person," he says.

Adam's brother, David Walters, is also involved in the Chabad Student Network. Not only is he a regular participant in Shabbat dinners and Chabad events, he is also a graduate of the Sinai Scholars program that Rabbi Boyarsky uses to teach Jewish students about Judaism and life.

"Sinai Scholars allowed me to think more deeply about life's priorities," David Walters says. "I felt the desire to become an active participant in the Jewish community after taking the course, since I was able to connect with mentors and friends and recognize the importance of the community."

He has since made a new connection with the Jewish community – he took a Yiddish-language class offered by the University of Ottawa and taught by Prof. Rebecca Margolis, in which he excelled at the basic fundamentals of the Yiddish language.

Yocheved Boyarsky is also an important part of Chabad's role on campus. She offers classes for women on a broad range of topics. Rebecca Trueman, a graduate of Algonquin College, looks back on these classes fondly.

"Some of my favourite times at Chabad have been the classes for women offered by Yocheved. Whether these classes are on Jewish cooking, holidays, life, love or Torah, I have always left knowing something new, feeling better about who I am and more focused on where I want to be going," Trueman says.

These stories represent only a small number of students who have been affected by the Chabad presence in Ottawa, and Rabbi Boyarsky plans to continue to provide a positive environment for Jewish students.

Jonathan Pollard, 25 years on November of this year will mark 25 years since the arrest in the United States of Jonathan Pollard, a civilian naval intelligence analyst, on charges of spying for Israel.

Many readers will recall that Pollard entered into a plea bargain on the basis that the U.S. Justice Department would not ask for a life sentence. He pleaded guilty to passing classified information to an ally. A grand jury studied the case, and as a result, no charges were brought against him for having harmed the security of the United States and its people.

Guest Voice
By Bert Raphael

It's worth noting that in 1983, then-president Ronald Reagan signed an executive agreement with Israel in which the United States promised to relay all available intelligence vital to Israel's survival. Pollard believed his superiors weren't fulfilling this obligation, and as an ardent Zionist, he was concerned that Israeli citizens were in danger. The information he gave Israel concerned Syrian and Iraqi chemical, biological and nuclear build-up, as well as missile development and deployment.

He was told that if he would forgo a trial and have a hearing in camera that the government would be lenient, and on this basis, he waived his right to a trial. On the morning of the hearing, March 4, 1987, Caspar Weinberger, then secretary of defence, delivered a letter to the judge asking for the stiffest possible sentence commensurate with a charge of treason. Of course, Pollard was never accused of treason. After getting the letter, the judge sentenced Pollard to life in jail with a recommendation for no parole.

Most certainly in Ontario, no judge would allow a government minister or anyone else to interfere with the independence of the judiciary, and of course, Weinberger's letter should have been rejected. Weinberger's intervention, when made public, was an affront to the U.S. justice system. Pollard's lawyer failed to file an appeal within 10 days, and that technical oversight was upheld through a series of appeals.

When the U.S. Court of Appeal handed down its ruling on March 20, 1992, on a 2-1 verdict, it held that a right to a trial had been waived. Ironically, it was two Jewish jurists who dismissed the appeal, while a gentile circuit judge, Stephen Williams, found that the government breached the plea bargain agreement and said he would have vacated the sentence and sent the case back for a resentencing before a new judge. Williams found that there had been a fundamental miscarriage of justice and that the government complied in spirit with none of its promises. An application was filed to the Supreme Court for leave to appeal, but that court, without reasons, declined to hear the case.

Pollard's sentence is inconsistent with any other precedent cases involving the passing of state secrets to an ally. In fact, it exceeds those given for treason and the passing of state secrets to an enemy.

I was retained by Pollard as a Canadian counsel, and on his behalf, I wrote dozens of letters, spoke at various synagogues and raised his plight at an international conference of Jewish lawyers and jurists. American and Israeli lawyers declined to issue a resolution condemning his sentence, fearing that it would negatively affect relations between the Israel and the United States.

Many leading personalities worldwide have urged that Pollard be pardoned. No Israeli prime minister has called for his release publicly, and many direct appeals to most U.S. presidents have basically gone unanswered, but for the record, I should indicate that Bill Clinton wrote to me and said he would look into the matter. Nothing came of that.

Pollard's second wife, Esther, dismissed me and other lawyers acting on his behalf and prohibited us from speaking out for him. She also blocked all contact between Pollard and his family. Her position is that he should be regarded as a hero and, therefore, should not apologize for having violated U.S. law. It's my firm belief that if he had apologized some years ago, he would now be a free man in Israel.

Food Ideas for the Holidays

Pan pals share Rosh Hashanah food memories

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

The Jewish High Holidays are quickly approaching and the main topic of conversation at this time of year always seems to be: "What's on your menu?" Every family has their favourite foods that they look forward to eating when they gather together around the holiday table.

Along with tender slices of juicy brisket, sweet and sour meatballs and glazed roast chicken or turkey packed with stuffing, many symbolic foods are included on the menu – apple slices dipped in honey or layered and baked into a luscious cake, ruby-red pomegranate seeds scattered over mixed salad greens, plump gefilte fish dumplings or slices (either sweet or salt-and-pepper) garnished with carrot rounds, honey-sweetened carrot tzimmes, and moist, delicious honey cake.

Chopped dates, raisins and cranberries might be added to a couscous or quinoa pilaf that includes sautéed chopped leeks and carrots, or golden butternut squash might be baked into a tasty pudding or kugel. The traditional dishes that have been passed down through various generations are on the menu once again, filling our homes with tantalizing aromas and nostalgic food memories.

It's always helpful to do some cooking and baking in advance. Make your chicken soup and challahs ahead of time and freeze them. Meatballs, cabbage rolls and brisket also freeze beautifully or can be made a day or two in advance and refrigerated. Instead of stuffing turkey or chicken, bake the stuffing separately in a casserole dish. Cover it if you want the stuffing to be soft, bake it uncovered if you like it crusty. Honey cake freezes beautifully, but apple cake often gets a bit soggy if frozen. However, if you reheat your apple cake at 350 for 10 minutes, loosely covered, it will taste as if it was just baked!

Each year, I ask my foodie friends to share some of their favourite recipes for the High Holidays. Here is a sampling of some of the dishes that my "pan-pals" near and far will be serving this year to family and friends for Rosh Hashanah. Best wishes to all for a sweet, healthy and delicious New Year!

My friend Tolsa Greenberg of Toronto and I often exchange recipes. Her scrumptious squash pudding makes a terrific side dish for Rosh Hashanah. Tolsa told me, "It's a bit on the sweet side, so use less sugar if you prefer, or even use a sugar substitute." She got the recipe a few years ago from her daughter, Cheryl Greenberg Colt, who got it from a friend. Tolsa's seven-year-old grandson, Jake, loves pancakes and would eat them for breakfast, lunch and dinner if his mother would let him. When Jake was five, his mother wasn't sure if he would eat this pudding if she told him it was called a kugel, so instead, she told him it was called "pancake pudding." Jake tasted it and declared, "This is the best pancake pudding I ever ate!"

TOLSA GREENBERG'S BUTTERNUT SQUASH PUDDING

2 lb. frozen squash
3/4 cup sugar (or less if you prefer)
1 cup flour
6 eggs, lightly beaten
1 cup pareve whipping cream
1 tbsp. melted margarine
1/2 tsp. vanilla extract
1 tsp. baking powder
cinnamon for sprinkling

Put frozen squash in a casserole. Cover and microwave on high power for 10 to 15 minutes, until tender. Mash with a potato masher.

Add sugar, flour, eggs, whipping cream, margarine, vanilla and baking powder to squash and mix well. Use an immersion blender and mix until smooth.

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 9 x 13-in. baking dish. Spread mixture evenly in baking dish and sprinkle with cinnamon. Bake about 45 minutes, until golden brown. Yield: 8 to 10 servings. Leftovers (if any) can be reheated or frozen.

Talk about recipes that travel! Tina Kauffman of Montreal got this recipe from her friend Loni Kupferberg, who got it from her mother who lives in New York City. Tina told me: "On Rosh Hashanah, I leave the oven on at 250, so just before I light candles, all the food (except for my brisket, which goes into the oven 1/2 an hour before everything else) goes into the oven for about an hour or however long it takes for the men to get back from shul."

TINA KAUFFMAN'S TANGY TONGUE

1 large beef tongue (3 to 4 lb.)
1 large jar (7.5 oz.) apricot baby food
1/4 cup orange juice
1 to 2 tbsp. lemon juice
a "shpritz" of ketchup (1 to 2 tbsp.)
3 tbsp. brown sugar
a fistful of golden raisins, optional (about 1/2 cup)

Place tongue in a large pot and add cold water to cover tongue completely. Bring to a boil and skim. Reduce heat and simmer uncovered until tongue is tender, about 2 hours, adding additional boiling water as needed when it evaporates.

Remove tongue from liquid and let cool. Meanwhile, combine apricot baby food with orange juice, lemon juice, ketchup, brown sugar and raisins in a small saucepan.

Peel and slice tongue. Arrange slices in a greased ovenproof serving dish. Pour sauce over tongue and cover the baking dish. (This can be made in advance and refrigerated. It tastes best the next day.)

About an hour before serving, place the covered casserole in a 200-degree oven to reheat slowly. Yield: 6 servings.

I've been "pan-pals" with Sandy Loeffler of Oak Park, Mich., for many years. We finally met face-to-face when she and her husband, David, attended the annual dinner of the Jewish Food List held in Toronto in August. Food was the main topic of our conversation and she promised to send me a lentil recipe that she often makes for Sukkot. When Sandy couldn't find it, she sent me this delicious brisket recipe instead. It comes from a cookbook published by her local Hillel Day School parent-teacher organization called Kiss the Cook! Sandy wrote: "I know it's a bit of a patchke, but this is so-o-o good! It's made with carrots and prunes, which makes it an ideal dish for Rosh Hashanah!"

SANDY LOEFFLER'S FAVOURITE BRISKET WITH DRIED FRUIT

Adapted from Kiss the Cook

3/4 cup quartered dried apricots (divided)
9 large cloves of garlic (divided)
3 1/2 tsp. ground cumin (divided)
1 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. ground cinnamon
1/4 tsp. ground black pepper
4 1/2 to 5 lb. flat-cut beef brisket
3 tbsp. olive oil
additional salt and pepper
4 cups chopped onions
2 medium carrots, coarsely chopped
1 tbsp. peeled, minced fresh ginger root
1 tsp. ground coriander
1/8 tsp. cayenne pepper
1 cup dry red wine
2 cups beef stock
2/3 cups pitted prunes, quartered (or substitute currants)
chopped fresh cilantro

Combine 1/2 cup of the dried apricots with 3 cloves garlic, 1 tsp. cumin, salt, cinnamon and pepper in a food processor. Using on/off turns, chop to a coarse puree. Using a small knife, cut slits 1/2-inch deep all over the brisket. Set aside 1 tbsp. of the apricot mixture. Press the remaining apricot mixture into slits in brisket.

Position rack in bottom third of oven and preheat to 300. Heat the oil in a heavy, large, ovenproof pot over medium-high heat. Sprinkle brisket all over with salt and pepper. Add brisket to pot and sauté until brown, about 5 minutes per side. Transfer to a large plate, fat side up; spread with reserved 1 tbsp. apricot mixture.

Add chopped onions to the pot and sauté them over medium-high heat for 5 minutes. Add carrots, ginger, coriander, cayenne pepper, remaining six garlic cloves (crush them first), and remaining 2-1/2 tsp. cumin; sauté for 3 to 4 minutes. Add wine and boil until it has reduced and almost becomes a glaze, stirring up any browned bits, about five minutes.

Return brisket to pot. Add stock and bring to a simmer. Spoon some of vegetable mixture over brisket, cover pot and place it in the oven. Roast brisket for 2-1/2 hours, basting every 1/2 hour with pan juices. Add prunes and remaining cut-up dried apricots. Cover again and continue roasting until brisket is tender, about 30 minutes longer.

Remove from oven and cool brisket uncovered for 1 hour. Transfer to refrigerator and when cold, cover and refrigerate it overnight. Remove and discard the hardened fat from top of gravy. Scrape gravy off from brisket; spoon gravy back into pot.

Place brisket on a work surface and slice thinly across the grain. Add sliced brisket to pot with the gravy and bring to a boil over medium-high heat. If desired, boil until gravy is slightly thickened. Season the gravy with salt and pepper.

Arranged brisket slices in a large ovenproof baking dish and spoon gravy over. Cover baking dish with foil. (Can be made 2 days ahead and refrigerated.) To heat, place in a 350-degree oven for 30 to 40 minutes, until piping hot. Yield: 8 to 10 servings.

On Rosh Hashanah, it is customary to include dates as one of the symbolic foods. This delicious date cake recipe comes from Renee Rubinoff of Toronto and is a family favourite. It contains chocolate chips instead of nuts (many people follow the custom of not eating nuts on Rosh Hashanah). This recipe can be doubled easily for a crowd.

RENEE RUBINOFF'S CHOCOLATE CHIP DATE CAKE

1 cup chopped pitted dates
1 tsp. baking powder
1 1/2 cups boiling water
1/2 cup shortening (e.g., Crisco)
1 cup sugar
2 eggs
1 1/2 cups flour
1/2 tsp. salt
3/4 tsp. baking soda

Topping:
1/2 cup brown sugar, lightly packed
1/2 cup chocolate chips

Preheat oven to 350. Spray an 8 x 8-in. square baking pan with nonstick spray. Combine dates, baking powder and boiling water in a bowl. Set aside. In an electric stand mixer, blend shortening, sugar and eggs until light and fluffy. In another bowl, mix together flour, salt and baking soda.

Alternately add the flour mixture and date mixture to the mixer and mix on low speed just until blended. Spread batter evenly in prepared baking pan. Sprinkle brown sugar and chocolate chips over top. Bake at 350 for 45 to 50 minutes, until cake tests done. Yield: 9 servings. Recipe can be doubled and baked in a 9 x 13-in. pan about 55 to 60 minutes.

Try a rosé wine for light touch

By YONATAN STERNBERG
Special to The CJN

As the temperatures continue to rise, I often find myself trying to decide which wine to serve – a light red wine, or perhaps a chilled white wine.

Since both options sound good, I recently decided not to decide and I went for something in between – rosé-style wine (also known as blush wine).

There are several different ways or styles in which rosé wines are produced. In some cases, the winemaker may decide to add a dash of red wine to the white, a practice not as common as it used to be, while in others, the winemaker crushes the red grapes but only allows relatively short contact between the juice and the skin.

In the case of the saignée or bleeding production method, the rosé wine is, in fact, merely a byproduct of the red wine. After the red grapes are crushed, the winemaker removes some of the pinkish liquid, leaving a more concentrated red wine. This liquid is then treated separately and bottled as rosé wine.

While rosé-style wines can be produced from a large number of grape varieties, including the familiar – Merlot, Barbera, Zinfandel, Syrah, Grenache and others – these wines are usually less complex and much lighter than red wines that are produced from the same grape varieties.

Over the past few years, more and more Israeli wineries have also joined the global rosé trend and have begun producing rosé wines of their own. I recently had the opportunity to sample a few of them.

Recanati rosé 2009 – This is produced using Barbera (70 per cent) and Merlot (30 per cent) grapes, judging from the 2008 and 2009 releases. In my opinion, Recanati's rosé wines are among the best produced in Israel. Light and refreshing, the wine is showing pleasant aromas of strawberries, cherries and just a touch of citrus. Serve chilled; the winery suggests serving the wine alongside Asian-style dishes or potent cheeses.

Domaine du Castel, Rosé, 2009 – This year for the first time, the Castel Winery also released a very refreshing limited edition (3,000 bottles) rosé wine. Produced using 100 per cent Merlot grapes, showing pink with bright orange reflections in colour, this rosé suggests generous aromas of strawberries, tropical fruit and red grapefruit leading to a clean finish. Served chilled, this wine will go very well with grilled fish or fish-based tapas dishes.

Agur, "Rosa", 2009 – It's produced from Cabernet Franc (60 per cent) and Cabernet Sauvignon (40 per cent) grapes, both from vineyards situated in the Judean Hills. Pinkish with slight shades of rusty orange, a bit of alcohol on the nose, the Rosa offers pleasant, refreshing aromas and flavours of tart strawberries, apples, cranberries and citrus peel.

Food Ideas for the Holidays

Family that caters together stays together

By BEVERLY LEVITT
Special to The CJN

When Ziva Naumann's family gathers for her annual Rosh Hashanah dinner, each of her children and grandchildren expects to be called upon.

Not to roast the eggplant for a half-hour on each side for the babaganoush. Not to add the olive oil in a slow steady stream to the taramasalata (a dip or spread). Not even to sauté the onions until golden for some of the best chopped liver in the country. Although on most holidays cooking is a group effort for this family, this Rosh Hashanah feast is Naumann's gift to her family. Of course, she expects something special in return.

Before they go to the temple to welcome the Jewish New Year, each person will recount his activities of the past year – rejoice in what he did right, reflect upon what he did wrong, analyze, in the warmth of the family, how he might have done it differently. Then he'll take a moment to give thanks and set goals for the upcoming year. This might include asking for help from other members of the family.

"One year we found out that one of the grandchildren needed open heart surgery," Naumann says, the memory still painful. "Because we're together, we don't panic. Adversity brings you closer."

As Naumann pours the kosher wine and passes the Moroccan chicken, she scrutinizes her Rosh Hashanah table, smiling at the various configurations – who's there, who's in New York or Israel, who's having dinner with their in-laws. And she realizes how much she has to celebrate. But Naumann never celebrates. She revels. She kvells. In each accomplishment – large and small – of every member of her family.

And when it's her turn to talk, where does she begin? Selfless acts, circumstances changed, lives saved. For this is no ordinary woman. In many ways, her life is like her Middle Eastern meal—bitter and sweet, multi-textured, with a large dollop of love in every bite. Most importantly, Ziva Naumann is a role model for the New Year when we're all called upon to examine our lives.

It's a given that she's a meritorious matriarch and the attractive adhesive that binds her family together.

But what about founding – with her own money – the Levitt & Quinn Family Law Center for the working poor in Los Angeles (with lawyers Ethel Levitt and Grace Quinn), and helping thousands of needy people who had nowhere else to go? What about driving from her comfortable Los Feliz neighbourhood to one of the scariest parts of Los Angeles, placing her life in jeopardy every day, to enlighten people about their legal rights when they thought they had none?

And when the non-profit law firm needed money to keep going, for at the beginning, it was always in danger of going under, Naumann organized fundraisers – rummage sales, barbecues, buffet dinners – catering them herself, to help pay the rent. She also used her cooking skills to cater fancy Hollywood parties, weddings and bar mitzvahs to supplement her own income. Although she often worked 12-hour days to keep the law centre going, her salary was, in her own words, "a modest honorarium." (Today, thanks largely to Naumann, the firm is a thriving, self supporting entity.)

When Naumann had leftover food, it went straight to the homeless – at the end of the party, she'd pack it up with some disposable plates and send her teenage kids downtown to distribute it.

As for Naumann's catering, "it started as a complete fluke," she recalls fondly. Her friends Shelly and Avery Schreiber were having a party to celebrate the completion of a film, and needed a caterer. "Most caterers were exorbitant, and in a moment of brilliance – or desperation – I said I'd do it," Naumann recalls.

Rosh Hashanah feast a gift to the others

"There were supposed to be 250 guests, but 400 people showed up. I put my five children to work – teenagers always need money – including my adopted daughter, Denise, who's an artist and created the most ingenious presentations. From that time on, my phone was ringing off the hook. I always loved cooking, especially Middle Eastern food," says the Israeli-born Naumann, her accent very much a part of her charm.

"On Rosh Hashanah, there's a superstition that whatever you're doing at the beginning of the New Year will forecast what you'll be doing all year long. So naturally, I want this to be my best meal of the year. Everything needs to be sweet – apples dipped in honey, Moroccan chicken with prunes, honey cake. During the High Holidays, our challah is round, which gives everyone the same shot at having a good year. That way, everyone can be at the "head" – not at the "tail" of the bread.

MOROCCAN CHICKEN WITH PRUNES AND HONEY

According to Naumann, this recipe actually tastes better if it's cooked, allowed to sit in the refrigerator overnight, and served the next day. "Its flavour is improved by standing," she says. Dried apricots, peaches or sultana raisins may be substituted for the prunes.

2 kosher chickens, weighing about 3 to 3-1/2 pounds each
2 large onions, grated
7 oz. margarine
salt to taste
1 heaping tsp. black pepper
1 tsp. saffron
1 cinnamon stick
1 lb. pitted prunes
4 tbsp. thick honey
1 heaping tsp. cinnamon
7 oz. blanched almonds, roasted until light golden brown

Place chicken, onions, margarine, salt, pepper, saffron and cinnamon stick in large, heavy pot. Add 2 cups water. Cook over moderate heat on top of stove until chicken is tender and flesh flakes off bones easily, about 1 hour. Remove chicken to platter. To same pot in which chicken cooked, add prunes; simmer 15 minutes. Add honey and cinnamon. Boil sauce down until it's syrupy and thick. Pour sauce over chicken. Just before serving, decorate with almonds. Serves 8 to 10.

ZIVA NAUMANN'S HEALTHIER, LOWER FAT CHOPPED LIVER

Although holidays are a time for feasting and not worrying about cholesterol, I was happy to learn that Naumann's recipe has just a tad of oil and no chicken fat so it does "minimum damage." The best part is it's the most delicious chopped liver I've ever tasted. Make sure the chicken liver is fresh, not frozen.

2 large onions, chopped
olive oil for sautéing
2 lb. fresh chicken livers
2 hard-boiled eggs, peeled
salt and pepper to taste
2 tbsp. good quality cognac

Sauté onions in minimum amount of olive oil until golden. Broil or grill chicken livers until deep brown, being careful not to dry them out. Grind onions, chicken livers and egg in meat grinder. Add salt, pepper and cognac; mix well. Refrigerate until it's time to serve. Serves 8 to 10.

WALNUT-LEMON COUSCOUS

vegetable oil for sautéing
1 1/2 to 2 cups chopped walnuts
4 garlic cloves, peeled and pressed
1 1/2 cups boiling chicken broth (homemade, if available) juice of 1 large lemon
1 cup sliced green onions
1/2 cup pitted, sliced black olives
1 1/2 cups instant couscous
1 tsp. lemon zest
salt and pepper to taste
1 lemon, sliced into wedges for garnish

In large skillet over medium flame, heat oil. Add walnuts and garlic; cook for 2 minutes. Add broth, lemon juice, green onions, and olives; bring to boil. Stir in couscous and lemon zest, remove from heat. Cover and allow to sit for 5 minutes. Toss with fork; season with salt and pepper. Garnish with lemon slices. Serves 8 to 10.

BABAGANOUSH

Naumann's good friend and fellow Israeli, Adda Smilove, gave her the idea of wrapping the eggplant in foil before roasting it. This eliminates the huge mess associated with this easy, delicious recipe.

1 medium to large eggplant, 14-16 oz.
1/4 cup tahini
1/4 cup lemon juice
3 cloves garlic, crushed
2 tsp. salt or to taste
1 tsp. white pepper
2 tbsp. olive oil
parsley sprigs for garnish

Food Ideas for the Holidays

Enjoy a low fat holiday treat

Wash eggplant; wrap in several layers of heavy foil. Grill on medium flame or broil in oven 30 minutes on each side. Remove, and when cooled, peel off eggplant skin. Place eggplant flesh in colander and drain for two hours to get rid of bitter flavour. Place eggplant in bowl and mash with a fork. Combine eggplant with tahini, lemon juice, garlic, salt, pepper and olive oil in blender or food processor; puree until smooth. Adjust seasonings. Store in refrigerator until ready to serve. Serve at room temperature in shallow dish garnished with parsley, warm pita wedges and assorted raw vegetables.

LOW FAT APPLE-HONEY CAKE

From Naumann's daughter-in-law, pastry chef, Susan Shulman. For those of you who don't like honey cake, forget all the dry, hackneyed honey cakes of the past and prepare yourself for a real treat.

2 1/2 cups all purpose white flour
1 tsp. baking soda
1 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. salt
1 tsp. nutmeg
1 tbsp. cinnamon
1 cup brown sugar
1 cup honey
2 large eggs plus 3 egg whites
1 tsp. vanilla extract
1 tbsp. apple brandy
1/3 cup vegetable oil
1 tsp. lemon zest
1 cup applesauce
2 large Granny Smith apples, peeled and grated
1 cup chopped walnuts
1/2 cup golden raisins
powdered sugar for dusting

Sift together flour, baking soda, baking powder, salt, nutmeg and cinnamon and reserve for later. On medium speed, beat sugar and eggs together until fluffy. Add honey, beat well. Add vanilla and brandy; drizzle in oil, beating well to thoroughly blend ingredients. Add zest, applesauce and grated apples, beating on slow speed to incorporate.

On slow speed, add dry ingredients, beating until batter comes together. Do not overmix. Fold in walnuts and raisins. Turn batter into large, greased and floured rectangular baking pan or bundt pan; bake at 350 for 40 minutes or until toothpick comes out clean. Cool before removing from pan. Dust with powdered sugar before serving. It may be served warm or at room temperature. Serves 12.

You don't have to eat meat!

By DOROTHY LIPOVENKO
Special to the CJN

When a medium-sized kosher brisket cracked $100, sticker shock gave way to this realization: the meat cost more (at that time) than 10 shares of a certain iconic company.

The brisket stayed in the butcher's fridge. And it was back to the drawing board for a holiday fish-vegetarian menu.

This year's tripleheaders of Rosh Hashanah and Sukkot yamim tovim followed by Shabbat can challenge both cooks and eaters alike. Who can pack away so many consecutive meals, especially late in the evening?

But this is terrific incentive to aim for lighter eating and to use the new year's fresh slate to trim fat in the kitchen.

This yom tov, if you want hot but lighter fare for at least one meal, aim for a protein-packed soup, with challah and a green salad. Or scoop out an appetizer on your dinner plate accompanied by mixed salads, like roast pepper, coleslaw or spiced carrot.

One of my favourite dishes that does double duty for the holidays is a flavourful tortilla and bean dish, which manages to stay hot in the sukkah! The recipe is adapted from Mollie Katzen's Chilaquile Casserole in her Still Life With Menu cookbook (Ten Speed Press) – even now, some 20 years after first tasting this dish, I'm continually giving it a new twist with different ingredients.

The other recipe is an easy vegetarian pâté that's a first cousin to chopped liver. If you don't have a hand blender, buy one. It makes fast work of pureeing soups and bean pâtés like this one.

NO-LIVER PÂTÉ

Chop two good-sized onions, sprinkle lightly with paprika and sauté on low heat for 10 minutes in a few tablespoons of water to prevent sticking. Add a little more liquid if necessary.

Vegetarian meal can be low fat and delicious

Stir in eight pieces of oil-packed sun-dried tomatoes (I am partial to the jarred Cedar Phoenicia brand). Drain a 19-oz. can of lentils, rinse lentils under cool water and add to the onion-tomato mixture with a pinch of thyme and a handful of chopped Italian parsley. Cover and cook on low heat for 10-15 minutes, stirring occasionally.

When mixture has cooled, puree with a hand blender or in a food chopper. Sprinkle with black pepper (I use quite a bit), stir and chill. Wonderful on challah or pita, with sliced tomato and cucumber. For extra protein, grate in a couple of hard-cooked egg whites. (This dish gets its salt from the sun-dried tomatoes.)

MY TORTILLA BEAN PIE

Crush a package of plain tortilla chips (not too fine) to yield 1-1/4 cups. Spritz an 8- or 9-in. pie plate with non-stick spray and cover bottom with a thin layer of crushed chips. (There should be some left over.)

In a good-sized skillet, sauté two medium chopped onions with a half of a small chopped green pepper and half of a 14-oz. tin of diced tomatoes with mild green chilies. (If the latter is unavailable, add 1/2 tsp. of diced jalapenos from a jar to a can of diced tomatoes). Crumble in 1/2 tsp. of Italian seasoning and cook mixture 10-15 minutes on low heat, stirring often until most of the liquid evaporates. Scrape out into a bowl to cool.

Drain a 19-oz. can of black (turtle) beans, reserving some liquid. Using the same frying pan, place drained beans, four large pieces of oil-packed sun-dried tomatoes, a teaspoon of ground cumin, half a teaspoon garlic powder and a liberal dash of chili powder. Stir and cook 10 minutes, adding some reserved bean liquid if mixture starts to stick. Empty mixture into a stainless steel bowl, blender or food processor and when cool, puree it.

Beat well three egg whites and two yolks with 1/2 cup of low-fat sour cream and 2/3 cup low-fat milk.

Grate a hunk of low-fat mozzarella cheese to yield 1/2 cup.

Layer as follows: on top of the crushed tortilla chip layer, drop spoonfuls of the onion-green pepper mixture. Scatter the grated cheese on top, dusting with a tbsp. of crushed chips.

Drop spoonfuls of the bean puree on top. Sprinkle on another tablespoon of crushed chips.

Slowly pour egg mixture on the whole thing, making sure it seeps into the sides. Dust with any leftover crushed chips, and bake at 350 for 45 minutes. Cut into wedges and serve immediately.

If it's made earlier in the day, cover with foil and warm it up gently. Leftovers don't taste as good but I doubt there will be any.

Writer offers traditional fare with a twist

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

On a summer afternoon, some 30 women have braved the heat and the massive construction project on Bloor Street to meet one of the country's best-known food personalities.

Lucy Waverman, longtime food columnist for the Globe and Mail, is doing a food demonstration at Williams-Sonoma. On this day she is serving up Mango Chicken Salad, and S'mores Squares, a popular marshmallow and chocolate treat.

For the people on hand, this intimate gathering with Waverman is an opportunity to get culinary advice and purchase a copy of her latest cookbook, A Year in Lucy's Kitchen, Seasonal Recipes and Memorable Meals (Random House Canada, 2009).

Using seasonal produce and fresh herbs from her garden is her "preferred way of cooking," Waverman says. "I cook this way for my husband and myself." However, she stresses that she does eat certain vegetables like broccoli and green beans all year round.

As for her favourite meal, the mother of three and grandmother of seven says standing rib roast is the family favourite. For dessert, she is particularly partial to lattice-topped cherry pie, which she says is an ideal summer recipe.

Waverman immigrated to Toronto from Scotland when she was 16. She studied journalism and later got a teaching certificate. She says her interest in cooking is rooted in her family background. "Food was very important."

Her mother ran a cooking school in Toronto and her grandmother was also a very skilled cook, she says.

Waverman had the opportunity to study haute cuisine in London at the Cordon Bleu Cooking School. When she returned to Toronto, she gave cooking classes and her food career grew from there. She has been food editor for Food and Drink, the LCBO magazine, for 18 years and a columnist for the Globe and Mail for 12. A Year in Lucy's Kitchen is Waverman's eighth book.

POLENTA APRICOT HONEY CAKE

This recipe, which is in the August section of A Year in Lucy's Kitchen, offers a new twist on the traditional honey cake served at Rosh Hashanah.

Sugar syrup
1/2 cup honey
1 cup water
1/2 cup granulated sugar
2 star anise (optional)
8 small or (6 large) fresh apricots, unpeeled, halved and pitted (dried apricots can be substituted)

Combine water, sugar, honey and star anise in a small pot and bring to a boil over medium heat. Add apricots. Simmer gently for 15 to 20 minutes. Remove from heat and let apricots cool in poaching liquid. Remove fruit from pot, reserving poaching liquid. Chop apricots and pat dry with paper towel.

Cake
1 1/4 cups cornmeal
1/4 cup all purpose flour
1 tsp. grated lemon rind
1 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 cup butter at room temperature (margarine can be substituted)
1/3 cup granulated sugar
1/4 cup honey
1/2 tsp. vanilla
2 whole eggs plus 1 egg yolk
3 tbsp. olive oil

Preheat oven to 325. Butter and flour a loaf pan and line base with parchment paper. Combine cornmeal, flour, lemon rind, baking powder and salt in a bowl and set aside. In another bowl, combine butter, sugar and honey and beat with an electric mixer until light and fluffy. Blend in vanilla. Add eggs and yoke, one at a time, beating well after each addition. Add reserved flour mixture and stir until combined. Stir in olive oil and fold in apricots.

Pour batter into prepared loaf pan and bake 55 to 60 minutes or until a toothpick comes out clean. Cool on a wire rack for 10 minutes and remove from pan.

While the cake is cooling, simmer 1/2 cup poaching liquid over medium heat for 5 minutes or until thick and syrupy. Reserve any remaining liquid for another use. Prick holes in warm cake and brush liberally with syrup.

MANGO CHICKEN SALAD

Dressing
1/2 tsp. grated lime rind
2 tbsp. lime juice
2 tbsp. rice vinegar
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 tbsp. hoisin sauce
1 tbsp. soy sauce
1 tsp. sesame oil
salt

*Hoisin Sauce
1/2 cup plum jam
2 tbsp. rice vinegar
1 tbsp. sesame oil

Combine all ingredients. Refrigerate remaining sauce.

Salad
1 small barbecued chicken, skin and bones removed or the equivalent left-over chicken
1 mango, peeled and slivered
1 cup snow peas, slivered
2 cups bean sprouts
1/2 cup slivered green onions
3 cups baby spinach

Whisk together lime rind and juice, vinegar, vegetable oil, hoisin sauce, soy sauce and sesame oil in a bowl. Season with salt. Shred chicken and place in a separate bowl. Add mango, snow peas, bean sprouts and onions. Mix these ingredients together and toss with 1/2 of the salad dressing.

Place spinach on a platter and toss with remaining dressing. Top with mango and chicken mixture.

Food Ideas for the Holidays

Like mother used to make

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

As a former Montrealer living in Toronto, I have always been a little envious of the people who have grown up in this city. Torontonians get to go to their parents' homes regularly. They can see their mothers on Shabbat and eat their chicken soup or fricassee or whatever the specialty is.

I only get to eat those kinds of special dishes when my mother visits Toronto. She's a wonderful cook, but I took that for granted when I was growing up. After all, I got to eat her cooking every day.

Now I savour all the meals she prepares, especially her chicken soup and kneidlach. We only eat this soup on the High Holidays and on Passover, when my mother comes.

Naomi Azrieli is also a former Montrealer now living in Toronto. She too does not get to eat her mother Stephanie Azrieli's cooking very often. A family favourite is her mother's gefilte fish loaf, Azrieli says. "This recipe from Grandma Stephanie's kitchen in Montreal is the most delicious gefilte fish you will ever taste."

Michelle Coleman is another former Montrealer who often treks back to Montreal with her husband and three children at holiday time. She raves about her mother-in-law, Chana Shapiro's, cooking. "She's an amazing baker and cook." One of Shapiro's signature desserts is lemon squares, Coleman says.

STEPHANIE AZRIELI'S GEFILTE FISH LOAF

1 1/2 lb. minced fish
2 tsp. salt
2 tsp. pepper
4 tsp. sugar
1 cup cold water
2 eggs
3 tbsp. matzah meal
2 large carrots, grated
1 large Spanish onion, chopped and sautéed in olive oil.

Mix all the ingredients well in a bowl. Transfer to an oiled loaf pan. Bake 1 hour and 15 minutes at 350. Yield 10 servings.

POLA KIRSHNER'S CHICKEN SOUP

1 3-lb. chicken, cut in quarters boiling water to cover chicken
4 onions, peeled and lightly salted
2 celery stocks, trimmed
3 parsnips
6 carrots
1/2 bunch fresh dill
7-8 cups tap water
4 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. pepper
additional salt and pepper to taste

Clean chicken well. Pour boiling water over chicken. Let sit 5 minutes and discard water. Place chicken in a large, heavy saucepan. Cover it with tap water. Water level should be about 2 inches above chicken. Bring water to a boil. Skim off scum. Turn down heat and add onions, celery and parsnip.

Bring water to a boil again and then simmer for 1 hour. Cover pot loosely with lid to limit evaporation. Add carrots, dill, salt and pepper. Simmer another 1/2 hour. Test chicken to prevent overcooking. Season with salt and pepper to taste.

To serve, discard celery, onion and dill. Remove chicken and remaining vegetables. Soup can be made a day before serving. When refrigerating, cover chicken and vegetables well. Yield 8 servings.

Food Ideas for the Holidays

Recipes that tell the story of Jewish history

By LINDA MOREL
JTA

Teiglach came along with Tina Wasserman when she moved to Dallas in the 1980s.

Wasserman, a cooking teacher and the food columnist for Reform Judaism magazine, didn't literally transport clumps of the sticky pastries whose dough is wrapped around nuts and simmered in honey syrup. But among her most cherished possessions, she packed her recipe for the traditional Rosh Hashanah sweet hailing from Lithuania.

"No one had seen it down here," said Wasserman, the author of Entree to Judaism: A Culinary Exploration of the Jewish Diaspora (URJ Press, 2010), until she served the dessert to her new friends.

She then introduced the recipe in cooking classes. Before long, teiglach became part of the Jewish culinary scene in Dallas.

The incident is typical of how Jewish foods have travelled around the world, said Wasserman, whose goal in writing her cookbook was to educate about Jewish culture while providing sensational recipes that tell the story of Jewish history.

As Jews migrated from country to country, they carried their recipes and kiddush cups. Like Johnny Appleseed, they spread their favourite foods. But they also adapted to the cuisines they encountered wherever they went.

"I wanted to create a link to our ancestry through food," said Wasserman, who feels that such a connection will keep Judaism alive. "Food is the most direct connection in our brain to memory."

She began assembling recipes for Entree to Judaism with a question: What makes a food Jewish from a historical viewpoint? Her conclusion: Kosher laws and Sabbath observance were the reasons for the invention and evolution of Jewish recipes.

For instance, Wasserman said that caponata, the popular Italian appetizer of simmered eggplants, tomatoes and peppers, is a 500-year-old Sabbath dish. During the Spanish Inquisition when Spain occupied Sicily, 40,000 Jews fled to mainland Italy to escape persecution, bringing with them this make-ahead recipe that can be served cold or at room temperature.

"I tried to put the foods we love into a context," Wasserman said, explaining that she wanted to breathe life into Jewish culinary history.

Each recipe in her cookbook includes the story of its origins, when and why it was eaten, and who cherished it enough to bring the preparation method to a new part of the world.

Ever wondered why some Ashkenazim eat kreplach at Rosh Hashanah? During the Middle Ages, Jews from central and eastern Europe sealed their dishes in pouches of dough and wore them as amulets. Because they didn't want to waste this precious food, they put it into soup.

"Most of our food customs come from the Middle Ages," Wasserman said. Jews needed stories to give them hope during the Crusades, when anti-Semitism flourished.

While Ashkenazim dip apples in honey to connote sweetness in the New Year, Turkish Jews convey the same wishes by partaking in Dulce de Manzana, sweet apple preserves infused with rose water, the signature flavour of many Sephardi pastries.

Dulce de Manzana is the first of 20 dairy foods Wasserman serves at the bagels and lox buffet she and her husband host at their home each Rosh Hashanah following the Tashlich ceremony when Jews, often in large groups, cast away their sins from the previous year by throwing small pieces of bread into a natural body of flowing water such as a river, lake or ocean.

For the past five years, the Wassermans have invited to the meal about 110 guests, including the five rabbis from their Dallas synagogue, Temple Emanuel, the fourth largest Reform congregation in America.

International Jewish foods featured in Entree to Judaism are found on their buffet table. Wasserman not only prepares each dish herself, but posts a small sign explaining its origin. Many of the deliciously exotic recipes hail from Sephardi countries.

One of Wasserman's favourite recipes is Syrian Eggplant with Pomegranate Molasses, which is similar in consistency to babaganoush. Pomegranates are traditionally eaten at Rosh Hashanah because their seeds symbolize prosperity in the New Year. The recipe is great as an appetizer, hors d'oeuvres, first course salad or part of a meze assortment, an array of appetizers typical of Sephardi cuisine.

"I'm all about connecting to the Jewish community at large," said Wasserman, whose website, www.cookingandmore.com, creates a community around food. "We're a shrinking population who used to live everywhere in the world."

The following recipes are by Tina Wasserman from Entree to Judaism.

DULCE DE MANZANA
(Apple Preserves)

This Rosh Hashanah, try dipping challah into this sweet treat that Turkish Sephardi Jews eat to wish each other a sweet New Year.

3 cups granulated sugar
1 1/2 cups water
2 lb. apples, Jonagold, Gala or Delicious
juice of 1/2 lemon
1 tbsp. rose water or 1 tsp. vanilla
1/4 cup slivered almonds

Place the sugar and water in a 3-quart saucepan and bring to a boil over medium heat.

While the mixture is heating, peel the apples and grate them by hand with a coarse grater. Immediately add the apples to the hot sugar syrup.

Reduce the temperature to medium and cook for 30-45 minutes, or until most of the liquid has evaporated and the mixture is quite thick. Stir the mixture occasionally to prevent sticking.

While the mixture is cooking, toast the almonds in a 350-degree oven for 4 minutes, or until lightly golden. Set aside.

When the mixture is thickened (it will get thicker when it cools), add the rose water or vanilla. Place in an open container until cool. The toasted almonds may be added to the mixture at this time or sprinkled on top as a garnish just before serving. Refrigerate until serving. Yield: 3-4 cups.

SYRIAN EGGPLANT WITH POMEGRANATE MOLASSES

Finding out that the great Jewish cooks of Aleppo, Syria, used this molasses with eggplant dish intrigued Wasserman and led her to explore this stunningly delicious combination often served with pita bread.

1 medium eggplant
2 tbsp. pomegranate molasses (available at Middle Eastern stores
2 large garlic cloves, finely minced or pressed through a garlic press
1/4 tsp. dried crushed red pepper flakes
3 or 4 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil kosher salt to taste
pomegranate seeds for garnish (optional)

Roast the eggplant over a grill until all sides are charred and the eggplant is soft and deflated.

Remove to a colander, slit open on 1 side from stem to bottom. Let the juices run out for 10 minutes, or until it is cool enough to handle. Remove the skin and stem and discard them.

Place the eggplant pulp in a clean bowl, cut in all directions with a knife and fork, and continue to mix with the fork, until no long strings of eggplant remain. Add the pomegranate molasses, minced garlic and red pepper flakes and combine thoroughly.

Slowly add the oil as you whip the eggplant mixture with a fork until a smooth emulsion or spread is formed. Season with salt to taste. Spread the mixture on a 9-inch plate and make a slight well in the centre. Drizzle with a little more olive oil, and sprinkle with some pomegranate seeds. Serve with pita points or crackers. Yield: 4 servings.

LUBIYA
(Sephardi Black-Eyed Peas)

This Ethiopian recipe is a consistent winner at Wasserman's Rosh Hashanah buffet. She prepares triple the amount but still finds there are no leftovers.

3 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil
1 medium onion, diced into 1/4-in. pieces
2 large cloves of garlic, minced
1 1/2 cups of water
3 tbsp. tomato paste
1 lb. fresh or frozen black-eyed peas
1/2 tsp. cumin
salt and freshly ground pepper to taste

Heat a 3-quart pot over high heat for 20 seconds. Add the olive oil and heat for another 10 seconds. Add the onion and garlic and sauté over medium heat, until onions are lightly golden.

Add the water and tomato paste and bring to a boil. Reduce the heat to low. Add the peas and cumin and cook covered for 1 to 2 hours, or until the peas are tender. It might be necessary to add a small amount of additional water to the pot if the mixture looks too dry. Conversely, if the mixture is too soupy, continue to cook uncovered, until some of the liquid has evaporated.

Remove from the heat and add salt and pepper to taste. Serve hot or at room temperature. Serve alone or over rice. Yield: 8 servings.

Families compile anniversary cookbook

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

I had the privilege of being part of a cookbook fundraiser that paid dividends in community building. The book, published in late spring to mark the 30th anniversary of the Downtown Jewish Community School (DJCS), was named for this important milestone.

The DJCS 30th Anniversary Cookbook was very much a team effort. Families sent in recipes and many included personal stories. Even grandparents participated. But the most important contribution came from the students. They illustrated the entire book and it was thrilling for them to see their work in a professionally published format.

Founding principal, Joan Schoenfeld, called the cookbook "our most successful project ever."

The project was an idea that was bandied about the DJCS board until school parent, Leah Gryfe, a graphic designer with extensive experience in book publishing, volunteered to take it on. She integrated the recipes and stories with the art, and created this beautiful book. She was able to make the most primitive line drawings look special.

You could say the stars (or planets) were aligned on this project, because Gryfe's mother, Arlene, a home economist and professional cookbook proofreader, made sure the recipes conformed to publishing standards.

We were also fortunate to get support from other cooking pros. A number of Jewish food mavens contributed recipes. They included Dufflet Rosenberg, Daphna Rabinovitch and several key authors from Whitecap Books – Norene Gilletz, Rose Reisman, Marcy Goldman, and Susan and Lynn Mendelson.

The cookbook was launched at a family bash that included a parade down Bloor Street, clowns, face painting, music and plenty of food to nosh on. But a very sad footnote to the book launch was the recent death of actor Maury Chaykin, a longtime member of the DJSC school community. He had attended the party with his wife, Susanne Hoffman, and daughter, Rose, a Grade 5 student at the time.

Anyone interested in purchasing the DJCS 30th Anniversary Cookbook can contact Joan Schoenfeld at 416-924-6211 # 112 or at joan@djcs.org.

The following recipes are a small sample of the variety of recipes and stories submitted by the DJCS families and staff.

RICE AND PEPPERS

Annie Papernick
Mother of Hannah (Grade 6) and Jeremy Yudin, Grade 5

Hannah's mother, Leah Papernick, discovered this rice and pepper recipe in a newspaper years ago. Ever since, the dish has been a hit at family gatherings and other social get-togethers. It's the perfect addition to a meat or chicken meal. The recipe can be doubled for a large group.

1/4 cup cooking oil
1 cup regular long grain rice
2 large green peppers, seeded, cut into 1-in. squares
1 medium onion, chopped
19 oz. can tomato juice
1/2 cup ketchup
1 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. pepper

Heat oven to 350. Grease a 1 1/2 quart casserole. Heat oil in medium large saucepan. Add rice, cook over moderate heat, stirring, until rice is golden. Add green pepper and onion. Cook gently for 1 minute. Stir in tomato juice, ketchup, salt and pepper. Continue heating until mixture boils.

Pour rice mixture into prepared casserole. Cover and bake 45 minutes, or until liquid is absorbed and rice is tender. If casserole has no top, cover tightly with silver foil. Yield 6 servings.

DELICIOUS LENTIL SOUP

Lori Albert
Mother of Elan, Grade 5 and Hannah Yaphe, class of 2007

This delicious vegetarian soup is a favourite comfort food, especially in the winter.

5 1/2 cups water
1 cup split pink lentils, washed and picked
1/3 cup flour
juice of 1/2 lemon (can add more to taste)
2 tsp. salt
1 clove garlic, crushed
1 tsp. ground coriander
cumin and cayenne pepper to taste

Put lentils in a large soup pot and add 3 cups of water. Bring to a boil. Lower heat and simmer 10 minutes. Mix flour with a little of remaining water to make a smooth paste. Gradually add the rest of this water to the paste, stirring constantly. Add paste to lentils. Add lemon juice and salt. Continue stirring over high heat until mixture comes to a boil (it will stick to the bottom and burn if you don't stir.) Lower heat, cover and cook for 20 minutes, stirring occasionally.

Break the fast Israeli style

By RANDY FINGRUT
Special to The CJN

Our visit to Israel was exciting beyond belief. Learning more about Israeli history, and seeing where so much of it actually took place was absolutely inspiring. However equally important was the reconnection we made with our Israeli family. All our cousins could not have made us feel more welcome. Through their eyes my husband and I learned what daily life in Israel is really like.

A water tank on the roof of their building is heated by the sun, so that no other energy is required to heat the water. The hot water is used for bathing, doing dishes and laundry. Electricity in Israel is much less expensive at 3 a.m. I observed that cousin Netti, the matriarch of my Israeli family, woke up in the very early hours of the morning and went into the kitchen to start preparing meals for the day.

During the afternoons, while my husband and I toured under a scorching sun, often our cousins would rest, relying on the thick stone walls of their building to keep out the heat. Netti insisted that we eat all our weekday evening and Shabbat meals with them. Even though our cousins eat their big meal at lunchtime, Netti served us dinner every evening. We ate North American style, while the rest of the family ate a light snack. Netti is a wonderful cook and we really enjoyed sharing meals at her table. She was delighted to trade recipes with me, and I would like to share her wonderful recipes with you. These recipes are even better prepared a day ahead, perfect for a break the fast menu.

ISRAELI SALAD

This salad is dressed with a simple dressing including za'atar, a dried herb blend mixed together with sesame seeds and salt. Za'atar is easily found in Middle-Eastern grocery stores.

Salad Dressing
3 large tomatoes
3 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
1 large English cucumber
3 tbsp. lemon juice (1 large lemon)
2 large carrots
2 cloves garlic, finely chopped
2 tbsp. onion, finely chopped
3/4 tsp. salt
1 green pepper
1/2 tsp. pepper
1 red pepper
1 tbsp. za'atar
3 tbsp. parsley, chopped
1 can of chickpeas, drained and rinsed
1 tbsp. za'atar

Chop up all the vegetables into small cubes, add the chickpeas. Combine the remaining ingredients for the dressing in a separate bowl mix well. If making salad the day ahead, cover salad tightly and store dressing in a tightly sealed container. Refrigerate both overnight. Just before serving, sprinkle salad with za'atar and mix, then drizzle the dressing over the salad and toss. Sprinkle with more za'atar if desired.

ZUCCHINI EGG SALAD

Delicious with pita or served scooped over a bed of lettuce.

2 lb. zucchini grated (approximately 6 medium)
1 tbsp. vegetable oil
8 hardboiled eggs, cooled, shells removed
2 heaping tbsp. mayonnaise
1 tin cucumbers in brine (product of Israel) drained, rinsed and finely chopped
salt and pepper to taste

In a large non-stick frying pan on a medium heat, cook grated zucchini in oil for 4-5 minutes, stirring occasionally. Zucchini should not turn brown. Cover and lower heat, simmering until all the juices have been absorbed, about 20 minutes. Cool. Place zucchini in a strainer and press out any remaining juice. In a large bowl, mash hardboiled eggs, toss with cooked zucchini and combine all remaining ingredients. Cover and refrigerate overnight.

SWEET AND SOUR EGGPLANT

2 large eggplants
2 cups tomato juice
1 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. garlic powder
4 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
2 cups ketchup
4 eggs, beaten
1/4 tsp. pepper
1/2 tsp. paprika

Peel and slice eggplant 1/2 in. thick. Salt eggplant slices and set aside for one hour. Preheat frying pan and add 2 tablespoons of the olive oil. Divide eggplant into two batches. Starting with the first batch, dip both sides of each eggplant slice into egg. Quickly fry eggplant until golden on both sides. Drain on paper towel. Add the remaining olive oil into the pan and repeat with the second batch. Mix remaining ingredients in a large pot and bring to a boil. Add eggplant slices and cook in sauce for 20 minutes. Keep refrigerated. Delicious served cold, or reheat if desired.

Mideast coexistence the only way: Rae

By RON CSILLAG
Special to The CJN

Peaceful coexistence between Israelis and Palestinians is the only real option in the Middle East, Liberal MP Bob Rae told a small gathering last week.

The informal event at the Windsor Arms Hotel served as the campaign launch for a tribute dinner slated for Nov. 7, at which Rae will receive an honorary doctorate from the University of Haifa.

Bob Rae
[R. Csillag photo]

Proceeds from the dinner will go toward establishing the Bob Rae MBA Scholarships for Jewish and Arab Students, part of the university's Partners for Peace Scholarship Fund.

Rae's namesake scholarships will be offered at the university's graduate school of management, with the aim of attracting an equal number of Arab and Jewish students.

Joining Ontario's former NDP premier at the kick-off were fellow Liberal MPs Irwin Cotler, Joe Volpe and Carolyn Bennett; Thornhill federal Liberal candidate Karen Mock, and former Conservative cabinet minister Gerry Weiner.

Greetings were brought by university president Aaron Ben-Ze'ev, who spoke of the institution's reputation for promoting diversity and tolerance in Israel.

Several Arab-Canadian supporters of the University of Haifa also attended.

Rae said he visited a legal clinic dedicated to minority rights several years ago at the university.

"Coexistence in the Middle East is the only way to go," Rae stated. "Many people will think of other solutions, but all the other solutions are completely unworkable. The only ultimate reality is going to be one in which we recognize the rights of Palestinians as well as the rights of Israelis."

Michael Dan, president of the Canadian Friends of Haifa University, noted that 20 per cent of the school's 18,000 students are Arab, a ratio that mirrors Israel's overall demographic.

תשובה לידורם פירוצקי-בדעת השלום

ידורם פירוצקי תיאר את נסיונותיהם של יוזמים ישראלים להציל תינוק פלשתיני. כל הכבוד על הכתבה ועל היוזמה הישראלית. היה בכתבה רק קטע אחד מדגיז, שאני מקווה שנשוב מבדיוק של הכותב. פירוצקי כותב שישראל ביישה מהרשות הפלשתינאית להשתתף בחיצאות העקיות, והפלשתינים סירבו. פירוצקי לוצג להם על סדר העדיפויות שלהם, ועל כך שאין הם נעצים לסיבלו של ילד קטן אחד. הטיפול בחוסר אימוני שלה מלוני דולר לילד אחד. ישראל, כאיך משותתת, יכולה לעמיד בזה, אבל הרשות הפלשתינאית, שאין לה תקציב לצרכים בסיסיים כמו אמבולנסים וחיסונים-אי אפשר לצפות שתשקיע את המעט שיש לה ברווחתו של ילד אחד, על חשבונם של רבים אחרים. לנו כיהודים שבעים ומשפנקים, ללעוג לבן דוד העני על הקדימויות שלו, דומה למה שמרי אבנוואנס אמרה "אם אין לחם-שיאכלו עוגות". ודרך אגב- לפי המקורות שלי, לא משלם המיסים הישראלי משלם על הטיפול ב"תינוק הבודמה", אלא מרכז השלום ע"ש שמעון פרס מהתרומות שלו.
מושיק שלו, טורונטו

בדעת השלום-2

ד"ר אייל גרוזבאום מביא הזמלים לילדים של טורונטו הוסיף פרטים מאלימים לפרשת ההצלה של תינוק הבדמה: הרופא הישראלי, ד"ר רן פימוך, התמחה בשנים האחרונות באימונולוגיה בטורונטו. פרט שמטשס על הסיפור המדהים הזה הוקרן לאחרונה בפסטיבל ירושלים, וישתתף בפסטמבר בפסטיבל הסרטים של טורונטו!

שדות תותים לבצה

פול מקרטני שר את פסקול החיים של רבים מאתנו, או לפחות של ארבעים השנה האחרונות. כל הקהל בוכה באלימד ריגבי, וכולנו תוהים לגן תוכה ומקפצים באובלאדי אובלאדה עם היוך גדול של אושר. כשהוא רוצה להזכיר את ג'ורג' האריסון הוא מנגן את שירו הנפלא של ג'ורג' Something in the Way על יוקללי, הגיטרה הסקוטי המפורסם- עולה לבמה להקת מנגני חמת חלילים בשמלות סקוטיות.

סר פול שר את השירים שלו כמו שאנחנו מכירים אותם. להרבה זמרים, אחרי שנים רבות, נמאס מהעיבוד המקורי של שיריהם והם משנים אותם. לא מקרטני- הוא פורס על הפסנתר את האקורדים המוכרים של Let It Be והקהל נעמד כולו ושרוקח את הסולואריים- שהם המחליפים הנכשריים של המצחים והגיות של ילדי השרוקים. וארבעת המלורים על הבמה משמיעים בדיוק את הקולות והנגינה של הביטלס.

יש הימם המון אנשים שבקשי מדברים עם הקהל- האמנה היא רק לשיר ולא לדבר. לא סר פול- הוא מספר: "מעבר לים ראינו בשנות השישים את המאבק של השחורים באמריקה, וחשבתי לעצמי-מה אני יכול לעשות כאות הזדהות, וכתבתי שיר". והוא משמיע את Black Bird עם האקורדים שכל ילד לומד איתם גיטרה כבר כמעט ארבעים שנה. והשיר הופך להימודים.

והוא אומר: "נפגשתי ביוסיה עם אנשי הממשלה. ושר התגבה אומר לי: אתה יודע, פול-את האנגלית שלי למדתי דרך השירים שלך. וחשבתי לעצמי: וואו, ילד מליברפול שבקשי גמר בית ספר תיכון, מלמד את השלום אנגלית."

חזרתי הביתה באחת בלילה, אבל כל הלילה התעוררתי משירי הביטלס. יש לי חבר שראה בילדותו הופעה של הביטלס בטורונטו, ואני מרבה לחקור אותו איך זה היה והתרגיש. שכשיו הבנתי בנוף ראשון.

Ira Jacobs in top shape for new U of T post

New dean of physical and health education

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Ira Jacobs, the new dean of the University of Toronto's faculty of physical education and health, launched his career in Israel.

A former elementary school phys-ed teacher whose five-year appointment was announced on Canada Day, he was a research assistant at the Wingate Institute Teachers College, near Tel Aviv, when his life took a different turn.

While working in the lab of Oded Bar-Or, a world-renowned physician who specialized in pediatric exercise physiology, he met a Swede whose research interests coincided with his own.

"So I asked him if he could find a doctoral student position for me," said Jacobs, who was born in Hamilton and who holds a master's degree in exercise physiology from the University of Windsor. Soon enough, Jacobs found himself at the Karolinska Institute in Sweden, where he earned his doctor of medical sciences degree, specializing in skeletal muscle metabolism.

After Sweden, he was a researcher at the Canadian department of national defence for two decades, attaining the position of chief scientist.

In 2007, he was hired to head York University's School of Kinesiology and Health Sciences, the largest program of its kind in North America.

And now, Jacobs has landed at U of T, succeeding Bruce Kidd, who was once a Canadian distance runner and Olympic athlete.

Jacobs, 58, will spend the next year working out a strategic plan for his department, which has about 800 students, 60 of whom are in graduate programs.

As he gets down to business, he acknowledges Kidd's contributions. "He leaves a very important legacy that will act both as a strong foundation and a springboard for our future work," he said in an interview last week.

At this stage, it's clear to Jacobs that his priorities will be to increase and improve the faculty's research capacity and strengthen its undergraduate and graduate degree programs.

As well, Jacobs will try to heighten awareness within the university of the importance of physical education.

"I personally believe that investments in our university's athletics and fitness programs, for the student body and for high-performance athletes, stand to yield a huge return."

Jacobs' field, physiology, is defined as the study of the function of living organisms and how their parts – cells, tissues and organs – interact.

In his study of muscle metabolism, he has examined two processes – the biochemical ones involved in the muscles' ability to exercise and generate force and the biochemical causes of muscle fatigue during exercise.

More specifically, he has attempted to learn what the physiological response would be in physical exertion in environmental extremes ranging from cold to hot environments, at high altitudes and beneath the sea.

Jacobs' research has been useful for combat pilots, for example.

At the department of national defence, Jacobs also initiated and led an international research group whose goal was to upgrade the performance of special forces commandos through nutritional and pharmacological strategies.

Working with 250 scientists and technicians, he focused on ascertaining the limits of human capabilities and limitations in military operations.

"I take some credit for increasing awareness within military research circles of the importance of investing not only in high tech, but also in human sciences and research and development," he said.

After the 1991 Gulf War, oddly enough, Jacobs was a biological weapons inspector for the United Nations Special Commission on Iraq.

"Maybe some day I'll write a book about this experience, which was very distant from what I thought I might do in my professional career," he said. "Through word of mouth, my name came up. I did not seek out the job and was quite taken aback by the offer."

From 1994 to 1998, when Saddam Hussein was Iraq's supreme ruler, Jacobs went to Iraq three times on visits that lasted from two weeks to a month in duration.

Although he declined to delve into details, Jacobs said the job changed his perspective on the world. "It gave me a frame of reference that is very different than what most academics have experienced," he observed.

Ira Jacobs

The son of Sol and Sylvia Jacobs, who were respectively a pharmacist and a social worker and family therapist, Jacobs was a member of Canadian Young Judaea as a teenager. He attended and worked in its summer camps in Canada and Israel.

His decision to study at Wingate seemed preordained. As he put it, "I was always interested in exercise, fitness and sports, and Wingate seemed like a good match."

"I felt and still feel quite comfortable and at home in Israel," he said. "I'm fluent in Hebrew and I return to Israel for visits."

Not surprisingly, Jacobs is in reasonably good shape and makes a point of exercising regularly.

Judging by his research, he is convinced that muscle strength training is beneficial later in life for maintaining independence and mobility.

Clearly, Jacobs practises what he preaches.

The Chabad Student Network of Ottawa recently hosted a barbeque for the homeless, where almost 500 people showed up.

CSN of Ottawa gets permanent home

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — After two years of having religious services and programming in a private home, the Chabad Student Network (CSN) of Ottawa will be purchasing its own house.

Since arriving in the city in April 2008, Rabbi Chaim Boyarsky and his wife, Yocheved, have provided a warm and inviting atmosphere in their home, where students from both Carleton University and the University of Ottawa feel welcome, Rabbi Boyarsky said.

Beginning with five to 10 students, the Boyarskys have managed to attract several hundred undergraduate and graduate students to their Shabbat dinners, holiday celebrations and various classes and programs.

"We personally know of at least 600 Jewish students in Ottawa and believe there are close to 1,700 between both universities. A lot of students out there just need to be given a warm welcome to appreciate being Jewish," Rabbi Boyarsky said.

Their success led to a space problem, because the Boyarsky home is often bursting at the seams.

That's exactly the kind of problem the CSN enjoys, and the challenge is being met. With the help of a grant from the New York-based Rohr Family Foundation, as well as contributions from donors in Canada and the United States, a new property is being purchased for the CSN on Sweetland Avenue near the University of Ottawa.

The new Chabad House will have a 600-square-foot dining hall and large outdoor courtyard. Renovations will include a commercial kitchen, library, recreation room, office and guest rooms where students can stay on Shabbat.

Ariella Singer, the vice-president of CSN at Carleton, said the house will be a safe place for all Jewish students.

"It [will be] somewhere that's just always open… Somewhere anybody can feel comfortable going," said Singer, who's going into her fourth year. "The need for a house, it's really important. It's a lot easier when there's one place where students are welcome to go."

Although the target date to open the new house is around Sukkot, the CSN will be in high gear when students return to the city for classes in early September. Most will have just arrived here as classes begin only days before Rosh Hashanah, and the Boyarskys will be prepared to host students who are not able to return to their family homes for the holidays, for both dinner and services. They already have 170 reservations and will not turn anyone away.

Students are not charged for any of the CSN meals or programs, and everyone of any level of religious observance is welcome. The programs are provided mainly through donations, and the new Chabad House will display a dedication plaque highlighting all the individuals who have contributed to funding the new house.

"Chabad is truly a wonderful home away from home where students don't have to feel lonely on a Friday night or any other day of the year," Rabbi Boyarsky says.

A donation that gives life

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The only regret Kathy Laszlo, 48, has about donating her kidney to 20-year-old Terri Quint in June, is that she can't do it again.

"I wanted to do it, and it's done. But I can only do it once."

Laszlo, founder of DANI, Developing and Nurturing Independence, an organization that helps young adults with special needs, said she met Robyn Quint, Terri's mother, when the two carpooled to a program for their children who have special needs.

"I knew Terri wasn't well, and I offered to help."

Robyn Quint, a native of South Africa, said her family's ordeal began in December, when Terri, who had always been healthy, began to feel unwell.

"We had some tests done, and we were told Terri was in end-stage renal failure. She needed to be on dialysis."

The middle of three sisters and a student at Drewry Secondary School, Terri was on dialysis at home with the help of Humber River Regional Hospital's home dialysis unit.

"It's a huge procedure, and I took six weeks leave of absence from work for training. It's a great system, but it is not an easy road. It's hard for a 19-year-old to lie in one place for eight hours at a time," Quint said.

She said that seven or eight family members stepped forward to donate their kidney, but none were acceptable. "Whoever could [do so] got tested, but for one reason or another, they weren't right. Sometimes family is not an option."

Laszlo, who has Type O blood and is a universal donor, offered to be tested. "When they saw her blood was a match, she spent days at the hospital for further tests. We were overwhelmed by what she was doing," said Quint, whose husband, Saul, is a family doctor in Bolton, Ont.

Laszlo said it was a big decision, "but I kept thinking about the dialysis machine Terri needed to keep her alive. What I was doing was nothing compared to that. I wanted to be able to help her, and I believe that God wanted me to do this."

The whole journey was "unbelievable" Quint said. "From nowhere I had a sick child, and then a donor comes from right in our backyard. The whole [sequence of events] sideswiped us. We have all gained a very special person in our lives. After all, her kidney lives here."

She said that although Terri has a suppressed immune system, and they have to be vigilant about monitoring any illness, "she is living an absolutely normal life."

Laszlo said a couple of people questioned her decision to donate her kidney to a young adult with special needs. "They ask why I wouldn't give health back to someone who will someday have children or who is raising a family. That question is very hurtful to me. Every life has value, and we can't judge who is more worthwhile. In God's eyes, everyone's life is the same."

She is coming forward with her story, she said, in order to encourage people to put themselves on a donation list and to sign donor cards.

She and Terri will be speaking at an organ donor information night Oct. 19, at Chabad of Markham. For more information, contact Renewal Toronto, a non-profit organization that acts as a comprehensive resource for kidney donors and potential recipients within the Jewish community, at www.renewal.org or by e-mail at toronto@renewal.org, or call 416-638-7633.

Lazy reviewers critique video games, movies in 100 words

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

For two lazy people, Eli Green and Nathan Schwartz work very, very hard.

When they worked for a website called the Comic Book Bin, they wrote really, really long movie and video game reviews – somewhere in the realm of 3,000 to 6,000 words each.

"It's so long-winded and technical and it's too much," Green said.

Now, the duo runs a company called Slothy Productions, which oversees Lazyreviewzzz, a website that critiques video games and movies in 100 words or less, and has news and opinion pieces of 200 words or less.

Their reviews take away the excess information, giving the readers what's really the heart of a review: is the movie or video game worth their time and money?

Schwartz said they used to work in numbers, giving products a rating from one to 10. But numbers aren't always clear.

"When you have a seven or an eight, what does that mean?" Schwartz asked. "How good is that?"

Reviews are limited to a maximum of 100 words, with a final verdict. For movies, the options are: see it in theatres, wait for the DVD or Blu Ray, or forget it. Games are placed into one of the following categories: buy it, rent it, forget it.

They also review downloadable content, such as expansion packs, but due to their nature, it's either buy it or don't.

"It gives even more information within that tiny little amount of space," Green said.

Watching the two of them interact is like watching two close siblings – they poke at each other constantly but obviously care about and support each other's work.

They met at a Tim Horton's through a mutual friend, and Schwartz said it was Green's bike that first intrigued him.

Green described it as a European bike model that stretched and folded into itself.

"When I saw it, it was a small little thing that he was carrying around with him," Schwartz said.

Green used to sell them as part of what he called one of his failed entrepreneurial attempts. Now, he's putting his time and energy into the website – while doing computer repairs on the side.

Both Green and Schwartz have a defined role in the company, with Green working as the entrepreneur, and Schwartz as the joker.

"He's like the cake of the company," Schwartz explained. "He's the structure, and I'm the glaze on top to make it kind of sweet."

And quirkiness apparently runs in Schwartz's family. His sister, Hannah, recently joined the Lazyreviewzzz team and has been garnering attention through wearing strange costumes.

For example, on her first two videos – an introduction and a video of the Super Mario Galaxy 2 launch event – she wore a cow costume.

"It worked amazingly," Green said. "We got so many views on that."

On another occasion, the siblings went to downtown Toronto dressed in adult-sized versions of baby pyjamas, Schwartz said, adding that they got a lot of stares.

"They're probably going to start wearing capes with our logo on it, just so people can understand what they're doing," Green said.

Although the website reviews some foreign material – Schwartz said he loves foreign films and often finds them better than Hollywood movies – they haven't covered much from Israel.

Green said he spent a year in Israel, and found a real lack of a gaming industry in the country.

"There are a lot of talented developers out there, but most of them won't even go near consoles and PC gaming," he said, explaining that they tend to stick to online development, such as Facebook games.

"There is no real video game development space in Israel yet," he said, "and it's sad, truthfully. I would love to cover that kind of stuff, but it's not available."

The two of them are open to reviewing pretty much anything that gets sent to them, Green said, but that doesn't mean they'll take them all seriously.

One recent blog post had Schwartz responding to a press release announcing Family Guy creator Seth MacFarlane had received a replica of the DeLorean, the sports car turned time machine in the Back to the Future trilogy.

The post began with Schwartz recounting the news, and "that's about all I have to say on that," he wrote.

He then turns it into a nonsensical recount of a fictional adventure that begins with an elephant wearing khakis asking for fishing equipment in a sporting goods store.

Despite this big imagination, Schwartz said he particularly loves movies that portray realistic actions and emotions.

"I like seeing how a person, if given certain circumstances, how they would react," he said. "Make it as crazy a situation as possible and see how the human can handle it."

Despite their lazy image – their slogan is "that took too much effort" – these two slackers clearly work very, very hard.

Iran: If attacked our response will be wide-ranging

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM – Iranian Defence Minister Brigadier General Ahmad Vahidi warned Monday that his country would show a wide range of reactions in face of a possible attack, adding that the extent would be unpredictable, the Iranian news agency ISNA reported on Monday.

"We will show a very wide-range reaction in case of any military strike, which would come due to foolishness and ignorance. Our reaction cannot be predicted by the enemy," he said during an unveiling ceremony of two domestic boats.

During the unveiling, Iran's Revolutionary Guard Corps inaugurated production lines for two high-speed vessels, the latest in a series of recent additions to the country's arsenal.

The Seraj and Zolfaqar vessels are to be armed with missiles and torpedoes, state media reported.

Fadavi said that the Zolfaqar vessel would be the best in its class worldwide. The craft is to be capable of travelling at a speed of up to 70 knots (130 kilometres per hour), and would be suitable for both patrol and offensive missions, the admiral said.

The Seraj vessel is to be equipped with state-of-the-art technology, reports said.

Iran's defence ministry has in recent weeks displayed several new military projects, including submarines, surface-to-surface missiles and drones.

On Sunday, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad unveiled the country's first domestically made drone, the Karar, which has range of 1,000 kilometres and is armed.

Ahmadinejad said that the drone could be "an ambassador of death for the enemies of humanity, but at the same time a messenger of salvation, peace and friendship in the avoidance of conflicts and aggression."

Iran last week also test fired the new generation of the surface-to-surface Qiam-1 missile, described as a huge step in missile development by the defence ministry.

The armed forces have increased their manoeuvres in the wake of renewed speculation about possible Israeli airstrikes against the country's nuclear sites.

Tehran says its army is not trained to attack another country, but the West fears Iran could launch a missile strike against Israel, especially with its Shahab missiles, which reportedly have a range of 2,000 kilometres, making them capable of reaching any part of the Jewish state.

Israel is too weak to attack Iran's nuclear facilities, the French AFP news agency quoted Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad as telling the Al Jazeera network on Sunday, adding that Iran would act decisively against anyone who dared attempt a military strike against it.

Ahmadinejad's comments came a day after Iranian and Russian engineers began the weeklong operation of loading uranium fuel into the Bushehr nuclear power plant, a major milestone as Tehran forges ahead with its atomic program, despite UN sanctions.

Speaking to the Qatari-based satellite network in an interview translated from Farsi, Ahmadinejad reiterated the warning against a strike on Iran's nuclear facilities, saying he rejected the "possibility of an attack by Israel."

"Israel is too weak to face up to Iran militarily," the Iranian president said, adding that Jerusalem did not have "the courage to do it... and I do not think its threat is serious."

Referring to the possibility of a U.S.-led strike on Iran's nuclear facilities, Ahmadinejad claimed "America is not interested in sparking a military confrontation," but vowed "decisive response" if Washington indeed went ahead with its threats of military action.

Netanyahu prepared to 'surprise all the critics'

The Quartet issued a statement calling for talks that "lead to a settlement… that ends the occupation which began in 1967 and results in the emergence of an independent, democratic and viable Palestinian state living side by side in peace and security with Israel and its other neighbours."

The Quartet's statement did not mention the Sept. 26 expiry of the construction freeze in the West Bank either. It simply referred to its previous statement on the subject, calling for a freeze.

The U.S. adminstration offered few details at the press conference that followed, but Clinton recognized that there would be obstacles and warned that the enemies of peace would try to foil the talks.

"As we move forward, it is important that actions by all sides help to advance our effort, not hinder it. There have been difficulties in the past, there will be difficulties ahead. Without a doubt, we will hit more obstacles," Clinton said. "But I ask the parties to persevere, to keep moving forward, even through difficult times, and to continue working to achieve a just and lasting peace in the region."

At Sunday's cabinet meeting, Netanyahu said he "will arrive at the negotiating table with goodwill to reach a peace agreement. I know there's a lot of skepticism after the 17 years that elapsed since the Oslo accords, and the existence of such skepticism is understandable."

The prime minister told the cabinet he intends to "surprise all the critics and skeptics," but stressed that he needs a Palestinian partner to succeed.

"If we find we have a real partner on the Palestinian side, an honest and earnest partner in negotiations that will need both sides to make the necessary steps – not just the Israeli side but also the Palestinian side – if we find we have a partner like that, we can soon reach a historic peace agreement between the two peoples," the prime minister said.

He emphasized that any peace agreement will necessitate sustainable and realistic security arrangements, a Palestinian recognition of Israel as the nation state of the Jewish People, a resolution to the refugee problem within the borders of the Palestinian state and a Palestinian agreement to announce an end to the conflict.

The chief Palestinian negotiator, Saeb Erekat, said the Israelis "have a choice now whether to choose settlements or peace. I hope they choose peace. I hope that Mr. Netanyahu will be our partner in peace… and we can do it."

The Islamist group Hamas, which controls the Gaza Strip, dismissed the direct talks as a U.S. attempt to "fool the Palestinian people." But U.S. officials said Hamas would have no role in them.

In letters sent on the weekend to Obama, Russian President Dmitry Medvedev and the high representative of the European Union on foreign policy, Catherine Ashton, Abbas wrote that renewed Israeli construction in settlements after the end of the construction freeze in late September would bring the newly launched direct negotiations to a grinding halt.

"It's impossible to conduct negotiations alongside settlement construction," Abbas warned.

The future of the construction freeze in the West Bank, slated to end Sept. 26, is expected to become the first significant obstacle facing the Israeli and American governments in the direct talks.

Top Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat said on Sunday that although the American administration did not commit to the P.A. that the construction freeze would be renewed after the September deadline, the Palestinians expected the freeze to continue. Erekat said the Americans implied that if direct negotiations would restart, it would be easier to convince Israel to extend the construction freeze.

In a statement released by the United Nations, Secretary General Ban Ki Moon welcomed the announcement of the direct talks. "We should all be aware that this is an opportunity that must not be wasted," he said. "This opportunity must be seized so that the hope of a better future for the people of the region to live in peace, security and freedom can be fully realized."

New IDF chief of staff named

By ANSHEL PFEFFER

JERUSALEM—Maj.-Gen. Yoav Galant, who has been named the 20th Israel Defence Forces chief of staff, will be the first chief of staff to have come up through the ranks of the navy.

Galant, 51, joined the navy commandos in 1977 and held a series of command positions in the elite Shayetet 13 unit. During that period, he spent two years on leave from the army travelling to Alaska and working as a lumberjack. On his return to the IDF, he completed naval officer training and served as second-in-command of a missile boat. Afterward, he returned to the Shayetet, was appointed commander of a company and promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel.

Yoav Galant

Galant was one of the first officers of the Shayetet to switch to the army when in 1994 he was appointed commander of the Jenin Brigade. He returned to the navy, however, this time as commander of the Shayetet. After three years in that role, he switched back, once and for all, to the land forces. Promoted to brigadier-general, he was appointed commander of the Gaza Division, a position he held until 1999. Later, Galant was retrained in the armoured division, serving as commander of a reserve unit and overall head of ground forces.

In 2002, he was promoted to major-general and assigned the role of army secretary to prime minister Ariel Sharon. After three years in that post, in 2005, he was appointed head of the IDF's Southern Command. The five-year period he served there is considered unusually long, and his wait for promotion is widely attributed to his tense relationship with current Chief of Staff Gabi Ashkenazi, who inherited Galant from his predecessor, Dan Halutz.

Galant played a major role in the planning and execution of Operation Cast Lead in Gaza a year and a half ago.

Galant is expected to replace Ashkenazi in mid-February 2011, however, in the coming days he will play a part in discussions about a round of senior appointments in the IDF.

Economy grows quickly

Israeli economic growth unexpectedly accelerated to its fastest pace in more than two years. Exports and consumer spending increased, helping to boost growth in the second quarter by an annualized 4.7 per cent, Bloomberg reported. The expansion rate rose from a revised 3.6 per cent in the first quarter, the Jerusalem-based Central Bureau of Statistics said last week. The median forecast of six economists surveyed by Bloomberg had predicted growth of 2.9 per cent. The statistics bureau reported last month that the economy grew a preliminary 3.4 per cent in the first three months. Exports, comprising nearly half of GDP, have powered Israel's rebound from the global financial crisis.

Prof wins math prize

A Hebrew University professor was one of four winners of a prize considered the Nobel of mathematics. Hebrew University professor Elon Lindenstrauss won the International Mathematical Union's Fields Medal for his work in numbers theory. He was cited for his work in ergodic theory, the statistical study of dynamical systems, which formulate models relating time and space. The medal is named for Canadian mathematician J.C. Fields and carries a cash prize of about $15,000.

Alleged looting probed

Israel's military is investigating an IDF officer and soldier suspected of selling goods they confiscated from the Gaza flotilla after the May 31 raid. Military police are investigating whether an officer sold items to another soldier that were confiscated from the ships while they were docked in Ashdod, Ynet reported. Three soldiers already have admitted they bought laptops from the second soldier who has been arrested. The probe comes as a number of Israeli and international committees are investigating the incident. Not long after the flotilla incident, passengers aboard the ships complained that credit cards, cellphones and other equipment had been confiscated and used. At the time, an IDF spokesperson said all personal items had been sent out of the country. An investigator said that if it turns out the items were taken from the ships, the activists would be compensated.

Iran ready to swap nuclear fuel

Israeli media reported that Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said last Friday his country is ready for immediate talks with world powers over a nuclear fuel swap deal. According to AFP, Ahmadinejad said Iran was "ready to resume in late August or in early September" talks with the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council over an exchange of enriched uranium. The United States, the European Union and the UN Security Council have imposed sanctions on Iran over a nuclear program the West suspects is aimed at developing atomic weapons. Russia announced two weeks ago it will begin loading nuclear fuel into the reactor of Iran's first atomic power station on Aug. 21, an irreversible step marking the start-up of the Bushehr plant after nearly 40 years of delays.

IDF retaliates in Gaza

The air force hit what the military said was a weapons manufacturer and weapons smuggling tunnels in the Gaza Strip. No casualties were reported in the predawn raid last Wednesday. An IDF statement said the air raids were in response to mortar attacks Tuesday that lightly injured two Israeli soldiers.

A land far away

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Rachel Mirsky's Israeli identification card is bigger than she expected it to be. It doesn't fit into her wallet very well and she worries about where to keep it.

It does look the way she thought it would, however, with an identification number on the right and her picture on the left.

"It feels very official," she says, turning the card over in her hand.

There's nothing unique or special about the laminated piece of plastic. To most, it's a piece of bureaucracy, something that has to be carried around.

But to Mirsky, 27, it's a piece of her new life.

"This it it. You're a citizen. Everyone in Israel has one of these and so do you," she said.

Mirsky hasn't been an Israeli citizen for very long. The recent immigrant was one of 234 olim to walk off Nefesh B'Nefesh's 43rd chartered flight to Israel on Aug. 2.

Getting off the plane, she unfurled a banner, multi-coloured and handmade, bearing the words "Mirsky Triplets are now Reunited."

Born in Toronto into a Zionist household, Mirsky is the only girl in a set of triplets who also have twin brothers, all of whom have moved, one by one, to Israel.

"Israel has always been a part of my life," Mirsky said. "But it was a land far away."

This changed on her first trip to the country, when she was 13.

"It suddenly made things much more real."

Immigration to Israel started to become a reality for her around five years ago, when her triplet brother Yossi made aliyah and served in the Israel Defence Forces. Her brother Simcha, now 22, moved about a year later and is waiting to finish school in Israel before making aliyah. Aharon, 27, and Yisrael, 22, made aliyah last year, and both also joined the IDF.

But Mirsky stayed in Canada.

"I wanted to live [in Israel], but it's a big step. It's scary," she said.

Rachel Mirsky, 27, receives her Teudat Zehut (Israeli identification card).

Instead, Mirsky went to school, first for an arts program, and then for animal care, a career she hopes to continue in Israel.

In May 2009, Mirsky decided to spend a year in Israel. She volunteered in the IDF, helping paratroopers unravel their parachutes after landing, and cleaning weapons, went on an archeological dig and explored the possibility of making aliyah.

"I knew that was the main reason [I went to Israel], but I wasn't admitting it to myself verbally," she said.

Finally, while still in Israel, she took the plunge.

With the help of Nefesh B'Nefesh (NBN), an organization that works with the Jewish Agency in Israel to help North Americans make aliyah, Mirsky started her immigration process.

"In some way, I felt I wasn't going anywhere further [in Canada]. It wasn't until I went back to Israel that I started being part of a community."

And this is what Mirsky is looking for. This is why she packed up her life, left her parents, and took the 12-hour trip to a country that, at one time in her life, was a land far away.

"I really want to become part of a community," she said while on the flight to Israel. "Back home, it was do my job, come home. I didn't have much of a social life."

But things will be different in Israel, she said.

"If you move into a neighbourhood, everyone's going to be welcoming. No one's an island here. They won't let you be an island... They'll drive you out of your shell."

In September, Mirsky will be living in a kibbutz, where she'll learn Hebrew and work. Eventually, she'd like to live in Jerusalem and work with animals, possibly at a zoo.

Until then, she'll spend her time trying to get organized. After getting her Teudat Zehut (identification card) at the NBN office in Jerusalem, she browses different health care plans and talks to bank representatives at an NBN information fair.

"I think this is pretty much what I'll be doing for the next week," she says, trying to make a to-do list.

"They make it out to be simple, but it's so many things. If I start thinking of it as a whole, it's a little overwhelming. If I think of it in steps, I'm OK."

That may be the same strategy Mirsky's parents, Bracha and Michael, are using.

For Mirsky's mother, having Yossi move to Israel was a little unnerving, especially since it was during a time of heavy bombing.

"Buses were being blown up and there was so much going on. I remember very distinctly Yossi calling me up... there was so much noise in the background. I asked him, 'Where are you?' He said, 'I'm in Jerusalem, on a bus.' And literally, my knees went out from under me," Bracha said.

"A few months later, when he began to talk to me about wanting to go to the army, I realized that he had to. If that's what he wanted to do, that's what he had to do."

Mirsky's parents, who are thinking about making aliyah eventually, have taken a similar attitude to her move.

"I was happy for her because she's a very strong willed person. If she felt it wasn't good for her, she would not go," Bracha said.

In Israel, Mirsky still wears pants underneath her skirts. It's a habit she picked up in Canada, a place she still thinks of as home.

"I wish we could somehow put Canada and Israel together. But I've chosen [Israel]. In my mind, I say home. This is home with a capital H."

The reporter's trip to Israel was partly subsidized by Nefesh B'Nefesh.

'Iran never ignores its enemies'

"There are no logical reasons for the United States to carry out such an act," Ahmadinejad told Al Jazeera.

The Al Jazeera interview came hours after a high-ranking officer in Iran's Revolutionary Guards told the semi-official Fars news agency that Iran's reaction to a possible U.S. military strike against its nuclear facilities would target American interests beyond the Middle East.

Speculating on the possibility of a U.S. strike against Iran's developing nuclear program, Deputy Revolutionary Guards Commander for Political Affairs Brigadier General Yadollah Javani said earlier Sunday that "if Americans make a strategic mistake and choose the military option against the Islamic Republic and our nation's interests, Iran will not confine its defence to the region."

"In case of any illogical move, the Islamic Republic's hands and advocates will be powerfully activated against the interests of the hegemonic system and U.S. bases outside the region," Javani told Fars.

Turning his attention to Israel, Javani said that Iran did not believe its enemy was capable of attacking. Nonetheless, he said, Iran would be prepared in case that equation should change. "Iran never ignores its enemies. Hence, we have been increasing our defence and deterrence capabilities."

Arab states cut aid to PA

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Arab states have cut financial aid to the Palestinian Authority so far this year and the United Nations has warned of a looming Palestinian cash crisis.

"The Arabs are not paying. We urge them to meet their financial pledges," said Saleh Rafat, a member of the Palestine Liberation Organization's executive committee and one of the few Palestinian officials willing to speak out on the matter.

Arab government officials declined to comment on the issue.

The failure of some wealthy Arab states to pay up is frustrating western governments, which are big contributors to the Palestinian territories. The situation is also leaving officials in the West Bank with a budget headache.

Some Palestinian officials speculate that Arab states might be withholding the cash to try to persuade the Palestinian factions Fatah, which controls the West Bank, and Hamas, which controls Gaza, toward reconciliation.

The Ma'an news agency quoted a Palestinian Authority official who denied reports indicating the authority is facing a major cash crisis. PA spokesperson Ghassan Al-Khatib said workers will find money in the bank at the end of the month, but conceded that the government was facing a "very severe financial crisis, but one that is being managed," Ma'an reported.

Palestinian Finance Ministry figures showed the PA had so far received $583.5 million in budget support in 2010. Only 22 per cent came from Arab donors, the rest came from international donors including the European Union and the United States.

In the last three years, the most Arab states have paid in any one year is $525.9 million, contributed in 2008, the figures show. Gulf oil exporters Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates have been the main Arab contributors to the PA since 2007. But this year, both have fallen well short of previous support.

This year, Saudi Arabia had reportedly paid $30.6 million by August, compared to $241.1 million in 2009. The UAE, which contributed $173.9 million in 2009, has yet to contribute anything.

A UN report this week said the PA "will face a serious liquidity crisis in September and will have difficulty paying August salaries" due to the aid shortfall. PA officials, however, said August wages were secured.

Aid is crucial in helping pay the wages of 148,000 PA employees, including 67,000 in the Gaza Strip, whose salaries help support the Gazan economy, which has withered since Hamas rose to power there in 2007.

Palestinian policy-makers say donor support has been one of the main engines of strong economic growth in the West Bank, a figure estimated as having reached eight per cent this year.

Palestinian Prime Minister Salam Fayyad, midway through a two-year plan to build the institutions of a future Palestinian state, warned recently of "serious financial difficulty" and said the PA faced "a significant shortfall in external assistance."

Ma'an also reported that EU-denied aid to the Palestinians is linked to negotiations with Israel, quoting the head of operations at the Office of the EU Representative in Jerusalem, Roy Dickenson. However, he categorically rejected accusations that donor countries were withholding assistance as the international community pushes for a return to direct peace talks.

No Hamas inquiry in Ban's Gaza report

JTA

WASHINGTON – The UN secretary-general's interim report on investigations into the 2009 Gaza War does not include a direct investigation of Hamas' role.

Ban Ki-moon attached an interim Israeli account of its investigations and a lengthy report by the West Bank-based Palestinian Authority in his submission this week to the UN General Assembly, but there was no sign of any investigation by the authorities in the Hamas-controlled Gaza Strip of the organization's role in the war, which resulted in between 1,000-1,400 Palestinian and 13 Israeli deaths.

Israel says Hamas launched the war with a massive intensification of rocket attacks on Israel's south. Richard Goldstone, the UN-appointed investigator who charged both sides with war crimes, has said it is incumbent on both sides to make good-faith efforts to set up independent inquiries.

Ban did not explain the omission. "I have called upon all of the parties to carry out credible, independent domestic investigations into the conduct and consequences of the Gaza conflict," he wrote in his interim report. "I hope that such steps will be taken wherever there are credible allegations of violations of international human rights and humanitarian law."

Human Rights Watch, an independent non-governmental organization, chided Ban for not going further. "Israeli investigations still fall far short of being thorough and impartial, while Hamas appears to have done nothing at all to investigate alleged violations," it said in a statement. "We regret that the secretary-general merely passed on the reports he received from Israel and the Palestinian side instead of making the failings of these investigations clear."

The Israeli report included in Ban's submission summarizes what it says is progress in military and civilian inquiries into the war.

The Palestinian Authority report focuses mostly on what it says are Israel's violations, and then on Hamas violations of civil liberties in Gaza; it exonerates the Palestinian Authority of any excesses in the West Bank, although human rights groups say the PA is cracking down on opponents. Hamas drove the Fatah-led P.A. out of Gaza in 2007.

The PA report says that Hamas rocket attacks on Israeli civilians would violate human rights but adds that it does not have proof that these occurred – this, despite the fact that such attacks have been subject to extensive media scrutiny.

The PA commission was not allowed access to the Gaza Strip.

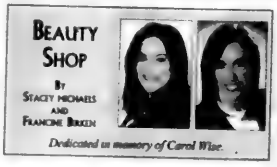
Fall Fashion

It's time to say goodbye to those amazing summer days and begin to look forward to the prettiest time of year. This summer was one season we will never forget: blue skies, hot temperatures, kids home from school and fun times for all.

As seasons change, so should your makeup. Your skin may have taken a beating during the hot temperatures. Begin your skin-care regiment with a good facial to clean away all the impurities. Make sure to cleanse your skin daily as well as apply a moisturizer, as the fall will bring cooler temperatures. This fall, 2010 makeup trends are fabulous, and all styles are available for many different looks and personalities. It is important to choose which colours suit you best.



Bare eyes is one of the looks that is popular this fall season. Make sure to apply concealer and foundation for that flawless look on your face. Eyes remain bare with a small amount of mascara and a small amount of blush on your cheeks. Lip gloss is perfect for this natural look.

For the bold lip look, keep the face flawless, wear minimal eye makeup and apply a strong lip colour such as red or wine to achieve that seductive statement. This may be suitable for a lot of us and can be worn day and night.

The next type of look that may be suitable for some is the dramatic, strong trend. Bold eyes, which include shadows such as black or brown, heavy coated lashes and strong lips such as red and wine, are for the individual who feels confident and who truly wants to make a statement.

You will look beautiful no matter what trend you choose. Enhance your greatest features and enjoy these makeup tips we are about to share with you.

Discover the three products to answer baby skin's daily needs: Foaming Cleansing Gel to cleanse the skin and scalp of newborns and young children in a soothing wave of fruity fragrance; Soothing Cleansing Lotion to cleanse, refresh and soothe in one easy step; and Protecting Repair Balm, a very rich "high-tolerance" formula to gently cleanse the delicate diaper area and leave behind an invisible film that protects against irritation and redness (diaper rash).

Now Elizabeth Arden's Prevage presents a new vision of anti-aging eyecare with two new high-performance innovations designed to deliver intensive correction and protection to the look of skin around the eyes.

French Coquette by Lancôme

For its fall 2010 collection, Lise Watier was inspired by the purest and most celestial of colours – blue is the colour of beauty. This season's Palette Bleu Bold revolves around the collection's star colour blue. You have a choice of five pressed shadows with rich pigments: denim blue, state blue, charcoal, ecru white and dark brown.

Feeling fierce? Bobbi Brown introduces Pretty Powerful Eyes. The metallic eye shadow is now available in three new almost-black shades. Each shade applies smoothly and evenly and stays crease free for all-day wear. If you are looking for that shiny look, don't look any farther. Along with her bold stunning line, she also introduces New Sparkle Eye Shadow. This lightweight formula lights up your eyes with a combination of shimmering pearls and fine glitter.

Lancôme is proud to present French Coquettes, the fall 2010 colour collection by Aaron De Mey. Ombre Magnétique eyeshadows are available in three colours, cherry chérie, urban silver and black macadam. These colours create a smoky effect in the blink of an eye.

Back by popular demand, the Lise Watier Divine Lash and Line Duo returns this fall – and it is here to stay. Doing double-duty as both mascara and eyeliner, its innovative applicator features an eyeliner brush for a precise liner application and ridges on the stem like a mascara. Once you have tried it, you won't be able to live without it.

To help women shine at all times, Marcelle suggests two new liquid eyeliners, Lux Metallic and Lux Diamond, to outline the eyes with intense, precious hues and glittering flakes for an ultra-modern and sparkling look.

Line, define and shade your eyes with Bobbi Brown's new Kohl Eyeliner. This silky-smooth formula makes it easy to line your lids super close to your lash line. It's available in three shades, black, black chocolate and black plum.

BLUSH: Blush should look natural with a hint of colour, no matter what trend you are going to be following. Lancôme introduces La Rose Déco, a light-as-air powder that beautifies the complexion with a rosy glow. It is to be applied using light touches – the deepest shade can replace the blush, while the lighter shade illuminates facial contour.

LIPS: It's no secret that full, youthful lips are a universally attractive attribute. Unfortunately, our lips are not spared from the drop in collagen and elastin production that takes place as we age, meaning that vertical lines around the lips begin to appear around the same time as facial wrinkles do. Alyria Intense Lip Volumizer contains a nourishing dose of vitamin B3 which improves circulation to the lips and boosts lip volume, addressing the thinning that tends to occur with age.

Lips are the statement for fall 2010. The Marcelle Rouge Xpression lipstick promises to send the object of your desire on a roller-coaster ride of emotions. It comes in 12 rich and luminous shades and is formulated with Maxi-Lip technology that produces a plumping effect. Thanks to the avocado oil and vitamins C and E, it has the pleasing comfort of a non-stick velvety cream formula.

Bobbi Brown has created three different textures all of which are definitely worth trying: Original Lip Color, which treats lips to rich colour with a soft-matte finish; Metallic Lip Color, which combines high-shine and shimmer; and Creamy Lip Color, which combines rich color with comfortable, long-lasting wear and a soft, creamy shine.

Lipstick lovers always look forward to fall because it's the season of bold lips. For the girl who is looking for the '20s-inspired cherry-red lips, Lancôme is proud to present Color Fever Gloss. It's easy to apply, and definitely makes the statement you are trying to express.

OPI Radiance

NAILS: Finally, for your fall look, don't forget about your nails! OPI brings a wealth of luxury to nails this fall with two new Designer Series shades, DS magic and DS radiance. Madeleine Albright used brooches as communication aids

By ANITA SZABADI-GOTTESMAN
Special to The CJN

An easy way to take an old blouse and make it feel new again is to add an accessory.

Accessorizing with a brooch or a pin can also give an instant update to an old frock that you had relegated to a spot in the far reaches of the closet.

This year, following close behind the trend of wearing large cocktail rings, brooches, too, have increased in size and have become fashion statements. Whether in sterling silver or gold, or costume jewelry; in the form of work of art, an animal or something a little more whimsical, a brooch can set off any outfit.

Many of the Hollywood set add a brooch to accent an off-the-shoulder gown or provide some panache to a waistline at the Academy Awards. Gathered reams of fabric pinned with a matching or contrasting brooch finished the look for the red carpet.

Brooches can be hot off the shelves of mass merchandisers or painstakingly sculpted at a jeweller's workbench. Many brooches are treasured heirlooms handed down through the generations. Diamonds, pearls, Swarovski crystal, inset pavé diamonds or intricate offerings using marquisate stone all work to create a signature look expressing individual style.

No one does brooches better than former American secretary of state Madeleine Albright. She chose to use brooches not only as a fashionable accessory but also as a way of representing herself and her mood to the world during her countless encounters and negotiations on the world stage. She acquired so many brooches throughout her long career in American politics that she became known for her "pin diplomacy."

Last fall, the Museum of Arts and Design in New York put together an exhibit of her pin collection, featuring some 200 of her favourite brooches.

'Pin Diplomacy'

The museum's director, Holly Hotchner, was recently quoted on the Huffington Post website saying that Albright found that what she wore and how she presented herself had a lot of interpretive meaning to those she was with. Hochtner went on to say that "the pins became an added way she communicated as secretary of state." The museum fittingly titled the exhibit, "Read My Pins: The Madeleine Albright Collection."

Featured in the display was the golden snake pin she wore after the Iraqi government, then headed by Saddam Hussein, labelled her a serpent.

"She started acquiring pins because of their inherent messages, their whimsical and pictorial quality," said David Revere McFadden, the museum's chief curator. "It's not about jewels and gems. It's about jewelry as a communication device."

The collection encompasses all manner of brooches, large and small, with many featuring an Americana theme – the American flag, an eagle – to ones with flowers, animal and insect themes. She was well known to travel with an assortment of brooches, enabling her to choose just the right one when she needed it to make a point.

One of Albright's favourite pins was a dove pin she received from Leah Rabin, the widow of Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin.

Whether Albright received pins as gifts or sought them out on her many travels to far-flung destinations, she continually added to her collection and never assisted at a formal government function without choosing the appropriate one for the day, wearing it proudly.

So meaningful is her pin collection to her life's work, Albright has penned a book titled Read My Pins: Stories from a Diplomat's Jewel Box.

From whimsical to sculpted and intricately jewelled, brooches add panache to any outfit.

Experiment with different essences to choose a perfume

By FRANCES GOODMAN PELLATT
Special to The CJN

There is nothing more devastating than getting all dressed up for an evening out, spritzing on a new fragrance just before walking out the door, only to have your husband say, "What is that smell?" The evening can only go downhill from there.

Or did you ever buy a perfume because you loved it on a friend and discovered that it did not smell the same when you wore it? Did you ever purchase that certain scent created and advertised by your favourite actress only to realize that it was not an odour that was pleasing on your body?

Wearing a fragrance can be pleasurable, and can even express something about you and your style, but it can be a challenge to choose the right one. Bodies exude their own scents and adding certain fragrances may not be compatible to your personal essence. As well, certain scents are suitable for different occasions and different age groups.

One website notes that there are several categories of fragrances and "the lower the concentration of aromatic compounds, the shorter the scent life." Perfume, the highest category, is highly prized and most expensive, because it lasts from morning until night, wears well (meaning the scent stays fresh as the day wears on) and is designed to smell nice throughout its various stages of wear. The next category is eau de parfum, then eau de toilette and, lastly, eau de cologne. Each respectively contains a lesser degree of aromatic oils, thus each respectively is less expensive.

The literature further explains that there are six main types of fragrances.

- Floral, with flowers as the dominant theme, very feminine and romantic
- Fruity, spicy and fresh, with fruits used as part of the formula
- Oceanic – modern perfumes that use synthetic elements to smell strongly of the sea
- Greens – fresh energetic perfumes reminiscent of the outdoors
- Orientals – sexy, exotic and intense perfumes that smell of musk, vanilla, spices and opulent heavy flowers
- Woody – perfume that smells like bark, moss and other things you might find in the forest.

Perfumes that are intense and heady, such as the Orientals (spices, heavy flowers) tend to be more suited to evening wear and special occasions for women, while the green types (outdoorsy) are more appropriate for casual wear and teenagers. Lighter scents of floral and fruit are refreshing in hot weather, while heavier scents of musk, woodsy smells are more comforting in the cooler months.

Marilyn, for example, who's in her mid-60s, occasionally wears cologne that is not too strong or too sweet, and says it has a pleasant aroma that dissipates throughout the day, which she prefers. She's been wearing the same fragrance since she was a teenager. Evelyne, in her early 60s, has been wearing the same light, floral scent for the past 20 years and says the sweet aroma makes her feel good.

Jane, who's in her mid-30s, says she wears a scent every day because it makes her feel pretty. She prefers expensive perfume and for years has been alternating between five or six different ones, often adding a new one to the mix, if she likes the smell. She will also wear different scents in winter than summer, preferring stronger perfumes in the colder months.

On the other hand, Melanie, in her early 40s, has been wearing the same name-brand eau de toilette for the past 15 years, summer and winter. She loves the smell and chose it because she liked it on her sister.

Many women change their choice of scent with the seasons or based on the occasion, time of day or what is being marketed as the "in" fragrance to wear. If you like to add a scent as a finishing touch after dressing, you probably should experiment with different essences, but first you must decide what kinds of smells you like. For example, do you like the smell of cake baking? Many fragrances are based on the scent of vanilla. Do you like the smell of the ocean, the aroma of fresh laundry, or perhaps the stronger scent of tea?

To learn more about which fragrance is best for you, first decide on which category you prefer – perfume or the less expensive cologne. Check out the six different types of essences and then try them on for different occasions.

Amba Health & Beauty Spa at the Delta Sherwood Inn

Spa Life
By KATHRYN KATES

When the rich, the famous, and the celebrated who cottage on Muskoka's Lake Joseph in Port Carling, Ont., want to be pampered, they often boat over to the shores of the Delta Sherwood Inn's Amba Health & Beauty Spa.

Owner and spa director Corrinna MacConnell, a beauty therapist and esthetician, originally bought the quaint cottage spa 10 years ago, ran it for four years before selling it, and then two years ago, purchased the spa once again.

"Our spa is nestled into a hill. We have a tree going through the middle of our natural wood waiting room next to our hot tub. The rest of the spa is painted in whites and blues. I want people staying at the inn or coming off their boats from their cottages to feel relaxed and casual and far away from the city," MacConnell says.

Amba Spa services includes facials such as the Aromatic Facial; Liftosome for lifting; Beaute Neuve, an exfoliating anti-aging facial; the deep-cleansing Hydradermie Facial that purifies, moisturizes and oxygenates the skin using a galvanic current; the Men Spa Facial; and the Express Facial.

Also offered, are massages, including hot stone; and aromatherapy, reflexology, back treatments, manicures and pedicures, and body wraps, including the European-Rose Body Mud and the Black Baltic Body Mud. Add-ons include a paraffin wax treatment for the hands and feet, and scalp, eye or neck treatments to compliment a facial.

The spa has created three packages: the two-hour Pure Balance, the five-hour Ultimate Spa Sensation, and the most popular package, the three-hour Retreat to Nature, which, according to MacConnell, includes Hot Rocks Foot Treatment, Deluxe Pedicure, Express Facial, Aromatherapy Hot Towels with Body Polish and European-Rose Body Mud Wrap, and a massage incorporating Swedish techniques and the hot rocks.

The clientele is about 80 per cent women, but the spa's couple business is growing. Although couples can book appointments at the same time, they receive their services in different treatment rooms. They can, however, come together in the waiting area for wine and cheese catered by the Delta Sherwood Inn's kitchen.

"We have one RMT [registered massage therapist], one esthetician and a receptionist on staff, but we can bring in other therapists when required. At the spa, we have a pedicure room, a manicure room, a facial room and two massage rooms," MacConnell says.

You don't have to own one of the palatial cottages on Lake Joseph, as actors Goldie Hawn and Kurt Russell do, to experience what the area has to offer. The pet-friendly Delta Sherwood offers a Muskoka getaway experience reflected in the traditionally decorated 49 rooms and cottage suites, including the beautiful boathouse suite overlooking the pristine lake. Some of the rooms come with whirlpools, wood-burning fireplaces and private balconies.

The resort is open all year round with plenty of activities to participate in when you're not at the spa. In the summer, guests can play volleyball, croquet, tennis or badminton; take a swim, cruise the lake, sail, canoe, water ski, windsurf, bike or hike. Guests have exclusive access to the neighbouring ClubLink golf courses. Even floatplane sightseeing excursions can be booked. During the winter months, the Delta Sherwood offers cross-country skiing, ice fishing, skating, tobogganing, snowmobiling and much more.

Attractions in the area include Johnston's Cranberry Marsh and Muskoka Lakes Winery just north of Bala. The family owned cranberry farm has made Bala famous as the cranberry capital of Ontario. Other attractions include the Muskoka Lakes Museum, and you can tour Muskoka aboard the RMS Segwun – North America's oldest steamship.

Nice Jewish boy takes on Hollywood stars

Marshall Jay Kaplan, right, with Larry David

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

Cartoonist and TV producer Marshall Jay Kaplan's fascination with celebrities is taking him to Hollywood to track down stars.

His adventures will be shown on a new show he's producing and hosting, Totally Tracked Down, which airs on TVtropolis in September.

Kaplan tries to find out what various celebrities are really like through their connections, including people they know, places and things. Each connection introduces him to someone else, and the chain continues until he reaches the celebrity.

"It's the six degrees of separation and that tells sort of a story about the person," he said.

For example, he wanted to track down Joan Van Ark, known for playing Valene Ewing on Dallas, as well as on its spinoff series, Knots Landing.

To get to her, Kaplan started with the creator of Knots Landing, who directed him to her co-star, Michele Lee. Lee led him to Van Ark's personal assistant, who then referred him to Van Ark's hairdresser.

Her hairdresser suggested he speak with Van Ark's husband, John Marshall, a former TV journalist who flies planes out of an airport in southern California. Kaplan visited the airport, and finally, Marshall introduced him to Van Ark.

"It's usually the family member that has the final gate," Kaplan said.

He knows he could probably contact the celebrity's agent directly and request an interview that way, but that's just not as fun, he said.

"The chase is fun," he said. "I can get a lot more of the story getting through to the people who mean things to their life than going directly to the person and getting the typical interview that we've all seen on television."

By meeting these people, when he finally reaches the end of the trail, he is equipped with a ton of personal information.

Kaplan found himself in many strange situations to get to the stars, situations that provided lots of laughs for the show, he said.

He spoke with Cloris Leachman, who mentored his target, Mindy Cohn, known for her role as Natalie Green on the TV show The Facts of Life. "She [Leachman] was willing to meet with me, but only if I made her margaritas and met with her under the covers," he said.

On another occasion, he stood outside Larry David's office for an hour waiting for somebody to show up so he could find out why he had cast Estelle Harris in Seinfeld.

"That's all real. I really basically stopped him," Kaplan said. "He granted [the interview] but let's just say it was quite intense. He was not gracious about it. With Larry David, exactly what you see on television [the show Curb Your Enthusiasm] is what he is."

He said some of the stars got very emotional knowing the work he put into finding them, and some of them granted him the interview simply because they got wind of the fact that he has been searching for them.

Totally Tracked Down came about when Kaplan was pitching another television show to Canwest. Canwest wasn't interested, but the company representatives he spoke to did need a new program for TVtropolis.

Kaplan had worked in advertising until he was 40, and used his advertising background to quickly come up with an idea for a show and a title.

"It was right off the cuff," he said, adding that he tried to find something that began with a "T" – to fit with Tvtropolis – and used the word "totally," as a reference to the '90s expression.

Kaplan has a ton of experience finding celebrity stories. His column "Where Are They Now?" is published in some 40 monthly newspapers.

Ashkenaz Festival features broad range of traditions

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Audiences at this year's Ashkenaz Festival will see a diverse range of performances and presentations from traditional European klezmer and Yiddish music to more contemporary cutting-edge events, the festival's artistic director says.

"When the festival was first founded, it started as a place for klezmer and Yiddish music to be featured, and over the years, it's broadened so much," Eric Stein says. "The name of the festival is well established and has a strong brand, but it does mislead some people into thinking that in some ways, it's insular or exclusive."

But with more than 50,000 non-Jewish people attending the event, which runs every two years, this is certainly not the case.

"We do everything we can in all of our marketing and publicity, and, on the sheer volume of what's programmed, to convey how inclusive we are and that we want to represent pan-Jewish culture with the best and brightest of contemporary creativity in the Jewish artistic and musical worlds," Stein, the mandolin player and leader of the klezmer-East European fusion band Beyond the Pale, says.

Now in its 15th year, the program has grown to include more music from the Spanish and North African-influenced Sephardim, and from Mizrachi (Sephardi) traditions rooted in the Middle East and further east including Iran, Iraq and India.

"The artists that are working within Jewish music traditions today draw from a broad palate of ideas and traditions. More and more, the boundaries break down," Stein says.

"Even if you talk about klezmer music in general, that term has almost been rendered meaningless over the last decade by the amount of fusion and blending that's happened. So, you now have different variances of klezmer. There's neo-traditional, punk and hiphop klezmer. It ends up being a lot of hyphenated genres that fall under the klezmer category."

The Balkan Beat Box

Stein says that within a city as multicultural as Toronto, it just seems such a natural for the festival itself, a celebration of Jewish culture, to also represent diversity between cultures and ethnicities, and fluidity and adaptability within the Jewish world.

The eighth Ashkenaz Festival includes more than 80 acts with over 200 individuals from more than a dozen countries.

Offerings include the world premiere of David Kaufman's movie Song of the Lodz Ghetto featuring the music of the klezmer group Brave Old World.

One of the featured groups is The Other Europeans, a 14-piece-super group of Jewish and Roma musicians from seven countries, who Stein says are rekindling a historical symbiosis between Jewish and Roma musicians

Other shows include the funky-edged, Balkan Beat Box, the harmonica quartet Les Batards de Bouche (Mongrels of the Mouth) and The Sway Machinery with compositions by Brian Chase of the Yeah Yeah Yeahs and Colin Stetson of Arcade Fire.

Also presented is A Night in the Old Marketplace, an opera by New York-based, Grammy Award-winner Frank London, based on the words of the late, legendary author and playwright I.L Peretz, widely considered the father of modern Yiddish literature. It is described as a theatrical Yiddish ghost story shaped as much by old world folklore as by Tom Waits-style musical satire.

Ashkenaz sees the biggest gathering of Toronto's Jewish community, Stein says.

"It's something that brings together the community in a way that very few other things do, across lines that may ordinarily divide people, whether it's religion or politics or whatever. Ashkenaz is very much about just bringing people together in celebration and unity to enjoy what is a very vibrant and accomplished culture."

The Ashkenaz Festival runs from Aug. 31 to Sept. 6. Most of the events are free, but some require tickets. Harbourfront Centre plays host to the Labour Day weekend events, but other venues participating include the Al Green Theatre at the Miles Nadal JCC, Caplansky's Deli, Lula Lounge, the Free Times Cafe and the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

Remarkable film about Lodz Ghetto troubadour

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Yankele Herszkowicz was a poor tailor who became the Lodz Ghetto's beloved and popular street singer. His songs, dark but humorous satire on life in the ghetto, raised the spirits of Jews living there – at least as much as was possible.

David Kaufman's documentary Song of the Lodz Ghetto is a remarkable film that tells the story of Poland's second-largest ghetto primarily by focusing on the story and songs of this amazing troubadour. The songs are performed in this film by klezmer supergroup Brave Old World.

Herszkowicz is described in the film as a beacon of light in one of the darkest periods of history. He literally sang for his supper. His songs dealt with the life and death struggles of everyday life. But he wasn't above a bit of political commentary, and his primary target was Chaim Rumkowski, the reviled, controversial Nazi-appointed Jewish leader of the ghetto.

Called the "King of the Jews" by the ghetto residents, Rumkowski had the unenviable task of maintaining law and order and co-operated with the Germans by providing workers for their factories, what they called "work resorts." He had his image imprinted on ghetto stamps and money, developing a cult of personality not unlike that of Eastern European dictators of the Cold War.

The documentary features interviews with several survivors from Lodz, including Chava Rosenfarb, the Yiddish writer from Toronto, who was 16 at the time war broke out. Many survivors still remember Herszkowicz's songs. In one scene, a group of survivors now living in Montreal sing his songs around a table.

Throughout the documentary, these songs are beautifully presented on stage by Brave Old World. The group owes much to ethnomusicologist Gila Flam, daughter of a Lodz survivor, who uncovered many of Herszkowicz's songs for her thesis. The group performs a dozen or so of these "street songs" as part of its repertoire.

The documentary also features more than 300 images from the Lodz Ghetto, including recently discovered colour slides taken by a German accountant.

Kaufman, the Toronto-based documentary's producer, director and writer, is a former filmmaker for CBC's The Journal and The Fifth Estate and has also produced films for Bravo and PBS.

He started working on Song of the Lodz Ghetto three years ago when he filmed Brave Old World performing the music of the Lodz Ghetto at the Isabel Bader Theatre in Toronto.

Song of the Lodz Ghetto is a moving film that takes a unique approach to the Holocaust. At two hours, 15 minutes, it might be just a little too long, though. It makes its world première as part of the Ashkenaz Festival at 7 p.m. on Sept. 2 at the Sheppard Grande on Yonge Street.

South Pacific stays true to its 1940s roots

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Conductor, pianist and songwriter Lawrence Goldberg says the current production of the musical South Pacific, now playing at the Four Seasons Centre for the Performing Arts, is truer to the original theatrical production than the 1958 movie.

"This is a beautiful production of a classic show that is often not done very well," Goldberg, the musical conductor of the current tour of the Rodgers and Hammerstein musical, says.

"They have gone back to really treating it with the truth and reality of the time, when we were in a war that we didn't know if we were going to win, and the stakes were really high and the issue of racism was really ready to boil over in America.

"Unfortunately, the movie with Mitzi Gaynor didn't really treat those issues with a sense of reality," Goldberg says. "It is a very stylized performance, and I think that's where the show gets its corny reputation. [The show's director] has stripped that away and brought us back to the reality of the situation… the danger and the tension between the races and the mores of people who are brought up to be fearful of other people."

South Pacific, based on James Michener's Pulitzer Prize-winning book Tales of the South Pacific, is set in an island paradise during World War II, where two parallel love stories bloom amid the trappings of war, but then are threatened by the dangers of prejudice.

The show is directed by Bartlett Sher, and features a cast of 34, including Welsh-born, Toronto-based Jason Howard in the starring role of Emile de Becque. Carmen Cusack plays Nellie Forbush and Anderson Davis is Lt. Cable.

Lawrence Goldberg

This production revives the original 1949 orchestrations by Robert Russell Bennett. Goldberg says that instead of a keyboard, there are a harp and strings making the sound more orchestral than a pit band would. South Pacific's score includes the classic songs Some Enchanted Evening, There Is Nothin' Like a Dame and I'm Gonna Wash That Man Right Outa My Hair.

Rodgers and Hammerstein, who were Jewish, never wrote overtly on Jewish themes, Goldberg says. "But theatre music in general was hugely influenced by the Jewish milieu. Broadway show tunes were practically invented by Jews. Music has always been a large part of Jewish life and that all came together in vaudeville, and that lead to the more legitimate Broadway stage."

Goldberg was raised in a traditional Conservative home and was attracted to the musical aspects of the religion from a young age, although later in life he drifted away from religious practices. He says he has a strong cultural identification and the musical aspects of the religion influence him strongly.

Goldberg oversees the entire musical department of South Pacific when it's on the road. "I train and conduct the local orchestra in each city," says Goldberg.

"It is one of the biggest challenges of the job. We travel with three musicians, and we pick up 22 locals everywhere we go. I've got 4-1/2 hours of rehearsal with the orchestra the morning that we open and that is the first time they meet me.

"The other part of my job entails overseeing the music of the entire show. I take notes on the actors' performances musically, I teach new actors coming into the show the musical parts of their performance. When I am conducting I am leading the singers through their performance as well as the orchestra."

Goldberg tours with South Pacific until February 2011, then opens a new musical called Minsky's, written by Toronto's Bob Martin. The two worked together on The Drowsy Chaperone on Broadway. Goldberg was the associate conductor.

Goldberg's other Broadway credits include Thoroughly Modern Millie, The Phantom of the Opera and Carousel. His national tours include The Producers, Les Misérables, Sunset Boulevard and Cats (he met his wife, the actress Alice Lynn, on a tour of Cats in 1990). His tours also include Boston Pops concert versions of Carousel, A Little Night Music and A Richard Rodgers Celebration. As a composer/lyricist, he wrote several musicals, including Big Bad Wolf and The Endangered Forest. His song Seize the Day was recorded by Petula Clark. A passion for television and movies

Often, readers submit letters asking him about celebrities, so he would answer their questions. However, many times something triggers his interest and sends him on a journey to find the answer. In Totally Tracked Down, moments like these are recreated.

In one scene, he is at a synagogue and sees several women wearing big, flowered hats. It reminded him of Mayim Bialik's character from the TV show Blossom, who also wore flowered hats, and so he got the idea to track her down.

While publishing his column, Kaplan entered the world of television, becoming producer of the globally syndicated show Style by Jury. He produced a total of 70 episodes.

He is also known for drawing caricatures of celebrities and names Julia Roberts, Quentin Tarantino, Mike Myers, and Woody Allen as people who have hung his caricatures in their homes or offices.

At the heart of Totally Tracked Down is Kaplan's passion for television and movies, which he said has always been a part of him, and it comes through on the show.

"I don't think that's something that can be trained," he said. "All my friends and family say, 'This is so Marshall.'"

Totally Tracked Down premières on Sept. 2 on TVtropolis. There will be two back-to-back episodes starting at 7 p.m., and it will run one episode weekly at 7:30 p.m. on Thursdays. Visit Kaplan's Facebook page at http://bit.ly/blns2q to see highlights from the show and to follow his adventures.

Israeli feature film Lebanon is visceral and powerful

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In recent years, Israeli filmmakers have begun to grapple with one of Israel's most controversial and debated wars, the 1982 invasion of Lebanon.

A war of choice rather than necessity, it engendered much soul searching and sowed deep divisions within Israeli society.

The first major Israeli feature film on the war, Beaufort, was followed by Waltz with Bashir. Now comes Lebanon, which opened in Toronto last week.

Directed by Samuel Maoz, a veteran of that divisive war, Lebanon is visceral and powerful and, surprisingly, apolitical.

Moaz doesn't care why the war broke out. Nor is he interested in its outcome. Rather than delving into its causes and reflecting on its effects, he focuses on four Israeli tankists – Herzl (Oshri Cohen), Yigal (Michael Moshonov), Assi (Itay Tiran) and Shmulik (Yoav Donat) – who have been thrust into the uncertainty of battle by forces beyond their comprehension.

These tankists, having been assigned to clear an area of hostile Palestinian fighters on the first day of the war, are mainly concerned with personal survival rather than heroism.

As they lurch forward past a field planted with sunflowers, they view the scarred and smoky battlefield through a gunsight, catching glimpses of terrible realities.

The sight of a half-naked Lebanese woman frantically looking for her son amid the ruins of a village is awful enough to drive them crazy and perhaps to the brink of despair.

As the hours pass, the sweaty, grime-covered tankists fight fatigue, heat and a buildup of condensed water in the hull and try to cope with mutual quarrels and navigational problems.

With tensions rising, the tankists receive several unexpected visitors: the corpse of an Israeli soldier who's eventually airlifted away by a helicopter, a Syrian prisoner of war, and a brutal Christian Phalange officer who would rather butcher the hapless Syrian than imprison him.

The atmosphere Maoz skillfully conveys is real and vivid. War is indeed hell.

Lebanon is a snapshot of ordinary soldiers under great and inhumane stress. It may even be described as an anti-war film. Whatever it is or is not, Lebanon is a tribute to Israeli cinema.

Anecdotes of the postwar German predicament

Contemporary Berlin is nicely summed up in an impending real estate deal, centred on the iconic Tacheles building in one of the city's historic Jewish neighbourhoods.

Though its Yiddish name suggests a substantial Jewish lineage, the building was associated with major tenants before World War II, including the General Electric Company, that had little to do with the history that destroyed Berlin's Jews.

When Berlin was a divided city, the Tacheles building fell into disrepair, but was taken over by a generation of alternative artists for studio, performance and gathering space.

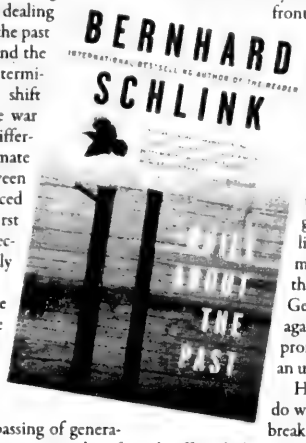
By Norman Ravvin
Special to The CJN

In this way, the shadow of Nazi Berlin — during the war the Third Reich used the building to hold French prisoners — hangs over a structure that is more directly evocative of the kulturkampf that divided Germany in the postwar era: the student and art culture of east Berlin with its leftist ideals versus the mainstream powers based in Bonn, which, for the 1960s generation, represented amnesia and suppression of wartime guilt.

Bernhard Schlink's recent collection of personal essays, Guilt About the Past, is built around ironic anecdotes of the postwar German predicament.

Born in 1944, Schlink's biography is evocative of the postwar divide between his parents' generation and his own over the choices of remembering and forgetting, condemning and forgiving.

A lawyer by training, Schlink is interested in the role of the legal system during the war and after in dealing with the burden of "the past of the Third Reich and the Holocaust." This terminology is a notable shift in writing about the war in that it defines a difference, though an intimate relationship, between those who experienced the war under the first as opposed to the second more familiarly used term.



Schlink is evocative and sensitive about the rights of the victims, but he is also intensely interested in the experiences of Germans and the shifting relationship between Germans and Jews. He writes at some length about the importance of the passing of generations and the impact this has on our experience today of the past. In an examination of the notion of "collective guilt," he acknowledges that "the children of perpetrators, inciters and accessories to the crimes and, to a lesser extent, children of parents who, despite being able to, failed to offer any resistance or opposition, often experience feelings of guilt.

"Moreover, they experience the challenge of confronting their parents about their guilt and either coming to terms with it or withdrawing."

The "past," in the back half of Schlink's book, is more directly connected with a late-1960s shift in Germany, which brought about a dynamic student movement, terrorist activities led by the Baader-Meinhof gang, and a new willingness to link contemporary political and moral questions to the years of the Third Reich. This is a strictly German story — that of children against parents and students against professors — and Schlink tells it in an uncommonly even tone.

His most salient argument has to do with his sense that the incomplete break with the crimes of the Third Reich affected the generational and political struggles of the 1970s in ways that the protagonists from those years were not necessarily aware of themselves.

In a long set piece regarding the effort to reject a candidate for a legal professorship based on his youthful leftist activities, Schlink conveys how important such unfinished business remained into the 1990s.

In the final essay in his book, entitled Stories about the Past, he applies these concerns to a discussion of recent fiction and film. He looks at his own fictional success, The Reader, Jonathan Littell's blockbuster book, The Kindly Ones and such internationally acclaimed films as Life is Beautiful and The Lives of Others. In this discussion he is trenchant and provocative.

He asks whether authors ought to be "allowed to craft fairy tales, satires or comedies about anything at all...Even about the Holocaust?" He recognizes that the urge to "tell a thrilling story can easily tempt one into tolerating someone else's hurt too easily." But, he warns too against what he calls "a precious image of events," one that precludes the atypical or the kind of narrative that challenges accepted ways of understanding the past. Though sections of Guilt About the Past are a touch professorial, freighted with the careful digressions of a detailed legal brief, Schlink's essays provide a thankfully atypical view of the burden left by the years that included "the Third Reich and the Holocaust." A specific German view comes clear, a writerly philosophy is offered and the era's influence on contemporary life comes into focus.

Gospel, cousins and seals in the remote north

By JORDANA DIVON
Special to The CJN

Think you're good at Jewish geography? Sorry. Aaron Lightstone can probably kick your tuches.

When Jaffa Road's resident oud player landed in Igloolik, Nunavut, last month – a place north of the Arctic Circle that's so remote it doesn't even appear on every map – he was expecting to perform with his band at the town's first annual Rocking Walrus music festival.

In addition, he discovered a long lost cousin. And, well… you'd best let him explain.

"Try to imagine," he begins. "We're going into what feels to us like the ends of the earth. I'm pretty sure it's safe to say we played the most remote music festival in North America.

"We get picked up at the airport by the festival MC, Eric. He's showing us around town, and we happened to pass by his house, so he invited us to come in. So we go into his house, and there are some family pictures on the wall. He starts to point them out: 'This is my wife, this is my daughter,' and he points to a kid in a graduation cap and says, 'and that's my wife's son, Adam Lightstone.'"

Lightstone? Not exactly the most common last name. And while he thought it seemed a little uncanny, the Toronto-based musician figured it must be a coincidence. After all, if he had a half-Inuit relative in Nunavut, someone surely would have mentioned that to him at least once in his life. Right?

Maybe not.

Lightstone called his mother later that evening and asked her if she knew of a cousin named Adam. Turns out, she did.

"Oh, yeah," he recalls his mother saying, with a laugh. "That would be Mika's son. She used to be married to your father's cousin, Michael."

Inspired, Lightstone tracked down cousin Adam, now a Queen's University student in Kingston, Ont., and the two have since begun an exchange on the social networking site, Facebook.

"I don't know if he considers himself Inuit or Jewish," Lightstone says. "But his mother is Inuit, and it was weird, not just that she lives in that community, but that she and her husband happened to be so heavily involved in the festival [where] we were playing. We were all kind of flabbergasted."

Mysterious family connections weren't the only "flabbergasting" experience for the five-piece ensemble during their tour of the Canadian north. The members of Jaffa Road embarked on what they considered a life-changing journey when they were invited to a pair of festivals designed to broaden ties between the country's newest province and folks from "The South"– as all dwellers below them are known.

The band joined three other musical acts to play the closing of the 10-day Alianat Festival in Iqualuit, Nunavut's capital, and later travelled to tiny Igloolik, where Lightstone made his family connection.

Singer Aviva Chernick recalls her first impressions of the Canadian Arctic.

"The people are incredibly generous, and very reserved," she says. "They're people of a cold climate, and so they don't waste words – it's very, very, very cold outside, so you don't make long conversation outside. And they were so generous! You just walk into their homes, you don't knock. And if there's food, you take it. You don't make a fuss about asking."

A highlight of their adventure included walking – literally – on the Arctic Ocean. Fox Basin typically remains frozen until the middle of July, so Lightstone, Chernick and the rest of the band took a leisurely stroll on the water.

"In some places, it was a little broken," Lightstone says, "so we were jumping from one ice floe to the next. And then somebody brought a fresh seal for everyone to share. It tastes like pungent sushi. Didn't particularly like it, but was glad I got to taste it."

Cousins, seals, walking on oceans – and country gospel? That was next on the discovery list.

"The music they were listening to in Igloolik was country gospel," Chernick explains. "That's not to say that's what the young people are listening to, but that's what the majority of the stuff was. So just imagine for a moment: Aaron's oud and my blend of eastern European and Middle Eastern tone, following a Johnny Cash cover band in Inuktitut. Kind of bizarre. And amazing!"

Most surprising of all, Chernick says, was the level of appreciation expressed by the crowd.

"I could not be more grateful to be at the first cultural festival in Igloolik," says Chernick. "It was huge. And they thanked us, which was shocking! As if we had taken time out of our schedules to come and bring them music, when really, I don't think they realized how blessed we felt we were."

Oldest player schools young guns at Rogers Cup

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

At 32, American Michael Russell was the oldest player competing at the recent Rogers Cup tennis tournament at Toronto's Rexall Centre. On the surface, one might think he would have been an easy target for the younger athletes in the draw, but as young Canadians Philip Bester and Steven Diez learned, Russell could not be overlooked.

Russell gave 19-year-old Diez a crash course in tennis strategy in his opening qualifying round match. After dropping the first set 6-2 to to the up-and-coming Canadian, Russell exposed Diez's weak forehands by consistently returning shots to the forehand side, crushing Diez 6-3, 6-1 in the final two sets in the humid 35-degree heat that wore out the younger player.

The next day, Russell made quick work of highly touted 22-year-old Philip Bester of Vancouver on another hot and humid day, ripping him apart with guile and hustle 6-2, 6-2.

"I feel good that I can still beat players more than 10 years younger than me," Russell said. Known as "Iron Mike" and "Muscles Russell" by his competitors, Russell is a fitness fanatic who made his younger Canadian opponents look like the seniors on the court.

"I saw what fitness did for Andre Agassi in his last years in tennis, so I know that I would not be competing if not for my daily workouts," said Russell, who was wearing a sleeveless shirt that exposed rippling muscles.

In his final match in the main draw against fellow American Sam Querrey, Russell's persistence and hustle broke Querrey immediately to build on a 3-0 lead and win the first set 6-3.

The 6-6 Querrey, who towers over the 5-8 Russell, finally made his big serve a weapon after the first set, firing aces at will and improving his groundstrokes to eliminate Russell in the final two sets 6-1, 6-4.

"Michael was as tough as I expected. He had some huge serves, ripping the ball from both sides really fast and it took me a while to get going. The last few years, Michael has been playing some of his best tennis. He is an inspiration to a lot of guys, especially if you're 27, maybe not doing well. Michael is the example that you can have your best years in tennis after 30," said Querrey following his victory.

Michael Russell [Vidal Keslassy photo]

Having turned pro in 1998, Russell's tenure has spanned the peak years of Andre Agassi, Pete Sampras and Roger Federer. His name isn't widely known because he struggled with knee injuries and played almost exclusively on the challenger circuit – the minor league of tennis – for most of his pro career.

"In my first six or seven years, I struggled more and did not have the same mental and physical fortitude that I have now. Since I have broken into the top 100 in 2007, I feel better, stronger and have as much desire to compete as I ever had," said Russell.

Russell is currently ranked 82nd in the world and is also the top-ranked Jewish player on the pro circuit. Born in Detroit, Russell learned tennis from his father George, a former University of Michigan tennis star. Like his father, he also excelled in collegiate tennis, winning NCAA rookie of the year honours in 1997 while playing for the University of Miami.

"I was raised, as are most Jewish people, not to forego a university education, I am happy I competed for University of Miami and had a tennis scholarship. I have absolutely no regrets for anything over my career, and hope to still have a few more years left to compete," Russell said. Adding to his stability was marrying his wife, Lily, in 2007 and residing in Houston, Texas.

Russell's 13 years on the pro tennis circuit are longer than most players and even more remarkable given the depth of competition. His highest ranking was 65th in 2007, playing mostly on the major tennis circuit over the last three years. His best result in 2010 was a quarter-final finish in July at the Atlanta Tennis Championships.

HAPPY BIRTHDAY, MR. PRESIDENT

Israeli President Shimon Peres last week celebrated his 87th birthday. A public celebration was held at the Cameri Theater in Tel Aviv. [Israel Sun photo]

BEET DYED HARD BOILED EGGS A YOM TOV TWIST

6 eggs

1 can pickled beets

Place eggs into a saucepan, and cover with water, heat on high until water boils. Cover saucepan with a lid, and turn off the heat. Leave saucepan with eggs inside on stove for 15 mins. This will let you cook hard boiled eggs without having to worry about over cooking them.

Remove pan from stove; run cool water through pan. When eggs have cooled off enough to peel, peel the eggs. Place canned beets into a bowl and add eggs. It is a good idea to use a glass bowl; plastic bowls can stain. Place hard boiled eggs into bowl with beets. Cover bowl, and place in refrigerator for 24-36 hours. Serve whole or sliced as an accompaniment or in a salad.

What is evil?

URBAN WRITER

Evil is an entity, person, place or thing that does not deserve compromise or negotiation. It must be destroyed. Dictionary.Reference.com describes it as "the force in nature that governs and gives rise to wickedness and sin."

Generally people describe evildoers as those who are vicious and participate without conscience, inflicting pain and suffering on others.

But how do we know evil when we see it?

It can be easy. One only has to look at the Kampucheans (Cambodians) who turned their children into vicious murderers. Most countries were appalled by this civil war.

Judaism states that the biblical Amalekites tribe was evil and it would be wiped out – men, women and children. You will hear from fellow Jews that "the Nazis were like the Amalekites and should be obliterated." Few people will argue the point.

Here is the challenge, however. Evil, when not wiped out, eventually assimilates into the mainstream and participates in the good and bad aspects of society. For example, a huge number of Rwandans who maimed and murdered innocents are now living freely in Rwanda interacting with their victims.

What to do? Should we go and assassinate these people where they stand, because they were deemed by the world to be evil? Or were they evil and no longer are? How about their offspring?

There is a school of thought that says the great Rabbi Akiva descended from the Amalekites. This is a very powerful challenge to all good citizens responsible for managing the world. If the evil Amalekites had all been wiped out, Rabbi Akiva, the founder of rabbinic Judaism, would never have been born.

To make my point in a dramatic way: most of us firmly believe that Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad is evil, and if caught, he should be tried for crimes against humanity and executed. But is that the right course of action?

What if he were to change? What if Ahmadinejad was rehabilitated and gave up his evil ways in a convincing manner and worked instead toward coexistence with Israel? Would we not have missed an opportunity?

Further, if evil is not destroyed, is there no evidence that evildoers may become remorseful, or at least give up their dastardly ways?

Read at the website below about a bizarre transformation going on in Poland today, as former skinheads convert to Judaism, some discovering their roots in Judaism. Rabbi Michael Schudrich, the chief rabbi of Poland, says that "before 1989, there was a feeling that it was not safe to say, 'I am a Jew,' but today, there is a growing feeling that Jews are a missing limb in Poland." http://rabbimichaelsamuel.com/2010/02/from-skinhead-to-haredi-jew-a-tale-of-personal-transformation/

This is a difficult issue. In our world in 2010, we are privy to acts of abomination on a daily basis and we are tuned in to the world and its events more than ever. We are therefore a regular jury deciding how world leaders should conduct themselves.

What is evil? How do we define it? What do we do then? What is the evil within us and how do we counter it? Do we?

I address these questions near the High Holidays because we are judges. We all determine injustice and decide on the fight. And in times when the Jewish People need to defend themselves, there is little room or luxury to determine who and what is evil and how to deal with it. We go on intuition.

But now, in a more peaceful time, this question and its challenges need to be dealt with.

The artwork will feature moving wheels and gears, representing the forces of hatred that escalate to create anti-Semitism in the world. The piece will be installed at the Rudolph P. Author recounts rescue of Ethiopian girl

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

When Judie Oron, née Gillman, was a child growing up in Montreal, she learned that other Jews – "people with my genes" – had been massacred in the Holocaust.

"It hit me hard," she said in a recent interview in her Toronto apartment. "I always said, 'When I get to be big, if I have a chance to save a Jew, I will.'"

In February 1992, Oron fulfilled her youthful vow, having travelled from her home in Israel – where she was living at the time – to Ethiopia to find and rescue a 17-year-old girl whose younger sister she had taken into her home as part of her family. "I can't imagine them being more my daughters in any way," she said of the two sisters, whose extended family have also become part of Oron's family.

The older girl had become separated from her family in the aftermath of their escaping Ethiopia for Sudan, and was living as a slave in an Ethiopian village. Once word got out that she might be Jewish – shortly before Oron arrived in the village – her life was in danger.

CUPW calls for end to Gaza blockade

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Canadian Union of Postal Workers (CUPW) is urging Canadians to send postcards to Palestinians on a ship that will attempt to run the blockade of Gaza.

CUPW, which supports boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) efforts to isolate Israel, said Israel's suspension of mail delivery to Gaza "is for us a more global issue. Gaza is for us like a prison for 1.5 million people. They cannot receive day-to-day necessities," CUPW president Denis Lemelin said.

CUPW is backing an effort by a coalition of Canadian organizations, many of them Arab or Muslim, to run the blockade some time in October. An organization called Canadian Boat to Gaza states on its website that it is attempting to raise $300,000 to finance a boat and crew that will bring aid and supporters to Gaza. The website says the ship will also "carry exports out of Gaza. Thus asserting their right to export, trade and provide for themselves rather than be at the mercy of international aid." CUPW hopes to include the postcards on the ship.

Canada Post, meanwhile, issued a statement saying CUPW's "effort is in no way affiliated with or supported by Canada Post. All mail bound for Gaza entrusted to Canada Post will be returned to sender until further notice."

Contacted in Ottawa, a spokesperson for the Israeli Embassy said mail delivery had been suspended after the head of the Palestinian Postal Authority in Gaza was arrested for security reasons.

"In order for mail to be delivered to Gaza, a new person has to be appointed as head of the Palestinian Postal Authority [PPA].

Terror Cell Bust

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress commended the RCMP and CSIS last week for uncovering an alleged terror cell with suspected ties to Al-Qaeda. Hiva Mohammad Alizadeh, 30, and Misbahuddin Ahmed, 26, of Ottawa, and Khurram Syed Sher, 28, of London, Ont., were arrested last week. "CJC has consistently supported the comprehensive anti-terrorism legislation enacted after 9-11, and all Canadians should be relieved that our national police and intelligence services have interdicted an alleged terrorist plot before it could be carried out," said Congress' national vice-president, Barbara Bank.

Pride Parade

VANCOUVER — Ahavat Olam Synagogue and Vancouver Hillel took part in the city's Pride Parade, which annually attracts 600,000 spectators and participants. Spokespeople for the organizations said involvement in the event demonstrates both groups are welcoming and embrace diversity. Hillel students waved Canadian, Israeli and Pride flags while synagogue participants made their presence known with a banner and the sound of a shofar.

Lawyer Honoured

WINNIPEG — Ben-Gurion University last week presented its highest award, the 2010 Negev Award, to lawyer David Matas for work in the field of human rights. Matas was presented with an antiquity from the Iron Age 3,000 years ago found in the Negev Desert. MP Irwin Cotler was guest speaker at the tribute luncheon.

World

'Scum State'

HELSINKI — Frank Johansson, the chair of Amnesty International (AI), Finland, called Israel a "scum state" on his blog on the website of the Finnish tabloid Iltalehti. The Tundra Tabloids blog questioned Johansson's ability to lead a human rights organization while making such public statements. A spokeswoman for Amnesty International's headquarters in London, Susanne Flood, said, "Amnesty would never use an expression like this toward the State of Israel, or any other state," and when asked if AI would discipline Johansson, she said the organization generally does not comment on human resource matters.

JCC Backs Mosque

NEW YORK — The head of the Manhattan Jewish Community Centre is providing advice to Imam Faisal Abdul Raif and his wife, Daisy Khan, in their effort to build an Islamic cultural centre two blocks from Ground Zero. Rabbi Joy Levitt, executive director of the Manhattan JCC, called on Jewish and Christian institutions to accept the couple behind the project, and she confirmed that the JCC had invited the two to speak at the centre in September. Rabbi Levitt said the controversy unleashed "a tremendous amount of misinformation, lack of knowledge about Islam that we need to address."

A Spiritual Jew

NEW YORK — Amare Stoudemire of the New York Knicks reportedly said he is a practising Jew "spiritually and culturally." Stoudemire, who last month visited Israel on a spiritual journey to explore his Jewish roots, also said he is keeping kosher. Stoudemire reportedly decided to visit Israel after learning his mother was Jewish. He said he is continuing his Jewish studies. He said he will celebrate the High Holidays, but will not miss any games for Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. "Playing the games are my livelihood," he said. "But I'm still going to celebrate the holidays."

DNA Links Hitler to Jews, Africans

SEATTLE — Adolf Hitler may have had both Jewish and African roots, DNA testing shows.

Samples taken from some of the German fuhrer's relatives show he was likely descended from some of the "sub-human" races he tried to destroy, according to research by Belgian journalist Jean-Paul Mulders and historian Marc Vermeeren cited in the Flemish-language magazine Knack.

Saliva samples taken from 39 Hitler relatives have genetic fingerprints pointing to possible African and Jewish ancestry.

A chromosome called "Haplogroup E1b1b," or Y-DNA, in the relatives' saliva samples is rare in Germany, as well as western Europe, the newspaper said.

"It is most commonly found in the Berbers of Morocco, in Algeria, Libya and Tunisia, as well as among Ashkenazi and Sephardi Jews," Vermeeren said.

Some believe Hitler's father, Alois, was the illegitimate child of a maid and a 19-year-old Jewish man.

Bell Lightbox is new home for film lovers

Reitman family played important role in Toronto project

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

The Toronto International Film Festival has a permanent home, TIFF Bell Lightbox, thanks to filmmaker Ivan Reitman, his sisters Agi Mandel and Susan Michaels and builder Jack Daniels.

TIFF Bell Lightbox, which will show films year-round, opens Sept. 12 at King and John streets. It took more than three years to build, however, the project dates back 10 years, when the festival was looking for a home.

"The story behind this is inspirational," says Noah Cowan, TIFF Bell Lightbox artistic director. "The Reitman family had a parcel of land at King and John streets in downtown Toronto and felt it was time to do something with it because the city had developed around it.

"Ivan was thankful to his parents, Leslie and Clara, for supporting him in a lifetime of artistic endeavour. Immigrant Jewish families of that age weren't keen on their kids going into the arts, but Ivan's parents were supportive of his desire to be a film director," says Cowan.

"Ivan wanted to recognize his parents' commitment and inspire Toronto's immigrant parents to support their children's visions. Ivan's family and Jack Daniels approached us to see if we'd be interested in working with them, and that was the beginning of a beautiful relationship."

The land for TIFF Bell Lightbox, valued at more than $22 million, is a gift from the

No shortage of courage or strength

From the editor's desk...

On the front page of The CJN this week we feature a heart-rending story by staff reporter Frances Kraft that recounts the true life epic of a Canadian-Israeli woman who, almost 20 years ago, travelled from Jerusalem to Ethiopia to rescue a teenage girl.

The girl had been separated from her family, captured and taken into slavery against her will, after the long march from Ethiopia to Sudan on her desperate journey to freedom in Israel.

Journalist-writer Judie Oron befriended the girl's younger sister in Ethiopia and later in Jerusalem. The younger sister was convinced her older sibling yet lived.

At great personal risk, Oron set out for Ethiopia to find her.

She did – and then brought the teenager to Israel where she lives to this day.

Oron has written a novel called Cry of the Giraffe – ostensibly aimed at young adults – based upon that harrowing rescue.

The rescue, however, is only one of the dramatic episodes in the book.The entire story is fraught with the kind of drama and high-wire tension that truth brings more bracingly than fiction.

Cry of the Giraffe tells many stories. It tells of the way of life of the community of Ethiopian Jews in a homeland that regarded them as outcasts.

It tells of the strength of character and heroism of those same Ethiopian Jews – men and women, young and old – in undertaking to walk across a vast horizon of desert and sand in order to reach the Jewish state.

It tells the story of the multi-layered efforts of the State of Israel to help bring the Ethiopians home.

It is also a story of the ugly, obscene, despicable persecution of young children, in this case into slavery.

And it is still very much a problem in some parts of the world, notably Africa.

There are countless websites, publications, movements and action groups dedicated to stopping child slavery.

It is particularly relevant and poignant to reflect this week upon the story told in Cry of the Giraffe because Sept. 2 marks the 20th anniversary of the coming into force of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC).

The UN General Assembly adopted the convention on Nov. 20, 1989. It came into force less than a year later, on Sept. 2 1990. To date, 194 countries have ratified the document, including Canada and Israel.

An acknowledged Israeli expert in the field of children's rights, Judge Saviona Rotlevy, has written extensively upon the convention itself and its application under the domestic laws of the countries that ratified it.

"The convention is part of public international law," Rotlevy writes. "Compared to children's rights declarations which preceded the convention, [it] obligates states that ratify it. Most nations have signed the convention, which in and of itself strengthens its value.

"The primary value of the convention is the expression it gives to changes in the view of the status of children in society and of their rights. Fundamentally, the convention reflects a transition from a protective view to one of rights: in the convention, the child is considered as a subject possessed of rights, and not as an object," Rotlevy states.

And she then emphasizes that "the rights granted to the child are not granted out of kindness, but as his/her due – by the virtue of being a person and a child."

Four essential principles regarding children are at heart of the Convention: equality (Art. 2); the best interests of the child (Art. 3); the life, survival and development of the child (Art. 6); and allowing the child to participate in decisions affecting his or her life. (Art. 12).

The first rescue operation of the Jews of Ethiopia was undertaken some five years before the United Nations adopted the convention in 1984. It was a massive, secret airlift called Operation Moses that brought more than 8,000 Jews to Israel, a very large number of them children.

Seven years later, in 1991, in a breathtaking two-day round-the-clock effort called Operation Solomon, Israel rescued more than 14,000 Jews, again, a very large number of them children. Even now, Israel is bringing home the last of the Falash Mora from among the Jews of Ethiopia, among them many children.

Today, more than a third of the Jews of Ethiopian background in Israel have actually been born in Israel. The community is more young than old. In so many ways, however, it is still a community in transition that still has to overcome social, cultural and economic roadblocks.

But at least they are all Israelis with a chance at new life, new opportunity in a land whose future is tied to their future. And most especially, the Jewish children from Ethiopia who now live in Israel, like the young girl whom Oron rescued, are all free of the fear of being taken into slavery. They are protected by the CRC and the enveloping arm of the only Jewish state on earth.

"I wanted people to know how brave the Ethiopian community was that they were prepared to take those risks to get to Israel. This is not a community that has a shortage of courage or strength," Oron told The CJN.

Nor does Oron.

Nor does the State of Israel.

The Cry of the Giraffe tells a story of all three.

'Blues Brother' helps UJA campaign kick-off

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's 2011 campaign has raised a total of $15.5 million so far, campaign co-chair Jeff Rosenthal announced at last week's official campaign launch.

The tally was more than he expected: donors had come forward earlier that night to pledge a total of $2.5 million. The event, held Aug. 24 at the Carlu in downtown Toronto, featured actor/comedian Dan Aykroyd.

This year, organizers want to raise an additional $2.5 million beyond what was raised last year, to help young Jews counter negative messages about Israel.

If previous donors can increase their gifts by five per cent, and if those who haven't given to UJA in the past contribute now, that goal can be achieved "easily," said Rosenthal.

Last year, UJA raised $64 million. More than $9 million of that amount was raised by UJA Women's Philanthropy, said women's philanthropy chair Sarena Koschitzky.

New UJA initiatives this year include reducing the Birthright Israel waiting list from its current number, 1,200, to 600; providing Israel advocacy training for high school and university students; enhancing the quality of Jewish education in day and supplementary schools; and increasing funding to strengthen Jewish summer camps and increase the number of children attending, Rosenthal said.

As well, the organization will continue to raise money for vulnerable community members, and to assist Israel and promote Jewish identity and culture, he added.

Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general for Toronto and western Canada, said he is proud to be a partner of UJA Federation. In addition to its initiatives for young Jews, he lauded UJA for its projects that seem unconnected to the Jewish people and Israel, such as its recent launch of a fund to help flood victims in Pakiston. "Such help opens doors unseen and unavailable for us on a regular basis," Gissin said.

Sherry Firestone, co-chair of Campaign 2011 with Rosenthal, announced that Vaughan mayor Linda Jackson and Toronto mayor David Miller proclaimed last week UJA Week in their respective cities.

Addressing the importance of helping young Jews, Firestone said, "A week doesn't go by where we don't hear from those who question Israel as a Jewish State or its right to exist at all.

"Without a proud and strong Jewish identity and a love of Israel, young people simply can't withstand the onslaught of those who seek Israel's demise. There are all too many who simply opt out of Jewish life entirely. We must take swift and bold action now to empower our youth and give them the confidence to lead full and Jewish lives… Our community's future is in their hands."

A successful 2011 campaign "is absolutely vital for the future of our community as well as for the entire Jewish people," said Dahra Granovsky, co-chair of the launch with Randy Weisz.

The evening also featured more than half a dozen young speakers whose lives had been touched by UJA and a performance by Kochav Nolad, a Russian Jewish quartet of young singers from Moscow, in recognition of the 20th anniversary of Operation Exodus, which brought more than 1 million Jews from Russia to Israel.

Aykroyd embraces Jewish connection

At least a few of the 1,200 people attending last week's sold-out UJA campaign launch expressed the same thought before hearing the evening's featured guest: "I didn't know Dan Aykroyd was Jewish!"

An Academy Award nominated and Emmy Award winning actor, comedian, screenwriter and entrepreneur, Aykroyd is well known for his portrayals of Beldar Conehead and Blues Brother Elwood Blues as well as his appearances in movies such as Ghostbusters and Driving Miss Daisy.

The 58-year-old veteran of Saturday Night Live – and prior to that Toronto's Second City – is, in fact, Catholic.

But as a comedian, he owes much to what he calls the "Jewish comedic constitution," the subject of his shtick-filled talk, which paid tribute to his Jewish professional predecessors including Fanny Brice, Mel Brooks, Sid Caesar, Carl Reiner, Wayne and Shuster and Henny Youngman.

In an interview before the event, Aykroyd – a native of Ottawa who grew up in Hull, Que. – spoke of his connection to the Jewish community in more general terms. "It's more like the Jewish community's connection to the world," he said. "Everyone in the world is connected to the Jewish community.

"It's a connection one wants to embrace, and one that should be encouraged. We're all people, and because one faith is based on one belief or another, that's really not too substantial a difference to keep us apart," he said. "In fact, it's a great common ground for us Christians to share, because we share the same heritage, the same scripture and the same concept of God."

In 2006, Aykroyd visited Israel, a trip that came about through his friendship with Gerald Schwartz and Heather Reisman, who had just founded Heseg (achievement) Foundation for Lone Soldiers, to support soldiers without parents or extended family in Israel, the previous year.

Having met some of the soldiers supported by the organization, Aykroyd said he "got a picture of Israel which the world doesn't [see]."

As well, he commented that 800,000 Arabs live in Israel and are proud to be Israeli citizens. Among them, he added, are Druze who serve in the IDF.

"If we can touch the essence of that somewhere, in Gaza and other places, we might have a hope."

On a lighter note, Aykroyd, who in recent years has entered the wine business, said he loved going to taste wines near the Galilee.

Israelis "are making reds that would stand right up to our Niagara wines," he said.

As it turned out, launch co-chair Randy Weisz presented him with a bottle of an Israeli red wine later that evening to thank him for his talk.

See CJ Shmooze, CJN's blog, to read what it was like to interview Dan Aykroyd.

Still hope for his tomorrow

Last Saturday was Gilad Schalit's 24th birthday. He has spent more than one fifth of his life a prisoner of Hamas, somewhere we presume, in his hell in Gaza. It has been five years since he was kidnapped and two of his colleagues killed on June 25, 2006, in a cross-border raid by Hamas terrorists.

Less than one year before Schalit was kidnapped, it must be pointed out, Israel had unilaterally withdrawn every soldier and every civilian from Gaza. Subsequently, the homes, the towns, places of commerce, industry and even of worship were destroyed by the same frenzied hatred that sent Hamas hands across the border to steal one soul and kill others. It was brazen cruelty, hideous and despicable in all its proportions.

That any world leaders of government or non-governmental organizations meet with or have dealings with the men who continue to control Schalit's captivity is to their utter shame and discredit.

Yet many world leaders are appalled over Schalit's situation.

Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper recently expressed his profound sympathy for Schalit and his family. On Saturday, the British Foreign Office issued a statement harshly condemning Hamas. "[Schalit's] detention is unjustifiable and unacceptable. The British government demands his immediate and unconditional release."

But these words – alas, like all the words of all the condemnations these past five years – have fallen on deaf ears. Last month, the International Committee of the Red Cross admitted to The CJN that it had failed completely to penetrate the minds let alone the consciences of the Hamas leaders regarding Schalit.

In an appeal last Saturday directed, ostensibly, to the wives of Israel's members of Knesset, but in truth, of course, to all Israel, Schalit's mother, tearfully cried out for help.

"This will mark 1,525 days and long difficult nights in which I haven't seen my son. Not to see, not to hug, not to hear, not to smell – to live in a big painful emptiness in our home in Mitzpe Hila, without holidays or special days. I ask you humbly – as a mother, sister, wife, human being – help me bring my son home."

The approaching Rosh Hashanah holiday is an especially poignant and appropriate moment for us rededicate our efforts on behalf of Gilad Schalit. In the Haftorah that we read on the second day of the holiday, the prophet Jeremiah bids us to hold on to hope.

"There is hope for your future,.God said. For the sons will return to where they belong" (our emphasis).

The passage marks a spot in our hearts of prayer and possibility that we must reserve for Gilad – and indeed, for all the Israelis still missing in action.

We must not forget Gilad. There is yet hope for his future, which is for us also to help secure.

25 years ago in The CJN

The Israeli cabinet approved a technical change in the value of the shekel by removing the last three zeroes from its face value. The exchange rate had previously been 1,500 shekels to the U.S. dollar, making calculating the cost of goods – some of which, like cars, had seven-digit price tags – more complicated because of high inflation.

Freeing Gilad Schalit (1)

I have some suggestions that might help free Gilad Schalit: (1) a total ban on Red Cross activity in Gaza unless and until Schalit is released without any pre-conditions or any allowance for their murderers in Israeli jails; (2) a statement by U.S. President Barack Obama that the billions in aid that is pouring into Gaza will be stopped unless Schalit is released and Hamas begins normalizing its relations and recognizes Israel's rights and (3) that prisoners in Israeli jails will not have access to the Red Cross unless and until Schalit is released ("Red Cross admits Schalit failure," Aug. 5).

I know that humanitarian-focused people will say that these measures are punitive, but I would argue that the concentration-camp detention of Schalit warrants this type of response. It will remind Hamas and the world of the fact that Hamas is a terror organization whose behaviour goes against all norms. The treatment of Hamas should be commensurate with how it treats others. The release of Schalit could become a potential precursor to a new beginning for Gazans, should Hamas make some real ideological changes to its belief system at the same time that it is forced to end Schalit's illegal and immoral incarceration.

Freeing Gilad Schalit (2)

I would like to share with you a simple and straightforward idea that could guarantee the release of Gilad Schalit from the hands of Hamas in 48 hours ("Red Cross admits Schalit failure," Aug. 5). Israel should put Hamas on notice that unless they release Schalit immediately, the daily flow of thousands of tons of daily supplies provided by Israel to Gaza will cease in 48 hours. This plan will not win any popularity contests and demands a lot of courage from Israeli leaders. But without courage and conviction, what actually makes them leaders? The Torah cautions that those who are kind to the cruel will eventually be cruel to the kind. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, be kind to the kind and do what has to be done to free Gilad Schalit.

In his column, Rabbi Dow Marmur is quite right to highlight the cultural and religious differences that are a strain on the Jewish community both in Israel as well as the Diaspora ("'Muslim Jews' and 'Christian Jews,'" Aug. 26). It may be that some of the differences stems from the different historical treatment received by Sephardi and Ashkenazi Jews. But it's far from illuminating, or helpful, to suggest Jews fall into the categories of "Muslim" or "Christian." Leaving aside implied insult to Muslims by saying the "Christian way is a function of modernity" (and Christian modernity of the 1930s and 1940s was not so good for Jews), why can't we just accept Jews as being a nation, some of whom follow Halachah more closely than others?

Surely we don't need to measure ourselves by others' faiths? Judaism is the parent of Christianity and Islam – both religions come out of Jewish roots – and it's unhelpful to multiply divisions in the Jewish community with new distinctions that are based on nothing.

The reality of Jews who believe in the separation of religion and state, civil marriage and religious "pluralism" is very old. What is new is calling them "Christian Jews," as Rabbi Dow Marmur does in his column "'Muslim Jews' and 'Christian Jews,'" based on Bernard Lewis' book Faith and Power, and calling Jews who want to make Halachah the law of the State of Israel "Muslim Jews" (Aug. 26). Under the existing non-separation of religion and state, Israelis are free to conduct their lives as they wish. No one is forced to live according to Halachah, although they are expected to respect those who do. With necessary adjustments for reasonable accommodation, this arrangement should continue. The columnist concludes that in the opposing Christian versus Muslim "scheme of things" he sees himself as a "Christian Jew" and hopes that "so do you." Well, I consider myself a Jewish Jew and sincerely hope that so will all Jewish readers.

I was appalled by Rabbi Dow Marmur's way of categorizing Jews in Israel ("'Muslim Jews' and 'Christian Jews,'" Aug. 26). There are many secular Jews from Muslim states, and one can hardly call Satmar and Lubavitch Chassidim "Muslim." Christian countries today have varying degrees of separation between church and state, perhaps the greatest in secular liberal democracies. But this was hardly a "Christian" concept. It might even be a Jewish one, separating the king from the high priesthood. We already have enough ways to divide Jews. We don't need another one that does nothing but foster prejudice without enlightening us.

5770: Israel's year of diplomatic crises

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

Despite the fact that Israelis and Palestinians are meeting face to face this week for the first time in more than 18 months, the year 5770 was characterized for Israel by ups and downs in its relations with the United States, a virtual stalemate in Middle East peacemaking and growing international alienation.

Last November, after months of intense U.S. pressure, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu declared a temporary freeze on new construction in West Bank settlements — a move designed to create conditions for a renewal of peace talks with the Palestinians. But the freeze was only for 10 months, did not include some 3,000 units already started and did not apply to construction in eastern Jerusalem.

The Palestinians, convinced that President Obama would exert even heavier pressure on Israel on the core issues of dispute — borders, Jerusalem, Palestinian refugees and the nature of a future Palestinian state — without their having to negotiate, highlighted the lacunae and rejected calls to return to the peace table.

As a compromise, special U.S. peace envoy George Mitchell proposed indirect negotiations under U.S. auspices. By early March, both sides had agreed to "proximity talks," with Mitchell shuttling between Jerusalem and Ramallah. U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden travelled to the region to announce the breakthrough, but during his visit an Israeli Interior Ministry planning committee approved plans for 1,600 new housing units in Ramat Shlomo, a Jewish neighborhood in Jerusalem on the east side of the pre-1967 border — what most of the world still considers the West Bank.

The move prompted the Palestinians to retract their agreement to participate in proximity talks and infuriated the Obama administration. U.S. officials blamed Israel for what they saw as a deliberate slight calculated to torpedo their peace efforts.

In an angry 43-minute telephone conversation, U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton reprimanded Netanyahu, insisting that Israel freeze the Ramat Shlomo project and agree to discuss all the core issues in the proximity talks. Netanyahu explained that the planning committee's announcement had taken his government by surprise as much as it had the Americans, made it clear that there would be no building in Ramat Shlomo for at least two years and agreed to put the core issues on the table.

Parallel to the U.S.-led peacemaking endeavour, the Palestinians stepped up unilateral efforts to create a framework for statehood, focusing on law and order, economic viability and institution building. Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Salam Fayyad made no secret of his intention to have "a well-functioning state in just about every facet of activity" by mid-2011, irrespective of whether any peace agreement with Israel had been reached.

After weeks of bickering, the proximity talks finally were launched in early May, after the Palestinians received the go-ahead from the Arab League. Neither side expected to achieve much. It seemed both had agreed primarily to engage to avoid American censure.

With ties strained between Washington and Jerusalem, Obama invited Netanyahu to the White House for a meeting that was to patch up the strains in the relationship and provide a positive image in contrast with an earlier, low-profile meeting in March that included no public component or photo op.

The meeting was delayed several weeks due to Israel's commando raid aboard a Gaza-bound aid flotilla from Turkey on May 31. But when the two leaders finally met on July 6, the two projected a public display of warmth. The meeting resulted in no new pressure on Israel. Rather, the Americans exhorted the Palestinians to move from proximity talks, which were not making headway, to direct negotiations between the parties — the position favoured by Israel.

The meeting also cleared up earlier tensions over Israel's presumed nuclear weapons program. In late May, the United States backed the final communique of a month-long Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty Review Conference calling for a nuclear-free Middle East and calling specifically on Israel to sign the NPT.

In their meeting, Obama assured Netanyahu that despite his long-term vision of a world free of nuclear weapons, the United States would continue to back Israel's policy of nuclear ambiguity, under which Israel does not confirm or deny possession of nuclear weapons or sign the NPT.

Although Israel and the United States were in agreement that Iran must not be allowed to develop nuclear weapons, Israel was skeptical about the international community's will to take significant action to prevent it. In mid-February, the chairman of the U.S. joint chiefs of staff, Adm. Mike Mullen, came to Israel to underline Washington's opposition to a pre-emptive Israeli strike on Iran.

"I worry a great deal about the unintended consequences" of an attack against Iran, Mullen said. The prospect of an Israeli strike, however, significantly diminished following the adoption in early June of new, tougher sanctions against Iran by the U.N. Security Council.

Perhaps the year's most prominent development was a major erosion of Israel's international standing. The downward trend began with the Goldstone report on the Gaza war, released in September 2009, which accused Israel of possible "war crimes" and "crimes against humanity" in its war with Hamas in Gaza in December 2008 and January 2009.

Although the report was widely dismissed as biased and deeply flawed, the damage to Israel's image was devastating, and critics of Israel used the Goldstone report to hammer away at its reputation.

The Israeli military refuted some of the report's central accusations, but the perception that Israel used disproportionate force to quell the rocket fire from Gaza remained embedded in international public opinion.

An early manifestation of new boldness among Israel's European critics came last December, when Swedish Foreign Minister Carl Bildt led an initiative to have the EU recognize East Jerusalem as the capital of a Palestinian state — a move eventually quashed by Israel's European allies, with France, Germany and the Czech Republic playing dominant roles.

Israel suffered another major PR setback when agents believed to be from the Mossad intelligence agency were accused of using forged foreign passports in the January assassination in Dubai of Mahmoud Mabhouh, a senior Hamas official involved in arms smuggling. Several countries expelled Israeli diplomats. Israel has neither confirmed nor denied its involvement in the assassination.

The year's worst PR disaster for Israel came in the May 31 flotilla incident. Nine Turkish citizens were killed when Israel intercepted a ship carrying aid material bound for Hamas-controlled Gaza, which was under Israeli blockade. Though Israel released videos showing its soldiers were attacked when they boarded the ship, a worldwide storm of protest erupted. The anger against Israel resulted in the first-ever Israeli commission of inquiry with an international presence and the easing of Israel's blockade of Gaza.

The main diplomatic casualty of the flotilla affair was Israel's already strained strategic relationship with Turkey. In 2008, the two countries had been close enough for Ankara to mediate between Israel and Syria. But since the war with Hamas in Gaza, Turkey, a key regional power broker with an Islamist government, had been vehemently critical of Israel while ostensibly moving away from the West and edging closer to Iran.

Relations between Israel and Syria, Iran's closest ally, oscillated between hopes for a resumption of peace talks and fears of war. French President Nicolas Sarkozy tried his hand at mediation, hosting both Netanyahu and Syrian President Bashar Assad at a multinational conference last November. But the two never met, and by early April Sarkozy had given up, complaining to Israeli President Shimon Peres about Netanyahu's lack of cooperation.

The Syrians had insisted that Netanyahu first commit to Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights as a basis for negotiations, a demand the Israeli prime minister rejected. Tensions flared in early February, with Assad accusing Israel of leading the region into war, and then again in May, with Netanyahu charging that Iran was trying to drag Israel into war with Syria.

Despite Assad's talk about "strategic" readiness for peace with Israel, the Syrians continued to transfer sophisticated weapons to the Shiite Hezbollah militia in Lebanon. Of particular concern to Israeli military planners was the supply of GPS-guided M-600 missiles, which for the first time gave Hezbollah the capacity to pinpoint specific targets in Israel as far away as Tel Aviv.

Iran also tried to supply Hezbollah by sea. On Nov. 3, 2009, Israeli naval commandos intercepted a cargo of more than 3,000 Iranian-made rockets destined for Hezbollah on the Francop, an Antigua and Barbuda-flagged vessel sailing from the Iranian port of Bandar Abbas.

In the face of the growing threat from the Iranian axis — Iran, Syria, Hezbollah and Hamas — Israel significantly augmented its missile and rocket defenses. In January, the Iron Dome system designed to intercept short-range projectiles passed final tests, and in June Israel launched the Ofek 9 spy satellite, enhancing intelligence gathering over Iran.

A lost joy

We live in the lottery winner of civilizations. Remarkable luxuries are now the birthright of the middle class, and life expectancy has gone up 30 years in the last century.

People in my parents' generation grew up in a different world, with wars, depressions and inferior medical care. These difficulties shaped their lives and left scars. One man I knew, who'd had an impoverished childhood, remained a miser even after achieving exceptional wealth. A survivor I knew, traumatized by his experiences, left caches of food and money around his house. Adversity leaves a bitter imprint, tattooing antique worries into our hearts.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

By contrast, we live in an era of remarkable wealth and tranquility. Every day we must thank God for these remarkable blessings. But there is one blessing our generation has been denied: the joy of triumph. A true triumph is when one has overcome existential challenges.

One woman I knew, who had childhood polio, refused to allow her disability to define her. She lived a life of determination and love and served as inspiration to many people, including myself. She had become the exceptional person she was despite her difficulties, but also because of them. She had passed life's tests.

Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch writes that the word for test, nissah, is related to the word for raising up, nasso. This is because a test is meant to raise one to a higher plane, and there is nothing sweeter than passing life's tests.

Today one can observe this joy at select celebrations. The grandparents speak an accented English and simultaneously have a tear and a twinkle in their eyes. They are graduates of the university of life, with a six-digit diploma tattooed on their arms. They tell you that the bride is named after a sister who perished, and then make a l'chaim to the future of the young couple. This toast is different from any other toast because it has a message of determination that says "damn you, Hitler, we're still here." As you raise your glass, you realize that the smile on the grandfather's face is unique: it's the smile of triumph.

Those of us who have lived privileged lives will never experience that smile. That's how it should be, because no one should ever desire the anguish of tests; indeed, if you asked the smiling grandfather, he'd tell you his deepest wish is for the younger generation to live lives of tranquility.

No, we will never know the joy of triumph. But once in a while, we too can share the grandfather's smile, a smile earned with blood, sweat and tears.

Work together in defence of Israel

A coalition of radical groups recently assembled "to jointly announce a pan-Canadian and Québec Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions (BDS) Conference which will be held in Montréal from October 22 to 24, 2010." Beyond paying as little attention to grammatical injunctions against split infinitives as they do to history and justice, these groups, which include the Canadian Union of Postal Workers (CUPW), the Conseil Central du Montréal Métropolitain – CSN (CCMM-CSN), and Québec solidaire – should be named and shamed as destructive forces. Shortly after the United States resumes peace talks, these dupes will be poisoning the atmosphere essential for making peace.

Gil Troy in Montreal

My first instincts are to ignore these blowhards. I prefer investing time and energy in fostering constructive ties between Muslims and Jews, Palestinians and Israelis, pro-Palestinians and Zionists, leftists and rightists, to foster a calmer environment conducive to peacemaking. Beyond that, I prefer to celebrate Israel and all of that amazing country's achievements, teaching Jews and non-Jews about Zionism's glories, than try to convince hardened ideologues that what they are doing is distracting, destructive, and disgusting – singling out the Jewish state for special opprobrium.

But politics, like nature, abhors a vacuum. If we sit by and watch the spectacle unfold the loudmouth libelers will carry the day. Therefore, let us look at this ill-timed conference as a well-timed opportunity to make the case against the Boycott movement and rally the constructive, pro-peace forces in Canadian civil society ready to stand for a just resolution of the Middle East conflict rather than an unjust verbal lynching of the Jewish state.

The case against "BDS" – Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions – rests on three pillars. First, it is disproportionate. Just as it is wrong for the UN Human Rights Council to single out Israel, it is wrong for unions and activists to designate only one country as so unacceptable as to be treated as toxic. The fact that among 192 imperfect nations in the UN, democratic Israel's sins, whatever they are, remain relatively benign makes the singling out even more mysterious. It can only be explained by the fact that there is a serious, well-financed, systematic campaign by Arab nations to delegitimize Israel, and that these toxins spread thanks to the traditional anti-Semitism that continues to foul so many political environments around the world.

Boycotting or divesting from Israel also commits the bigots' crime of essentialism, of treating all of Israel as so flawed that it is worthy of such harsh punishment. To protest a country's policies is perfectly legitimate, but to reject the legitimacy of only one country is illegitimate. The Jewish state is the only country on perpetual probation, only acceptable to some contingent on its good behavior.

Finally, the BDS movement puts obstacles in the path to peace. The two-state solution requires compromise. It is hard to expect Israel to compromise when its very legitimacy is under assault.

Ironically, all this anti-Israel talk ultimately insults the Palestinians. Obsessively focusing on Israel and never holding Palestinians for account of their violent actions and rejectionism takes Palestinians out of the equation, treating them as pawns not equals. It is a peculiar form of modern condescension, blaming those deemed Westerners for everything gives them agency and marginalizes others.

Tactically, pro-peace Jewish and non-Jewish groups should start planning now to send those messages out in late October. Rather than the usual mix of turf wars and competing agendas, we should work together, using this opportunity to create a coalition of conscience protesting the way Israel is disproportionately targeted and automatically found guilty in world public opinion. And we should explain that instead of demonizing one player in the complex Middle East conflict, the time has come to build bridges, seeking ways to urge the key players to seek peace. Most important of all, the coalition of conscience should seek new alliances, make new friends, using the intense unreason of Israel's enemies as a way to recruit a broad coalition from left to right, from Jewish to non-Jewish, of groups committed to problem-solving not delegitimizing, to constructive compromise not destructive zero-sum postures.

Festivals of fun

It's High Holiday season, and you know what that means: lots of signs up and down Bathurst Street pitching this service or that, this instant shul or that, this low cost ticket price or that. Having been a sociology major before rabbinic school, I love to analyze these signs.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein in Jerusalem

What struck me this year is a simple word that appeared on one of these signs: "fun." The High Holidays can be fun. The next week, the word had been changed to "enjoyable," but that idea of High Holiday fun stuck in my mind.

I always thought of the holy days as meaningful; in fact, downright seriously meaningful. Sometimes inspirational, and if we are lucky, they may even be transformational. At certain times, let's be honest, it can be tedious. At other times, (getting the food on the table after the Yom Kippur shofar, for example), it's stressful. On the first day of Rosh Hashanah, we're slightly excited and anxious; on Kol Nidrei night, hopeful, sorrowful about who is not there and a little worrisome about who possibly won't be there next year.

The child care looks like it's fun, with kids pasting stickers on cups and singing about apples and honey. The junior congregation hanging out outside shmoozing and laughing (and occasionally sneaking a text message on the phones they weren't allowed to take) are definitely having fun.

But what would make services fun for adults? I know at Kolel's Neilah service we bring out drums and dance, but I'm not sure after the 25-hour fast and intensive praying people would call that fun. (Crazy, yes.)

I always thought of High Holiday services as a spiritual marathon, with beginner, intermediate and advanced levels. I'm not sure a marathon is ever fun, but I know it is exhilarating and challenging. It pushes you to your limits. It expects something out of you and it gives you back something, but the reward is intangible. I guess we can't pitch all that on a Bathurst Street sign. So why fun? Why are we pitching fun?

Perhaps we think the unaffiliated, those who shop around for a yom tov shul experience, those who come once or twice a year, those who don't yet belong to a synagogue, those who are in between shuls, those who just got to town, the intermarried couples unsure of their place in the community, the singles, the spiritually searching, those who don't consider themselves regular shul-goers, can't stand the heat? Won't go the distance? So we say to them in a sort of condescending way, "We know you don't know Hebrew, or the tunes, or the prayers, but don't worry, it'll be fun. Meaningful? Oh, sorry, that's the advanced level."

Fun is the operative word of industries trying to sell something. Fun is Canada's Wonderland when you are bored. Fun is going to the beach with your dog and/or kids and splashing in the waves. Fun is telling old and bad Jewish jokes over dinner. Fun is a street fair.

Don't get me wrong, I'm not the Rosh Hashanah Scrooge. I love apples and honey as much as the next guy. And I actually have fun myself, leading services just this once a year, looking out at all the Jews and their friends and families who could be anywhere else on a lovely autumn day, but have chosen to run the marathon with me. I hope they are happy with my services, but I can't promise fun.

Dennis Prager, in his book Happiness Is A Serious Problem, makes a distinction between fun and happiness, suggesting that happiness requires a higher level of maturity. Fun is fleeting, momentary and doesn't last, he writes. Happiness does.

Jews just wanna have fu-u-n? This High Holiday season, may you be happy. May it be meaningful, thoughtful, inspirational and transformational. Fun? Leave that for Sukkot.

The Kirshner File

Israel and Lebanon caught in a spiral of tensions

Four years after the inconclusive war in Lebanon, tensions remain high, with sabre-rattling emanating from the combatants, Israel and Hezbollah.

United Nations Security Council resolution 1701, which formally ended the month-long war and brought a stronger UN peacekeeping force to southern Lebanon, has ushered in a period of stability. But in contravention of the resolution, as UN Secretary General Bai Ki Moon complained recently, Hezbollah maintains "a substantial military capacity and refuses to disarm," while Israel conducts daily overflights of Lebanon, some of which Lebanon has militarily challenged.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Amid these violations, Israel and Hezbollah have issued a litany of threats and counter-threats. Israel has accused Syria of providing Hezbollah with Scud missiles, the Lebanese and Israeli armies have traded blows in a rare border clash and Lebanon has arrested still more of its citizens as Israeli spies.

Not surprisingly, the UN has warned that a new war may break out.

Hezbollah, which triggered the Second Lebanon War with an unprovoked ambush on an Israeli patrol inside Israeli territory and then upped the ante by firing almost 4,000 rockets into Israel, has caused much of the tension along Israel's border with Lebanon.

An Islamic fundamentalist group aligned with Syria and Iran and utterly opposed to Israel's existence, Hezbollah is a formidable enemy. Having apparently recovered from the blows Israel inflicted in the last war, Hezbollah has rebuilt its military infrastructure, acquired more than 40,000 rockets, placed missile launchers in more than 100 villages near Israel and regained control over southern Lebanon despite the presence of thousands of UN troops there.

Hassan Nasrallah

Although Hezbollah's canny leader, Hassan Nasrallah, keeps a low profile out of fear of being assassinated by Israel, he has not hesitated to issue a succession of highly inflammatory anti-Israel verbal blasts.

Having already threatened to strike Ben-Gurion Airport if Israel hits Beirut's airport in any future conflict (as it did in 1968, 1982 and 2006), Nasrallah warned recently that his fighters would attack Israeli ships in the event of an Israeli naval blockade on Lebanon.

Nasrallah's threats are taken seriously in Israel.

During the Second Lebanon War, Hezbollah rocket barrages virtually paralyzed northern Israel, bringing normal life to a standstill as Israeli civilians scurried into bomb shelters, while Hezbollah gunners struck an Israeli navy boat, nearly sinking it.

Hezbollah, which has upgraded its capabilities since then due to Syrian and Iranian assistance, currently possesses rockets that can reach Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, according to Israel's outgoing chief of staff, Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi.

Hezbollah's armoury is such that it has more missiles than most governments in the world today, U.S. Secretary of Defence Robert Gates observed several months ago.

Last November, in what Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu described as a "preventive operation," Israeli commandos boarded a vessel, the Francop, in the Mediterranean Sea, carrying 600 tons of weapons bound from Iran to Hezbollah.

Israeli officials said that the cargo contained a trove of Katyusha rockets, mortars, hand grenades and munitions.

Though the scale of the seizure surpassed Israel's interception of a ship carrying 50 tons of Iranian weapons to Palestinians in the Gaza Strip in 2002, Israel said that the Francop's cargo represented "a drop in the sea" compared with the quantities of Iranian military equipment that have been transferred to Hezbollah since 2006.

Of similar concern to Israel, Syria has reportedly dispatched Scud missiles to Hezbollah. If true, Hezbollah would be in a far better position to bombard Israeli cities in the next war. Syria claims that such shipments are a figment of Israel's imagination, but Damascus' denials have fallen on deaf ears in Israel.

In the face of Hezbollah's rearmament program, its inclusion in the Lebanese cabinet and Nasrallah's threats to bomb Israel's main airport and sink Israeli ships, Israel's defence minister, Ehud Barak, has issued a series of threats aimed at the Lebanese government.

Late last year, Barak declared that Lebanon rather than Hezbollah would be targeted if Hezbollah succeeded in escalating tension on Israel's northern border. "Our target will be the state of Lebanon," he said.

Ehud Barak

Last March, only months after a handful of Katyusha rockets fired by radical Palestinian organizations landed harmlessly in the Galilee, Barak said that Israel would hold the Lebanese government responsible for Hezbollah aggression.

Two months ago, Barak delivered his third warning, saying that if Israel is subjected to rocket attacks, Lebanon would suffer as well. As he put it, "We will see it as legitimate to hit any target that belongs to the Lebanese state, not just to Hezbollah."

Lebanon, whose roads and power stations were bombed by Israel in the 2006 war and whose independence is still dependent on Syria's goodwill, has put up a show of defiance in response to Barak's comments.

Lebanon's prime minister, Saad Hariri, whose father, Rafik, was assassinated by Syrian agents in 2005, has asserted that his government would support Hezbollah in a new war: "We will stand against Israel. We will stand with our own people." Meanwhile, the Lebanese president, Michael Suleiman, has said that he will refrain from calling on Hezbollah to relinquish its weapons.

Last week, a major Lebanese Christian politician, Samir Geagea, urged Hezbollah to fold its forces into the Lebanese army. But Hezbollah rejected the proposal, leaving the volatile issue simmering and unsettled.

As if this issue was not serious enough, the Lebanese army exacerbated tensions on Aug. 3 by opening fire on an Israeli outpost, killing a high-ranking Israeli reserve officer. Lebanon claimed that Israeli forces had strayed into its sovereign territory. By way of reaction, Israel bombed a Lebanese army position, killing two soldiers and a journalist. Israel believes that the incident was initiated by Lebanese Shiite officers under the sway of Hezbollah.

Blaming Lebanon for the lethal exchange, the worst such skirmish in four years, the UN and the United States said that Israeli forces had not entered Lebanon.

A few days later, an Israeli navy vessel fired on a Lebanese fishing boat. Israel claimed that the ship had sailed into a "restricted zone" and failed to heed warnings to leave the area.

On Aug. 9, the U.S. Congress suspended a $100-million military assistance package to Lebanon, citing the Aug. 3 incident. After the Lebanese president vowed to acquire arms from "friendly countries," Iran, eager to deepen its clout in Beirut, offered to help Lebanon.

Two weeks ago, the UN reported that Israeli and Lebanese officers had met in an attempt to defuse tensions. The UN hopes that Israel's international boundary with Lebanon, known as the Blue Line, can be more clearly demarcated. Apart from this gnawing problem, Israel and Lebanon have yet to defuse two territorial disputes – the final status of the divided town of Ghajar, which straddles the border, and the ultimate fate of Shaaba Farms, which is also claimed by Syria. In recent weeks, further tension has flared over the ownership of natural gas fields in the Mediterranean Sea.

Even if these problems are resolved, Lebanon is still reeling from stunning disclosures that dozens of Lebanese citizens, including army officers and politicians, were recruited by Israel as spies prior to 2006. Tellingly, Israel has not commented on the arrests.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

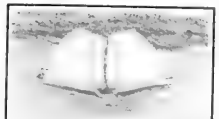
A broader perspective

By RABBI HOWARD MORRISON

This past summer, in preparation for the High Holidays, I read The Seven Questions You're Asked in Heaven, by Ron Wolfson. The first four questions originate from a passage in the Talmud:

1. Did you conduct your business transactions faithfully?
2. Did you set fixed times for Torah study?
3. Did you engage in procreation?
4. Did you wait in hope for the messianic salvation?



Rabbinic Reflections

Each question can be understood on a wider level. I would like to offer a contemporary application of these questions in the context of my assuming the presidency of the Toronto Board of Rabbis (TBR).

The first question, "Did you conduct your business transactions faithfully?" transcends business dealings. When someone is trusted in business, it is because that person is known for honesty, trust and integrity. The faithful person is one who engages in sincere re-lationships with the people who surround him or her. The TBR is all about respect and relationship-building with rabbis and fellow Jews, regardless of where they stand along the various streams of Jewish life. We are united because of the diversity brought to our table by Orthodox, Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist rabbis, all of whom demonstrate Ahavat HaShem, Ahavat Torah and Ahavat Yisrael – the love of God, Torah and Israel.

The second question, "Did you set fixed times for Torah Study?' is a fundamental axiom of the TBR. We intend to engage the Jewish community at large and its lay leadership with a wide array of Jewish study programs. Specifically, our concerns for enriching Jewish education among our youth represent a high priority for us as a group. We hope to work as active participants, partners and consultants with existing organizations to improve the quality and availability of day school and supplementary Jewish education. We also hope to help develop alternative models for those who receive no Jewish education at all, as part of a vehicle for encouraging the unaffiliated to become affiliated with Jewish community life.

The third question, "Did you engage in procreation?' is not only about having and raising Jewish children. The question would have us become more sensitive to the changing Jewish family: single-parent families, families struggling with fertility, families who adopt, becoming a big brother or sister to an only child and other scenarios in the ever-changing definition of family. Being the only rabbinic organization that represents the entire spectrum of the Jewish community, the TBR looks to be a spiritual, sensitive and sensible voice for dealing with contemporary demographic changes.

The fourth question, "Did you wait in hope for the messianic salvation?" is about positive thinking and an optimistic outlook for future generations. Part of our work is to help make sure that the legacy left by the present generation will be received and transmitted to the next generation. Structures that are working to ensure Jewish identity must continue to function, and structures that are not working must be studied, assessed and modified if necessary.

The ultimate goal of the TBR, primarily a volunteer rabbinic organization, is to partner, consult and work with the existing infrastructure of the Jewish community. Our region of the Jewish world is envied by many other sectors of the globe. The task for all of us is to never sit idly by, but to always be involved in the mandate – "L'hagdil Torah u'l'haadira.... To strengthen Torah and to glorify it."

Wishing the entire community – L'Shanah Tovah Tikateivu V'Teichateimu – May we be inscribed and sealed for a sweet, good, healthy and purposeful new year.

Rabbi Howard Morrison is president of the Toronto Board of Rabbis.

New face to an old foe

As we prepare for Rosh Hashanah and our assessments of the past year, it is important to move beyond the personal. We struggle with the choices within our personal relationships and our professional interactions. We also assess our business lives and partnerships and hope to have a comprehensive personal evaluation in preparation for the High Holidays.

Yet one of the areas we don't often bring into our Rosh Hashanah preparation is that sense of world citizenry that is part of the modern world. It is at these moments that our Jewish world can help us organize and understand the world around us.

MIDRASHIC MOMENTS
BY RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Recently, Iran launched a website that caricatures and denies the events of the Holocaust. While the website is not a surprise, considering the country behind the Internet abomination, it is too lightly dismissed. People casually comment on the "what did you expect" aspect and then proceed to the next news event. Yet Rosh Hashanah reminds us to look closely at our world and not dismiss things lightly. Holocaust denial is a crucial part of Jewish history.

In fact, educating about the Holocaust has become a controversial area of Jewish education. Some scholars argue that Holocaust education has resulted in Holocaust "burnout" and is backfiring. Other scholars argue that Holocaust education is crucial in the upcoming years because of the acceptance of Holocaust denial.

An interesting perspective to bring to the discussion is the U.S. State Department's definition of the eight stages of genocide. After outlining the stages that involve dehumanization all the way through to extermination, the list continues to the last stage of the process. The final stage of a genocide is the denial of the event.

While exploring the approaches to teaching of the Holocaust, perhaps our thinking requires a shift away from teaching about a past historic event that has ended. According to the stages of the event, the genocide process is not over as long as denial is taking place.

In teaching our children and grandchildren about the Holocaust, it should be presented as an ongoing attempt and not the baggage of history. The connection to Rosh Hashanah becomes clear when we consider that part of our honest evaluation must include our passion for fighting ongoing evil.

There is no question that the murderers of the Holocaust have been categorized by Judaism as Amalek. In the Torah, we learn that the ancient nation of Amalek embodies evil for its own sake. We are commanded to fight this evil wherever we see it until the very memory of such a thing is foreign to our children. Bringing the perpetrators of the Holocaust to justice is part of the ongoing war against Amalek. But there is also an ever present spiritual Amalek that the midrash cautions against.

The sages of the midrash teach us that Amalek can be likened to the person who approaches a steaming pot and cools it down. We are driven by our passions, we need things to burn inside of us to prompt us toward action and to ignite the fire within the people around us. The person who deliberately tries to extinguish the passion within us is also categorized as Amalek.

While preparing for Rosh Hashanah, we should ask ourselves if we understand that the events of the last year, culminating in the Iranian Holocaust-denying website, portrays the actions of Amalek. It cannot be seen as just another news event particularly in light of the serious self-reflection that the High Holidays demand. Rosh Hashanah is meant to remind us of our passions, and the passion to teach our children to fight evil should never be jeopardized.

Olive oil to bring countries together

By ALEX GROPPER

A while back I wrote a column on the significance of olive oil for the ancient Mediterranean. The great French historian and Mediterranean expert Fernand Braudel, when asked to define the Mediterranean, did so with one word – olive.

My column was a prelude to a major project that I am currently organizing, with the Royal Ontario Museum and the University of Toronto, on that most important byproduct of the olive – olive oil.

Since I wrote the column, the project has been picking up momentum, thanks primarily to the inspired help of Dimitris Azemopoulos, the consul general of Greece in Toronto. Azemopoulos has had the foresight, energy and goodwill to see that this is a venture that will bring together disparate Mediterranean countries that, under normal circumstances, would not have the desire or ability to co-operate or work peacefully together. But thousands of kilometres away, these countries are taking tentative steps to do so in Toronto.

Past Forward
By Alex Gropper

Azemopoulos organized a wonderful dinner, at which most of the Mediterranean consuls were present as well as some of the senior staff of the ROM. It has been a wonderful launch for the project, which we hope to kick off with an international scholarly conference on olive oil in the Mediterranean.

The conference is being organized by Prof. Domenico Pietropaolo, chair of the department of Italian studies at St. Michael's College at U of T, where the Canadian Institute for Mediterranean Studies, which is the linchpin for the event, is also headquartered.

One of the major reasons that I have involved the Mediterranean consuls and their respective countries in the project is to show that Israel has been an important part of the Mediterranean, both past and present. In fact, the first major industrial olive oil site in the Mediterranean was found in ancient Israel in the seventh century BCE at the site of Tel Miqne, ancient Ekron, located on Israel's coastal plain.

At that time, the mighty Assyrian Empire held sway over the eastern Mediterranean and the kingdom of Judah was part of that empire. (The Assyrians had already destroyed the northern kingdom of Israel and deported its inhabitants, leading to the legend of the Ten Lost Tribes.)

Historians have called the Assyrian Empire the first free trade zone in history. The Assyrians valued the olive oil trade as an important source of income and protected it with strategically located garrisoned forts throughout southern Judah. Long before the Athenians exported their product across the Mediterranean, olive oil containers from Ekron attest to olive oil's economic importance in ancient times.

More recently, olive oil has once again become an important industry in the Mediterranean. Supertankers nowadays not only carry crude oil across Homer's wine-dark sea but also bulk up on olive oil from places such as Crete, Turkey, Tunisia, Morocco and Spain. It is now said that olive oil is becoming the new liquid gold of the region.

As a result, we now have a golden opportunity to bring together the various countries in the Mediterranean to work together in a project that will promote understanding and goodwill. It is no accident that one of the most potent symbols of peace is the olive branch. It's a wonderful irony that countries that can not come together at home are coming together thousands of kilometres away from the Mediterranean by the shores of Lake Ontario in the world's largest multicultural community.

High Holiday humour

High holiday humour? Is this some kind of joke? Actually, yes.

Rosh Hashanah ushers in the most solemn period of the Jewish calendar that culminates 10 days later on Yom Kippur. This is a serious time of introspection and cheshbon nefesh, a spiritual accounting. But Jews being Jews, there's also time for a smile or two. Here are some things to ponder between your introspecting. Or to keep you rolling in the shul aisles.

By now, you should have received your High Holiday ticket renewal form. Well, it seems several forward-thinking congregations are finding it a competitive edge to allow you to specify your seat location. Here are excerpts from one form I came across.

Jewish & Digital
By Mark Mietkiewicz

I want a seat located (indicate order of priority):

___ On the aisle

___ Near the pulpit

___ In Aruba [http://bit.ly/hhh01]

On the first night of Rosh Hashanah, there is a tradition to eat foods whose Hebrew names have dual meanings and are omens of an auspicious year to come. We eat apples and honey so "that You renew us for a good and sweet year," and the head of a fish or sheep so "that we be as the head and not as the tail." [http://bit.ly/hhh02]

Apples and honey and sheep's heads are fine, if you like that sort of thing. But here's one suggestion for an updating of the custom: cut a raisin in two equal pieces and place it along with a piece of iceberg lettuce in a stalk of celery. While eating this, you should say, "Our Father in Heaven, lettuce half a raisin celery." [http://bit.ly/hhh03]

Q. Why didn't the computerized shofar work on Rosh Hashanah?

A. The rabbi didn't buy enough RAM. [http://bit.ly/hhh28]

Speaking of technology and the holidays, a big baseball fan said to his rabbi before Yom Kippur. "Rabbi, I have a dilemma. The Sox are playing their big game on Yom Kippur. What do I do?" The rabbi replies, "Well, what do you think they invented VCRs for?" And the congregant replies, "Rabbi, that's a great idea! But... I didn't know Yom Kippur services were on cable!" [http://bit.ly/hhh06]

In a heated moment, we may let slip some words that would have been best left unsaid. That was true during the last presidential election when things occasionally got out of hand. In this video, the candidates try to get into the Rosh Hashanah forgiveness spirit. [http://bit.ly/hhh11]

Life is short. And so is this column. In order to maximize the mirth and to keep you from saying, "I heard it already!," I present five classic High Holiday punch lines. To read the entire jokes, visit the websites.

(1) "Please," says the [synagogue] president with tears in his eyes, "Shoot me first!" [http://bit.ly/hhh16]

(2) Seeing this, the chazzan nudges the rabbi and whispers, "So look who thinks he's nothing?" [http://bit.ly/hhh17]

(3) "$4 for the tallit, and $20 to get all the knots out." [http://bit.ly/hhh18]

(4) The gabbai ran over and said, "Not on you, on the Torah, on the Torah!" [http://bit.ly/hhh21]

(5) "Shush," the parrot says. "Think of the odds we'll get on Yom Kippur." [http://bit.ly/hhh22]

Finally, here is Yaakov (Dry Bones) Kirschen's take on Yom Kippur, Israel and world politics: On the Day of Atonement we say, "We have sinned. We have sinned." The rest of the year we have the UN... to tell us that. [http://bit.ly/hhh33]

Tuition fees rise across the board

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

For the upcoming school year, families at Toronto's Jewish day schools will pay an average of 5.4 per cent more for their children's tuition than they did last year.

It could be a sign of economic recovery that none of the schools that spoke to The CJN by deadline are offering the price freeze many of them did over the past few years, but it means more money out of all of the families' pockets.

The July rate of inflation according to TD Canada Trust was 1.8 per cent on an annual basis, up from just under one per cent at the same time last year. But only one program at one of the schools has raised its tuition fees by less than the rate of inflation.

At Toronto Heschel School's junior kindergarten program, full-day fees are increasing by only 0.9 per cent, from $10,800 to $10,900; and half-day fees are going up by 1.7 per cent, from $5,800 to $5,900.

However, grades 1 to 3 at Heschel will cost parents $15,300, compared to last year's $14,600, a 4.8 per cent increase. Parents of students in grades 4 and 5 will see the biggest increase at this school, from $14,800 to $15,600, a 5.4 per cent increase.

Grades 6 to 8 will go from $15,100 to $15,900, a 5.3 per cent increase.

Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School has the smallest overall increase, with tuition for all years going from $13,850 to $14, 250, a 2.9 per cent increase.

The largest increase is 12 per cent at Netivot HaTorah Day School's morning nursery class where fees go from $3,125 to $3,500, although the increases at the school vary quite a bit, depending on the child's age. Extended Nursery is going from $5,633 to $6080, a 7.9 per cent increase. Full-day nursery goes from $8,140 to $8,665, a 6.5 per cent increase. Senior kindergarten classes have a three per cent increase, with morning going from $5,710 to 5,880, and full day from $10,850 to $11,180.

Grades 1 to 6 fees rise from $12,190 to $12,560, also a three per cent increase, and grades 7 and 8 go from $12,390 to $12,860, a 3.8 per cent increase.

Most increases greater than inflation rate

Netivot HaTorah has 560 students registered as of mid-August, three fewer than last year, although Ron Saban, business manager for the school, said this year's number will likely go up, since students often show up on the first day of school before they register.

Associated Hebrew Schools' fee increases also vary by grade, but most hover around five per cent. Full-day nursery fees are going up by five per cent, from $10,950 to $11,500, while half-day nursery goes up 5.4 per cent, from $5,550 to $5,850. Full-day senior kindergarten goes from $11,200 to $11,775, a 5.1 per cent increase, and the half-day program goes from $5,725 to $6,025, a 5.2 per cent increase.

Grades 1 to 6 increase from $11,950 to $12,425, up by 4 per cent, and grades 7 and 8 are up by 5.9 per cent, from $12,200 to $12,925.

Leo Baeck Day School tuition is up 4.8 per cent for all ages, from $11,550 to $12,100, and enrolment is up 3.2 per cent as of mid-August, from 839 students last year to 866 students this year.

"We've managed through a difficult economic time to actually continue to grow our school, passing the 850 mark for the first time in a long time since the economic difficulties began," said Eric Petersiel, head of the school.

But he said he credits the new baccalaureate program for the increase more than the tuition fees.

Robbins Hebrew Academy, formerly United Synagogue Day School, raised its nursery school fees by five per cent, from $5,000 to $5,250. The half-day junior kindergarten goes from $6,000 to $6,400, up 6.7 per cent. Full-day junior and senior kindergarten classes go up 7.6 per cent, from $11,900 to $12,800. Grades 1 to 5 are going up 8.1 per cent, from $12,900 to $13,950, and grades 6 to 8 are increasing by eight per cent, from $13,100 to $14,150.

Rabbi Daniel Gordis and Peter Beinart

Are North American Jews feeling harmed by the State of Israel, rather than seeing her as our second home? And is Zionism antithetical to the next generation or still a possibility?

Rabbi Daniel Gordis is Senior Vice President of the Shalem Center in Jerusalem and the author of several popular books on current events in Israel. Peter Beinart's article, "The Failure of the American Jewish Establishment" in the New York Review of Books, set off a major debate among Jews.

Tuition fees are on the rise at most Jewish day schools in the Toronto area this year.

UJA Federation provides subsidies for families in need

The school had 688 students last year, but as of mid-August, had only 616 registered, a 10.5 per cent decrease.

Parents of secondary school students at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto will pay tuition fees of $20,100, 6.3 per cent more than last year's $18,900. The school had 1,450 students last year, but won't know this year's final numbers until Sept. 30.

Bnei Akiva Schools will have an increase of 6.1 per cent, at $19,900 from last year's $18,750. They are seeing a 2.1 per cent decrease in the number of students, going from 237 students to 232.

By way of comparison, fees at Branksome Hall girls' school, a non-Jewish private school, are going up 3.8 per cent for junior kindergarten to Grade 10, from $24,530 to $25,450. Fees for grades 11 and 12 will be $27,450 for the upcoming year.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto provides subsidies for families who can't afford the tuition fees. About $10 million is given out each year, said Howard English, vice-president of communications for the federation.

"That's unprecedented in North America," English said, adding that families who would like to receive a subsidy should directly contact their school's tuition subsidy committee.

The largest challenge to keeping costs down is teachers' salaries, he said, but that isn't to say teachers shouldn't be paid well for their work.

"If you want quality teachers, then salaries have to keep pace," he said.

Shuls, agencies offer services for Israelis

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

Israelis in Canada during the High Holidays should be able to find themselves with plenty of options to celebrate and pray.

Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) of Toronto works with many Toronto synagogues helping newcomers figure out which synagogue would be best for their needs, and often offers free tickets to High Holiday services.

JIAS also matches the newcomers with established families to share the holiday with them, for example, through having Rosh Hashanah dinner together.

"If they have a synagogue in mind, we'll try to stick to that particular synagogue," said Lia Kisel, an intake and settlement worker for JIAS Toronto, adding that JIAS' connections to shuls mean it is very often successful at getting free tickets for newcomers.

Beth Chabad Israeli Community has a High Holiday service directed specifically at Hebrew speakers.

"Other shuls have members-only access to the shul, but we don't have that," said Mira Zomer, administrative assistant for Beth Chabad Israeli Community. "It's an open door."

The services are at 770 Chabad Gate, and the Israeli minyan takes place downstairs. Tickets are $100 for Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur services for non-members. The Chabad centre holds somewhere between 200 and 300 people.

Plenty of options to celebrate and pray

To celebrate the New Year, Jew Meet Jew is hosting a Rosh Hashanah party at Time Nightclub, at 81 Peter St. in downtown Toronto, on Sept. 12.

The goal is to help integrate Israelis into the Canadian Jewish community, said Adi Ovadya Hazanov. With events like this one, "more people will meet and more people will have fun." For more information, call 416-294-4666.

Additionally, Jewish Information Services provides a list of High Holiday services in the Toronto area for non-members of synagogues. Visit http://bit.ly/cKB188 to view the list, which includes the language of the service and ticket prices.

Pearl Grundland, executive director for Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, said the shul does not have Israeli-specific services, but it offers Hebrew services.

While there is no set standard rate for Israeli visitors, she said she would welcome a conversation with any Israeli interested in joining the congregation for the High Holidays.

"We have many Israeli members, so they'll find friends here," she said.

The Reform Solel Congregation of Mississauga has services that are about 50 per cent English, 50 per cent Hebrew. Arliene Botnick, director of education, said the synagogue does not have any specific program for visiting Israelis but would be open to speaking with anybody interested in attending the services.

Representatives from two of the largest Orthodox synagogues, Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue of Toronto and Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, said the shul does not have any programs specifically for Israelis, but services are mostly in Hebrew.

Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto

A Great School

The President, Board of Directors and Board of Governors of Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto join the community in mourning the loss of

Wilfred Posluns ז"ל

Generous Benefactor, Member of Associated's Board of Governors and Community Leader

There are few individuals who have had as much impact on the Jewish community in Toronto as Wilfred Posluns ז"ל. His decades of involvement included the leadership of a number of key organizations including Jewish Federation, Baycrest, and Mount Sinai Hospital. Numerous other organizations including Associated were the benefactors of his philanthropic support.

Mr. Posluns had great concern for the children of the community and in particular for their Jewish education. His support of Associated led to the re-building of our campus on Neptune Drive. We were honoured to have the new building bear the family name and the Louis and Leah Posluns Education Centre opened its doors in 1998. Mr. Posluns took tremendous pride in the children being educated there. The formidable success of the campus and its increasing enrollment are a fitting legacy to Mr. Posluns' generosity.

We extend our sincere condolences to his wife Joyce and to his children David, Wendy and Lynn, all of whom are supporters of Associated. David recently joined his father as a member of our Board of Governors and has been an active lay leader for many years.

Libeskind sculpture will memorialize doomed ship

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

World-renowned architect Daniel Libeskind is designing a sculpture memorializing Canada's 1939 refusal of entry to the M.S. St. Louis.

The boat, which carried some 900 Jewish refugees, epitomized the "none is too many" anti-Jewish Canadian immigration policy of the era.

Libeskind won a contest held by Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) earlier this year in which proposals from numerous "accomplished and acclaimed" designers were judged and evaluated by a "committee of artists, Jewish community members and Holocaust survivors," Congress CEO Bernie Farber told The CJN.

Titled the Wheel of Conscience, Libeskind's creation will feature moving wheels and gears representing aspects of racism and hatred that lead to anti-Semitism.

Once completed, the Wheel of Conscience will be housed in the Rudolph P. Bratty Permanent Exhibition at Pier 21, Canada's Immigration Museum, in Halifax. It's scheduled to be unveiled at the museum either late this year or sometime in early 2011.

In a statement, Libeskind said he was "thrilled" to create this new work of art.

"The composition as a whole is inspired by the desperate plight of the Jewish refugees and their tragic destiny on the ship M.S. St. Louis. This work of memory will express the importance of eradicating the evils of hatred, racism, xenophobia and anti-Semitism," he said.

Congress said the monument is the centrepiece of its ongoing national project to educate Canadians, "especially youth, about the St. Louis and its impact on Canada's society and immigration history."

Funding for the project was provided by Citizenship and Immigration Canada's Community Historical Recognition Program (CHRP), which last year granted Congress $500,000 "to initiate the project," Farber said.

He noted that Libeskind's design beat out many other "worthy" submissions based not only on its esthetic merit, but also because of Libeskind's ties to Canada – his wife, Nina Lewis-Libeskind, is Stephen Lewis' sister – and his "particular connection with the Holocaust."

Libeskind's parents were Holocaust survivors and his family suffered under Communism and anti-Semitism in Poland. He also famously designed the Jewish Museum of Berlin, as well as the Royal Ontario Museum's Crystal addition.

Picking the winning design was "a tough decision… because all the [proposals by competing artists and designers] were just outstanding," Farber said.

According to Farber, Libeskind's reaction to his winning bid for the sculpture was one of joy.

"He said to me, 'This is one of the smallest, but one of the most important works I've done in my life,'" Farber said.

In his description of the wheel, Libeskind said it is driven by gears, "symbolic of the gears of a ship's engine and the gears of a cynical bureaucracy."

The rim of the wheel features the description of the tragedy of the M.S. St. Louis. Surrounding it is the map of the world etched into the cylinder.

"The large wheel is moved first, by the smallest and fastest rotating gear of hatred. This small gear transfers its force to the next larger gear of racism which moves a little slower. Then the force of racism turns the yet larger gear of xenophobia, which moves yet even slower. Finally, the three gears combined, move the largest and most prominent gear of anti-Semitism. The rotating gears fracture and reassemble the image of the ship at set intervals. The gears… provide the mechanism to move the wheel in the vicious circle that brought tragedy to so many lives and shame to Canada," Libeskind wrote.

In an e-mail, Rick Dykstra, parliamentary secretary to Jason Kenney, federal minister of citizenship and immigration, told The CJN the government is "pleased" to be part of Congress' project.

"This reaffirms our government's commitment to preserve and promote human rights, both at home and around the world, including combating the scourge of anti-Semitism in all its manifestations."

Libeskind's sculpture is not the only creation being funded for the project. Congress noted that part of the CHRP grant is also being used to develop a 16-page resource booklet on the history of the M.S. St. Louis.

The bilingual – French and English – booklet is being designed jointly by Congress and the Ministry of Citizenship and Immigration for use by teachers of students in grades 6 to 8 nationwide.

According to Congress, the booklet will help students understand how and why the M.S. St. Louis incident occurred. Congress said the booklet is being offered to assist educators in teaching material that they might not be familiar with.

"Curricula, especially in provinces other than Ontario and B.C., especially in Grades 6 to 8, do not focus a great deal on the darker side of Canadian history. [The M.S. St. Louis incident] is not a particularly glowing element of that history. But we want to open this page to show what we can learn as a consequence of this embarrassment. As a consequence of this experience, Canada fundamentally changed its attitude towards immigration and refugee policy."

The booklet is scheduled to be published in November.

There's a lot on the line!
This year, United Jewish Appeal wants to raise an additional $2.5 million for programs designed to instill a deep sense of Jewish pride in our youngsters and, by extension, strengthen their bond with Israel.
This is vital in light of today's global movement to delegitimize Israel as a Jewish state. We must ensure that our youth develop a strong sense of Jewish identity through education, community initiatives, and other means.

School trustee to oppose Shephard's Granddaughter

Toronto board decides to retain controversial book

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The director of education for the Toronto District School Board (TDSB) has accepted a recommendation that a controversial book on the Arab-Israeli conflict be retained in school libraries, despite concerns it was biased and one-sided. However, a school trustee is vowing to oppose the decision and restrict or remove The Shepherd's Granddaughter from library shelves.

James Pasternak said there are likely enough votes among trustees, who are scheduled to next meet on Sept. 7, to overrule Chris Spence's decision to keep the book.

"We absolutely cannot have that book in our system, which suggests that violence is a solution for solving disputes. It is not something we need in a diverse school system where we teach tolerance, restraint and respect," Pasternak said.

The book at the heart of the controversy was introduced to Ontario schools last year as part of the Ontario Library Association's Forest of Reading/Red Maple program that provides supplementary reading materials to students in Grades 7 and 8. The book was criticized for its unsympathetic portrayal of Israelis. In one instance, a Palestinian character said of Israelis: "Innocent? No Israeli is innocent. Why should we let them live in peace? They don't deserve it."

A second reference has an Israeli soldier saying: "No Palestinian boys in city. We shoot Palestinian boys."

A parent in the Toronto district, Brian Henry, filed a formal complaint about the book, which prompted the creation of an in-house review committee to examine the text.

The staff committee concluded last June that the book has educative value, even though it displays "clear bias" and is "told from the point of view of a Palestinian family." They recommended it be retained in Toronto school libraries as independent reading material and suggested ways it could be used as a reading resource. Spence studied the recommendations over the summer and last week announced his decision.

In a letter to Henry, Spence stated: "After evaluating this report and taking some time to personally read the novel, my decision is to accept the review committee's nine recommendations.

"The Shepherd's Granddaughter has the potential to engage our Grade 7 and 8 students (a critical age for the development of social consciousness about human society) in understanding the complex issues of their world.

"I am confident that these recommendations will help to support learning with resources that may sometimes contain controversial and sensitive issues."

James Pasternak

Henry may appeal that decision to the TDSB, but at CJN press time there was no indication an appeal would be filed.

"Even if he didn't want to appeal, we have the authority to restrict the book from circulation in the system," Pasternak said. "I believe the votes are there to at the very least restrict it and the best solution would be to remove it."

Anticipating arguments that such a move would amount to censorship, Pasternak said "it is a myth that boards have to take every book recommended to them. We have no obligation to do so. This is not book banning. This is a a decision by our system not to accept certain written material.

"We are a school board, not a venue for political propaganda in the guise of a novel," he said. "It takes an unbalanced, biased view of the Israeli/Palestinian conflict to demonize Israelis. It doesn't mention any great strides and positive initiatives taken by these two peoples to negotiate and trying to work things out through dialogue.

"I would send this back to the Ontario Library Association and say, 'thanks, but no thanks.'"

Reitman family and the Daniels Corporation, who form the King and John Festival Corporation.

"There was this bashert between the two groups," says Michèle Maheux, the festival's executive director and chief operating officer.

"Jack Daniels wrote the first philanthropic cheque of $25,000 to our organization in its first year, 1976. When nobody was stepping up to the plate, not even the city, Jack literally got our organization off the ground."

The Toronto International Film Festival's new five-storey film complex designed by KPMB architects consists of a three-storey atrium, five cinemas with more than 1,300 seats, two galleries, three learning studios, a centre for students and scholars, restaurants and a lounge and the festival's offices.

On weekends, family activities, such as costume designing for children and filmmaking workshops for teens, will be offered. Every Friday, university film students will attend classes given by film experts.

Essential Cinema, the festival's first major exhibition, is based on its list of essential 100 films considered the most influential movies of all time.

Film screenings of the top 100 begin Sept. 23 and go to the end of December. Special events connected to these films include lectures by filmmakers, concerts and commissioned work.

The free-to-the-public installation opens Sept. 12 and runs to Oct. 23. It consists of objects and images from the history of cinema, as well as contemporary artwork from or inspired by the festival's essential 100 list, including Roberto Benigni's Life Is Beautiful, Steven Spielberg's Schindler's List and Alain Resnais' Night and Fog.

"We've found select items and photographs from these three films that will resonate in a special way with Jewish audiences. There are objects from Life Is Beautiful that the child in the film plays with," says Cowan, the former co-director of TIFF.

"We also have special images from Night and Fog, a remarkable documentary. [It is] the first film that went back to Auschwitz to look at the site soon after the war, and is considered one of the most harrowing documentaries ever.

"We have never before seen photographs of how they reconstructed the train tracks within Auschwitz, which certainly elicited a very unnerving and unsettled reaction from me, as a Jew, seeing this site recreated. On the other hand, it shows without film and its power, maybe our memories of these historical tragedies wouldn't be quite as present."

United Jewish Appeal Launches Annual Campaign

Campaign seeks to raise funds to fortify next generation's Jewish identity

By Daniel Horowitz

Fittingly enough, just hours after Toronto Mayor David Miller officially declared last week "United Jewish Appeal Week" in the City of Toronto, and Vaughan Mayor Linda Jackson made the same declaration in "the City above Toronto," the Carlu played host to the launch of United Jewish Appeal's Campaign 2011.

Chaired by Sherry Firestone and Jeff Rosenthal, the campaign is focused on raising an additional $2.5 million this year to combat the challenges to their Jewish identity faced by our next generation who are being saturated with anti-Israel, anti-Semitic rhetoric on a daily basis.

The campaign has already raised $15.5 million towards its goal of more than $66 million.

During the launch, the crowd heard short personal stories from seven speakers about how their lives had been transformed for the better by UJA Federation and its partner agencies.

"This year, UJA's case for increased giving reflects our collective desire to give our children the tools for success so they can live proudly in an ever-changing and sometimes adversarial world," Firestone told the sold-out crowd. "We are all concerned about the growing trend of Israel de-legitimization. A week doesn't go by where we don't hear from those who question Israel as a Jewish state, or her right to exist at all. We must take swift and bold action now to empower our youth and give them the confidence to lead full Jewish lives with joy, pride, strength and conviction."

"One of the goals of this onslaught is to wither ties of young Jews with Israel, undermining Israel," said Rosenthal. "UJA has already initiated a number of effective programs in Toronto, and this year's campaign aims to dramatically broaden their reach in order to influence as many of our young people as possible."

Some of the initiatives to make this possible include:

- Reducing the Birthright Israel waiting list by 50%.
- Providing support for high school and university students to combat efforts to demonize and deligitimize Israel.
- Enhancing the quality of Jewish education in day and supplementary schools.
- Strengthening Jewish summer camps and the number of children attending.

The launch of the campaign, chaired by Dahra Granovsky and Randy Weisz, featured veteran funnyman and accomplished actor, Dan Aykroyd who said he was proud to be there, calling UJA "one of the world's superior philanthropic organizations that funds universal positive initiatives" that help Jews and non-Jews alike.

Toronto election signs go up after Shabbat October 2

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

Candidates for Toronto city council are going to have to wait until after Shabbat on Oct. 2 to put up their election signs.

Originally, councillor hopefuls were permitted to put up signs on Sept. 30, but this caused a problem for some Jewish candidates who would be celebrating Shmini Atzeret and Simchat Torah, which falls on Sept. 30 and Oct. 1 this year.

As Oct. 2 is Shabbat, the motion requires candidates to wait until after sundown before they begin to put up signs.

Coun. Case Ootes of Ward 29 initiated the motion, and Coun. Mike Feldman of Ward 10 seconded it. It passed 31 to four.

Initially, the motion stated the signs should be permitted to be erected on Sept. 29 at midnight (late Monday night), but legislation prevented the original proposal, said Feldman. Therefore, the revised proposal moved the signage date to after the holidays.

The date change shows that the city is respectful of the Jewish High Holidays, said Howard English, vice-president of communications for the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

"It's an indication to us of what a wonderful city this is, where respect for religious holidays is uppermost in the minds of the city," he said.

Israeli hospital raising funds for protected ER

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Dr. Amnon Rofe, chief executive officer of Bnai Zion Medical Center in Haifa, is on a mission to improve safety at his hospital.

Speaking last week at a reception hosted by The Canadian Committee for the Haifa Foundation, Rofe, a specialist in obstetrics and gynecology who has been at the hospital since 2000, called Bnai Zion the most exposed hospital in Haifa.

"We have a beautiful view of Haifa from every window of the hospital, but we can see the border of Lebanon, and they can see us."

The 450-bed municipal hospital, he said, has an average of 95,000 visits a year to 65 outpatient clinics, and more than 65,000 visits to the emergency room. They perform about 13,000 surgeries per year, and at least 15 babies a day are born there.

He said that staff and patients reflect the diversity of the area's population. "People from different origins and religions – Christian and Muslim Arabs, Druze and Jewish physicians and staff – work together every day."

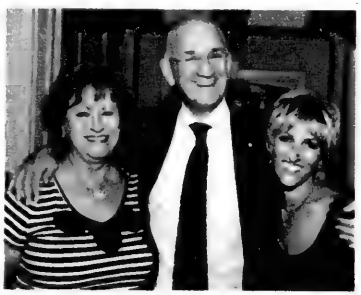
The hospital was hit only once in the 2006 Lebanon war, said Rofe, and there were no casualties, "but the next war is only a matter of time. Our enemies are purchasing huge amounts of weapons, and they can't wait to use them on us."

"The war can hit us in our backyard, and we have to be prepared, better sooner than later," he said.

He is in North America – he had a trip planned the following day to New York City – as part of an $8-million worldwide fundraising campaign for a protected emergency room for the hospital, which would provide protection against nuclear, biological and chemical attack.

The planned room, where rocket attack victims will receive initial treatment, will be a 10,800-square-foot facility with 30 beds, two trauma rooms and six professional clinics.

After the patients are stabilized, they will be transferred to the 90-bed protected hospitalization unit for ongoing care.



From left, Mary Laufer, a member of the Canadian Committee for the Haifa Foundation board of directors, and host of event; Dr. Amnon Rofe, CEO of Bnai Zion Medical Center; and Lisa Plant, executive director of the Canadian Committee for the Haifa Foundation.

As head of the hospital, he said, he is responsible for the safety of staff and patients. "[Quite] simply, we need to save lives. [This facility] will allow us to continue to provide medical care under a rain of rockets.

"It will also comfort soldiers fighting at the borders. They will know that their loved ones are receiving protected treatment."

Rofe said he is spending a lot of time trying to get help for the project. "If we do it together, we will make the project come true."

An attempt to set the record straight on Israel

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

This column appears just as Israeli Prime Minster Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas are scheduled to meet for direct talks in Washington D.C. It will be left to a future column to analyze the media's treatment – expected to be intense – of the summit.

For now, something different.

For the past 30 years, Martin Fletcher has been the familiar face and voice of NBC News in Israel, where he's worked as bureau chief. He recently left that post to devote himself to writing, though he remains "special correspondent" for the network. He's been a foreign correspondent since 1973 and has covered conflict not only in the Middle East but in other regions as well.

His first book, Breaking News, was published in 2008. It's an account of what it's like, harrowing adventures and all, to report from some of the world's most dangerous places – Somalia, Kosovo, Afghanistan and Rwanda, among others.

His latest book, Walking Israel, is being published this month and is a departure from his previous one in the sense that the adventures he describes are of a decidedly lighter, more personal kind. Subtitled, "A Personal Search for the Soul of a Nation," the publication is Fletcher's attempt to show another important side of Israel rarely, if ever, seen on nightly newscasts, including, he admits, his own.

Two years ago, Fletcher spent a couple of weeks walking Israel's 110-mile historic coastline from the Lebanon border to the Gaza Strip, stopping along the way in various communities and meeting some fascinating characters, both Jewish and Arab.

As Fletcher explains in the book's introduction: "I wanted to write a book that would take readers beyond the familiar yet constricted stories of guns and bombs and closer to the true nature of this unique country. I wanted to write a book that would have a very simple, often overlooked message: this quirky, surprising, complex, difficult and disturbing country is actually a great place."

Fletcher reflects on the irony of covering Israel: "For all the attention focused on this tiny land, and all the effort spent on fixing its problems, Israel has to be the most analyzed yet least understood country in the world."

What he doesn't mention is one essential fact. Never before has what might be described as a conflict involving the Third World (as the Palestinian cause is regarded by many journalists) been covered in the comfort and safety of a First World country – Israel.

Fletcher at least has the honesty to acknowledge his own involvement in this one-sided coverage: "As a reporter covering Israel and the region for European and American television since 1973, I myself have hardly been blameless." He admits that he was focused on stories involving conflict in the West Bank (and Gaza), but adds that it's also the editors in New York who expect these sorts of reports and are typically not receptive to anything outside the established storyline.

Martin Fletcher

This is not to diminish the newsworthiness of conflict-driven stories or to distract attention from them. It is, however, to note, as Fletcher does, that if conflict stories are all news consumers see about Israel, they end up with a very distorted picture of the country. (Another distortion, which Fletcher doesn't mention and to which he is not entirely immune, is the tendency of many western reporters to cover the conflict mainly from an over-simplified point of view that sees Arabs only as historic victims and not as responsible actors.)

This book is Fletcher's effort to set the record straight, if not to make amends. "I've written Walking Israel, not just because I believe that journalists should strive to report the whole story, but because I'm convinced that Israel and its people have long gotten a raw deal in the world's eyes. Don't get me wrong: Israel is hardly a Garden of Eden. Building a country on land inhabited by another people was never going to be anything less than excruciating. But relentless insistence on Israel's faults, rather than fair recognition of its virtues, has increasingly legitimized a question that applies to no other country on the planet: Does Israel have the right to exist? This book offers an unequivocal answer: Yes."

In an important sense, it's tragic that he even had to ask that question.

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Regular mail delivery to Gaza expected soon

CUPW move designed to 'put pressure on Israel'

Israel has accepted the appointment of the candidate suggested by the PPA, and they are currently engaged in the procedures necessary before he is installed as the new head of the PPA. Once he is installed, regular mail delivery should resume to Gaza."

As for the proposed blockade-running ship and CUPW's role, the embassy spokesperson said, "We're not commenting."

In Israel, however, Brig.-Gen. Avichai Mendelblit, the Israel Defence Forces' advocate general, asserted that the blockade conforms with international law.

Testifying before a committee investigating the Israeli raid on a Turkish ship in late May, Mendelblit said the blockade was imposed in 2007 for "pure military considerations" after Hamas seized power.

"Every step taken, be it part of classical warfare or economic warfare, aims to bring the other side to do what we want it to do. We want Hamas to stop launching rockets at our citizens. We have no desire to punish the civilian population," he said. "As an indirect result, the civilian population does suffer, and that is why we have checked the legality [of the blockade]. We've consulted with the attorney general and with the Supreme Court and found that it is legal and permitted."

In Ottawa, Lemelin said drawing attention to the mail situation "allows us to make people more and more aware what's happening to the Palestinian people."

He said CUPW supports international efforts to break the blockade "and put pressure on the Israeli government." Asked to comment on Israeli concerns that Hamas would import weapons to be used against them, he said, "That's not the view we have on that."

He referred to CUPW's 2008 resolution in favour of BDS, which he said also called for an end to suicide bombing, and he asserted that Israel is violating international law. "So, we must find the best way to put pressure on the Israeli government."

Shimon Fogel

But asked whether Hamas wouldn't use open sea lanes to import weapons for use against Israel, Lemelin said, "Our view is that 1.5 million people are in prison," and the best way to help them is to end the blockade.

As for the suggestion that Israel has legitimate concerns based on the Hamas charter, which calls for the destruction of Israel and the murder of Jews, Lemelin replied, "That's what you say." Hamas, he said, was democratically elected, and "we're confident that if people sit together and talk about it, they will find a solution to the issue."

(Israel, and most western countries, have said they will not negotiate with Hamas unless it recognizes Israel, renounces violence and agrees to abide by the prior Palestinian agreements.)

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee, said that given the "relaxed conditions" for entry into Gaza of materials, "there is no reason for a flotilla to provide aid, and it can't be understood as anything other than a provocation by CUPW. It is a high-profile event attempting to further isolate Israel with the international community. Of what value is that to Palestinians?"

A dissenting CUPW view was voiced by letter carrier Jeff Levinson, who said the union should focus on contract negotiations and not on international issues. He said the union rank and file are apathetic on issues like the Middle East, "but it hurts me... I've got to march in the Labour Day parade with them [the union leaders]. Give me a break."

COMMUNITY BARBECUE

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto hosted a community barbecue at the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus, on Bathurst Street north of Rutherford Road, last Thursday. The event was held to let York Region's Jewish community know about the services and facilities that will join the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto at the site when the campus opens officially in 2012. The Schwartz/Reisman Centre – which will include a sports and recreation pavilion, a childhood education centre and a community arts centre – is expected to open then. From top, Jeff Springer, federation's chief of corporate operations, mans the grill; Israeli Scout counsellors Gil Yerushalmi, left, and Guy Waismark, staff an obstacle course; and Lorraine Sandler reads a story as part of the PJ Library's story time.

Dance party to kick off CJA campaign

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The 2010-11 Winnipeg Combined Jewish Appeal campaign is set to begin with a telethon, Sept. 13 to 16, culminating in a community dance party and barbecue on Sept. 19.

"We want to celebrate our community," says Elaine Goldstine, the CJA's executive director.

Winnipeg's Jewish community has long prided itself on the success of the annual campaign. For several years in a row, the final tally had always been a little higher than the previous year. Last year, though, the campaign was flat – raising $5.3 million – the same total as the year before and about $200,000 short of the target.

Hope Morry

Goldstine reports that this year, campaign organizers are taking a different tack. Instead of setting a specific goal for 2010-11, the goal is to reach $6.5 million by the 2012-13 campaign by encouraging donors to increase their gifts by a minimum 25 per cent a year.

"We will also be encouraging our donors to contribute to our new Securing Our Future campaign by endowing gifts to the CJA through the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba," Goldstine says.

Howard Morry

Co-chairing this year's campaign are longtime community leaders Howard and Hope Morry. Howard chaired the campaign 10 years ago, while Hope co-chaired the CJA Women's Division campaign with Tova Vickar eight years ago.

The women's division chair for the second year in a row is Marcia Cosman, a third-generation community leader. Cosman has been a CJA canvasser for 25 years. She joined the CJA's management team three years ago.

"We intend to be more proactive this year with more face-to-face canvassing," Goldstine says.

Anne Frank tree sapling comes to Montreal

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — Anne Frank's tree, which toppled in a storm Aug. 23, will have a new life in Montreal.

A tiny sapling grown from one of the chestnuts of the 150-year-old tree will be planted at Federation CJA's Cummings House next month.

The project is being co-ordinated with the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre, which is housed at the federation.

Centre spokesperson Audrey Licop said the planting is scheduled to take place at a Sept. 27 ceremony in the Peace Garden, the enclosed courtyard of Cummings House.

The tree had been rotting for some years, and a global campaign was launched in 2007 to save it.

Frank made several references to the tree in her famous diary. She could see it from the Amsterdam attic window where she hid with her family for two years, before she died at Bergen-Belsen in 1945.

Manitoba may get new kosher meat supplier

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish community here may soon be able to purchase locally slaughtered and processed fresh kosher meat again.

"We are in discussions with producers about re-establishing fresh kosher slaughter," said Bob Freedman, the longtime executive director of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg.

"The province is behind us. Shochets and mashgichim are available. We think we have a couple of retailers who would sell the meat under appropriate supervision. We hope to have something more concrete to report within the next six months."

Gustavo Zentner

The key here is that the producers who are interested are looking not only at the Winnipeg market for kosher and halal meat but also nationally and internationally. A report commissioned by the provincial government and authored by Interpoc, a company headed by Gustavo Zentner (who is also a member of the Federation board,) notes that the kosher beef market in Canada is worth an estimated $130 million a year, while kosher beef sales in the United States are about $1.35 billion.

The figures for halal beef sales are $80 million and $705 million respectively.

About one-third of Canadian supply is produced within Canada with the bulk of the beef coming from the United States and elsewhere.

Currently, most of the kosher beef produced in Canada is supplied by four processors in central Canada.

Worldwide consumption of kosher and halal beef stands at $600 billion and $1.2 trillion respectively per year.

The authors recommend that potential Manitoba producers would be best served by establishing traders, importers and distributors dealing in kosher and halal beef.

"North America presents an opportunity for Manitoba producers to attack a niche market where the supply pipeline is dominated by very few large operations that completely meet consumer demands, purchasing preferences or product interest," the report states.

"Results from direct interaction with industry players and consumers indicate that there is a vast and growing segment interested in innovative beef products at peak seasons, and that concerns such as origin, certification and quality surpass the sensitivity of price at the time of purchase.

The opportunity for Manitoba producers is to tap into the existing supply channels with fresh high quality products, value added new products and deli segment meats."

"The report provides a lot of information, much of which we were already aware of," says Freedman. "The Government of Manitoba sees the kosher and halal consumer as important market segments. And it would certainly help the cattle industry in Manitoba that has seen better times."

'I felt this was her last chance'

The pair's initial meeting – and their fraught conversation to determine that Oron had found the right person – took place in a taxi surrounded by an angry mob that came close to overturning the vehicle.

"It was the stupidest thing I've done," Oron said of the harrowing experience. "But I'm so glad we did it and got out of there alive."

A former Jerusalem Post writer, Oron recently completed a novel for young adults called Cry of the Giraffe, based closely on her rescue of Wuditu, the name she uses for her elder daughter in the book.

Not wanting to stir painful memories for Wuditu, Oron expected to carry the story to her grave.

But a few years ago, Wuditu told Oron's son, Daniel – a Gemini Award-winning filmmaker now based in Toronto – that she wanted him to make a movie about her story.

Shocked, he initially turned her down, Oron said. Relenting, he taped her story at her request, but didn't commit to making a film.

Judie Oron had moved to Toronto at the end of 2004 and was giving talks about the Ethiopian Jewish community. After a family conference on Skype, she began to include Wuditu's history when speaking to small groups, as a way of starting to share the story.

"I wanted people to know what a hero my daughter had been, and how brave the Ethiopian community was that they were prepared to take those risks to get to Israel… This is not a community that has a shortage of courage or strength."

As well, particularly when writing the book, she wanted to make people aware of the issue of slavery in Ethiopia.

The public relations manager of Annick Press, a children's and young adults' book publisher, heard Oron speak at the Jewish Mosaic Festival in June 2008 and approached her about the possibility of writing a book.

"There was no pressure to reveal anything Wuditu wasn't prepared for me to reveal," Oron said. She received an Ontario Arts Council grant to write the book, which took her a year and a half.

Judie Oron took this picture of Wuditu in Ethiopia shortly after she rescued her.

Like many other aspects of her life, the book owes a lot to serendipity. Oron said she tends to "bumble into things, rather than plan them."

Her career in journalism is a case in point. As an African studies student at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Oron taught aerobics classes and worked part time as a proofreader at the Jerusalem Post.

One day, she was asked to write an article about body image. Although she initially demurred, saying that she wasn't a writer, she was convinced to give it a shot, not knowing that it would appear in the paper as the first of a weekly column.

Her reaction, she recalls now, was, "Are you kidding? What have you done to me? I don't know how to write!"

Later, she was assigned to write book reviews, and "it just went from there," she said.

After about a dozen years, the then-editor of the paper asked her to take over the Post's three charitable funds. "It had been an administrative position, but when I got there, I started writing articles." Her stories resulted in increased donations, she said.

The same week that she became director of the funds, news broke about Operation Moses, the covert rescue of about 8,000 Ethiopian Jews.

Oron, who had studied Amharic at university, opened a fourth fund at the Post to help the new olim.

At the time, Daniel was 13 and his younger brother, Jonathan, was five. The two boys befriended Ethiopian classmates, who sometimes came to their house for a meal or to do homework together.

Because of her work, Oron was taken to Ethiopian absorption centres and to dormitory schools that served the new olim – places where, typically, non-Ethiopians weren't allowed access.

She became friends with Jewish Agency staffers who were helping Ethiopian Jews, as well as with members of the Ethiopian Jewish community.

As a result, she became more personally involved in helping the new olim, supporting individual rescue missions, and, in 1989, travelling to Ethiopia to gather stories of Ethiopian Jews, volunteer in the Jewish Agency office and work with a family there who needed logistic and medical assistance.

It was on that trip that she met Wuditu's younger sister, Lewteh (also the name Oron used in the book), who was then about 10 or 11 years old. The girl's parents were already in Israel.

"I fell in love with her instantly," Oron recalls. "She followed me everywhere, carried my camera, learned to change batteries. She was my little assistant. We became really close."

It wasn't until after Oron visited Lewteh in Israel and took her into her family later that year at the request of the girl's dying father, that she learned about Wuditu.

The girls' father had sent a man to look for Wuditu in Ethiopia, but the man reported back that she had died.

Later, Lewteh tearfully told Oron that she believed her sister was still alive – that she "could still feel her breathing" – and that the man her father had sent didn't really look for her.

Oron made inquiries and found two independent witnesses who had seen Wuditu in Ethiopia. She returned on her own, with a recommendation from the Jewish Agency, determined to find Wuditu. "I felt this was her last chance," she said.

Although some details have been changed in the book, the "core story" is true, Oron said.

"The whole period of my finding her – that is all absolutely real… I think I loved this child before I found her. We have a very special connection. She's an extraordinary human being."

A book launch for Cry of the Giraffe will be held Oct. 12, at the Gladstone Hotel from 6 to 8 p.m. As well, Oron will speak at a Na'amat Canada "Breakfast with the Author" event on Oct. 17 at the Borochov Centre, and as part of Jewish Book Fair on Oct. 28.

Election-training encourages political engagement

By VICKY TOBIANAH
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — The Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC) recently held an election-training event at Beth Israel Beth Aaron Congregation.

The Aug. 12 event aimed to "engage the community in the political process, mobilize grassroots across the country and build relationships with elected officials – from all political parties, during and between elections," said CJPAC's Quebec region director, Steeve Azoulay.

Election-training workshops are a recent CJPAC initiative designed to help the community continuously have a presence in political affairs. The workshops have in the past been delivered to CJPAC fellows – students who represent CJPAC on Canadian university campuses. Their success encouraged CJPAC to create an open, city-wide event for all demographics.

Students are not the only ones volunteering on political campaigns, and this "reflects the fact that people who volunteer on campaigns come from every walk of life and demographic," Azoulay said.

"Events like these are designed to educate and encourage members of our community of the importance of political engagement and the positive impact they can have when they get involved in the political process.

"We should always remember how fortunate we are to be living in a democratic country. It is our privilege and right to participate in the political process, and it has been our experience that too many people sit by and do not exercise that opportunity," Azoulay said.

Zach Paikin, a CJPAC fellow, said the event "brought together experienced political advocates with less experienced individuals. Everyone learned from one another. Essential tools were given so that we would all be able to go home and feel comfortable working on campaigns."

CJPAC plans to hold election-training events this fall in Toronto and Vancouver, part of CJPAC's plan to reach out to Western Canada.

To followup after the Montreal event, CJPAC will place volunteers on political campaigns across the country. "There are 308 federal ridings in Canada, but Jews only live in 13 ridings in any great number. Volunteering is a great way to branch out and develop relationships with candidates and elected officials from other ridings, which allows the community to have a greater impact," said Azoulay.

Students gear up to fight anti-Israel activism

By SUE FISHKOFF
JTA

ST. LOUIS — Amanda Boris is nervous about what she'll face when classes resume at the University of Wisconsin later this month.

"There's an uncomfortable amount of anti-Semitism on my campus," said the incoming senior.

Last year, her campus newspaper ran an ad from a notorious Holocaust denier for several weeks, despite protests from the Jewish community. More troubling, she said, were the anonymous posts that appeared under the ad, stating that the Jews "deserved it" and they "better watch themselves."

Liat Ben-Choreen

Boris told her story to a group of Jewish students who joined some 300 of their peers from Aug. 11 to 15 at Washington University in St. Louis at the Hillel Institute, a summer training session designed to help them prepare for Jewish engagement work on campus.

A big part of that work is learning how to respond effectively to anti-Israel activities on campus.

Such activity has been on the rise on North American campuses for several years, but pro-Israel activists say last year was different: the new campaigns are better organized, more prevalent and more vitriolic.

This summer, a number of national Jewish organizations, including Hillel, held training sessions to help their students and staff prepare for what is expected to be an even more targeted anti-Israel campaign this coming year.

"In the Jewish community there's a lot of fear and anxiety, and that lands on our campuses, on our students," said Hillel president Wayne Firestone at the gathering's plenary session Aug. 11.

"We have seen things on campus, last semester in particular, that are really ugly," he told the crowd. "We can imagine what we'll face when we return this fall."

Whereas past years might have involved handfuls of anti-Israel students passing out photocopied flyers, last year saw a high-tech traveling exhibit of Israel's separation barrier, complete with an embedded plasma TV showing anti-Israeli images.

As part of the Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions campaign, efforts to bring resolutions calling for divestment from companies doing business with Israel were noted at more than half a dozen campuses – a new tactic in the anti-Israel movement that targets student governments.

Only one of those proposed resolutions passed in a non-binding student body vote at Evergreen State College in Olympia, Wash. But every time such a bill is put forward, Hillel activists say, the charged atmosphere it creates leaves lasting wounds.

When the student government at the University of California, San Diego voted on a divestment bill in April, Hillel campus director Keri Copans noted some Jewish students standing on the other side of the room with the pro-divestment crowd, even as most Jewish students stood with her in opposing the bill.

Copans said she found the physical divide painful.

"Divestment bills come and go, but these are Jewish students," she said. "I want them to have positive Jewish experiences, and that's not what they get by being glared at across the room."

Asking students to act as Israel advocates along with all the other things they do at college isn't easy, activists say.

"Our students are coming to school to learn, and now they're expected to defend," said Roz Rothstein, co-founder and CEO of StandWithUs, a Los Angeles-based international organization that describes itself as working to ensure Israel's side of the story is told on campuses and in other public spheres.

"Israel is the target, but Jewish students who stand up for Israel also become the target."

In mid-August, StandWithUs flew 40 of its campus leaders to Oxnard, Calif., for a training session, and the organization will host another session in November for 150 students.

"Everyone's concerned, and that's good," said Rothstein of StandWithUs. "Once the year begins, everyone's work on this will merge and hopefully strengthen the students."

AIPAC declined to speak about the issue on the record.

Israel advocacy is a nuanced issue, say Jewish campus professionals, and that can be divisive.

"For the average student, Israel is a problem – and they don't want more problems," said Michael Faber, longtime Hillel executive director at Ithaca College in Ithaca, N.Y. "It makes that leg of their Jewish identity wobbly."

Liat Ben-Choreen, the chair of the Israel Affairs Committee at the University of Toronto's Hillel, admits that standing up for Israel is difficult on campus.

"It's intimidating. We're not the voice of the majority and it's not a popular opinion," she said, explaining that Palestinians have painted themselves as the underdogs. "Being Canadian, you want to root for the underdog."

This is a reality that the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students understands well. Last year, the group created a national campaign to educate students about Israel and its positive contributions to fields including science and environmentalism.

The campaign, called Size Doesn't Matter, will be continued this year through its website and tabling events, said Paige MacPherson, CFJS's vice-president external.

"It's a year-long campaign, it's still going strong. The purpose is to show Israel's accomplishments beyond the conflict," she said.

This year, MacPherson is worried that May's flotilla incident, where Israeli soldiers stormed a Turkish flotilla, killing nine people, may add flame to the anti-Israel fire.

"We're going to be specifically focused on new claims that surfaced over the summer," she said.

Students with varying religious and political views are being asked to stand together for Israel's right to exist as a Jewish and democratic state, and that can bring them into conflict with other friends and causes, activists say.

"College is emblematic of what's happening in the general society – Israel both unites and divides the Jewish people. That's what we're wrestling with," said Rabbi Adam Naftalin-Kelman, Hillel's executive director at the University of California, Berkeley, which also faced a protracted struggle over a divestment bill last spring.

"For me, pro-Israel is someone who wants to develop a deep, meaningful, mature, loving relationship with Israel. How this is manifested may be different for different people."

During the Hillel Institute in St. Louis, some 80 Hillel professionals arrived early to take part in a 24-hour simulation exercise where they played various roles on a mythical university campus faced with a divestment bill and a boycott of visiting Israeli professors.

The techniques used in the simulation are included in an Israel advocacy playbook that Hillel distributed at the conference and plans to give every Hillel campus professional.

"The group that went through this exercise together now has a common language," said Chicago educator Carl Schrag, who developed and ran the exercise on behalf of the Israel on Campus Coalition. "When BDS [the sanctions campaign] hits – and I presume it will – hopefully they'll remember they're not alone."

Coalition building is key to Israel advocacy work on campus, say those involved in leading such efforts. It shouldn't come down to Jewish students against the rest of the campus community, they add – and as interfaith efforts increase on more and more campuses, Jewish students should find themselves less isolated.

Jeff Bicher, Hillel Montreal's executive director, will be focusing on student safety this year, something that, during the last school year, was a problem on some campuses. In Ottawa, two Jewish Carleton University students were allegedly involved in an anti-Semitic attack in April, during which they say they were chased with a machete.

"Our plan is to make sure the campuses our Jewish students are on are safe and free of intimidation," Bicher said of Montreal campuses, adding that Hillel will be using campaigns like Size Doesn't Matter and the Truth Campaign, a pro-Israel initiative, to debunk anti-Israel misconceptions and lies.

Food Ideas for the Holidays

Something different for the buffet table

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

I can tell when the High Holidays are approaching, because I start getting those phone calls – from my family, my friends, my mother's friends, even strangers!

"Can I make the brisket ahead and freeze it?"

"How about the kugel?"

"What can I do with my burnt honey cake?"

(Yes and yes to the first two and "Um, do you have a dog?" to the third.)

Jewish cooks the world over are shopping and chopping, searing and sautéing – so many dishes, so little time. In bygone days our foremothers, stay-at-home moms before that term became popular, had few distractions from the task at hand: putting a holiday feast on the table for their large extended families.

Today's cooks squeeze the job in between work, carpools, meetings, etc. – all while trying to recreate those labour-intensive recipes their grandmothers slaved over. For what is a holiday if not the gathering of families connecting to their roots and traditions?

No sooner is Rosh Hashanah over – dishes put away, leftovers stored – than we're already thinking about the next big feast the following week, the break-the-fast celebration that ends Yom Kippur.

All good fasts must come to an end, and every year our friends, Barbara and Sylvan Swartz, host their annual mega-potluck feast. Everyone brings his or her specialty and we all dig in. You'd think we'd been starving for a week! We celebrate with a serendipitous mix of old and new, as we all try to outdo each other with our signature dishes.

Last year, I brought my Layered Hummus and Eggplant appetizer – the idea for the dish came to me in a dream! I've often heard chefs claim they created a recipe that way, but I never believed it until it happened to me.

Several years ago I had prepared hummus as well as an eggplant salad for a party, and that night, as I slept, the two merged into one. When I awoke, I thought, what a great combination! After making a few adjustments to the two recipes, I tried it out on a cooking class, and students have told me that it has become a staple in their entertaining repertoire.

The secret of my homemade hummus is the roasted garlic, which really packs a wallop of flavour. But if you are one of those heretofore-mentioned frazzled, overextended cooks, you can even use store-bought hummus for this presentation.

The eggplant is sliced and fried, well drained and chopped into bite-size pieces, then mixed with a balsamic vinaigrette and spread over the hummus. Top with toasted pine nuts and chopped cilantro and serve with pita.

For break-the-fast, prepare the hummus and the eggplant ahead, toast the pine nuts and chop the cilantro. Wrap the chopped cilantro in a paper towel and store it in the refrigerator in a resealable plastic bag. Then right before serving, you can assemble the dish is just a few moments.

Susie Fishbein's Kosher by Design Short on Time (Artscroll) is filled with ideas every time-pressed cook will appreciate. "As a working woman and mother of four, I 'get' the need for recipes for everyday life," she says. While you'll find lots of ideas for family meals, the book is packed with party recipes too.

Pesto-Glazed Orzo, Salmon and Artichokes is an easy dish you can make ahead that would be a great addition to your break-the-fast buffet. And Susie wouldn't be Susie without those innovative and creative ideas for dressing your table. In this book, even the table décor is quick and easy!

"Use what you have," she advises. She groups her antique teapot collection down the centre of her table for a show-stopping conversation starter.

"Each teapot comes with a story of how and when I came to acquire it," she writes. "Whether you collect salt and pepper shakers, coloured glass, postcards or model cars, anything that is part of you will create immediate interest, and, when grouped together, can have great visual appeal."

But what I love most about Susie's books is her attention to the real meaning of the holidays and celebrations and the creative way she reinterprets them.

For Simchat Torah, for example, we traditionally eat things that are rolled, a culinary reminder of the Torah scrolls. "Stuffed cabbage can be kind of overdone," Fishbein says, "but I've got this awesome Chicken Negemaki. The chicken is rolled around scallion and red pepper strips and tied like a scroll with another blanched scallion. Now, true, God never told us to eat Chicken Negemaki, but he didn't tell us to eat stuffed cabbage either!"

LAYERED HUMMUS AND EGGPLANT WITH ROASTED GARLIC AND PINE NUTS

Adapted from Cooking Jewish

1/4 cup balsamic vinegar
1/2 cup olive oil
1 tsp. sugar
1/2 to 1 tsp. kosher (coarse) salt, or to taste
freshly ground black pepper to taste
1 1/2 to 2 pounds eggplant, cut into 1/4 inch slices
1/2 to 3/4 cup olive oil
hummus with roasted garlic
1/2 bunch cilantro or flat-leaf parsley, chopped (1/4 cup)
1/3 cup pine nuts, toasted about 8 pita breads, cut into wedges

Prepare dressing: Whisk vinegar into olive oil in a small bowl. Add sugar, salt and pepper, and mix well. Set aside.

Heat 1 to 2 tbsp. of the oil in a large, heavy skillet over medium-high heat. Add eggplant, in batches, and fry until cooked, browned and slightly crisp, about 5 minutes per side. Continue cooking eggplant, adding more oil as needed. Drain on ink-free paper towels and squeeze dry. Coarsely chop drained eggplant, and transfer to a bowl. Add salt to taste.

Whisk dressing, pour about 6 tbsp. of it over eggplant, or to taste, and stir. To assemble, spread hummus evenly on a large, flat decorative platter. Top with chopped eggplant, spreading it to within about 1 inch of edge of hummus. Sprinkle with cilantro and toasted pine nuts. Serve with pita bread for scooping.

PESTO-GLAZED ORZO, SALMON, AND ARTICHOKES

From Kosher by Design Short on Time (Artscroll) by Susie Fishbein.

1 1/2 lb. salmon fillet, all pinbones removed fine and coarse sea salts
freshly ground black pepper
12 whole button mushrooms, cleaned and halved
4 tbsp. olive oil, divided
1 (1-lb.) box orzo
1 bunch basil (2 cups packed leaves)
1/4 cup raw, shelled pistachios, not roasted or salted
1 cup extra-virgin olive oil
1 (6-oz.) jar marinated artichoke hearts, drained

Preheat oven to 375. Spray broiler pan with nonstick cooking spray. Place salmon on broiler pan. Season with fine sea salt and pepper.

Toss mushrooms with 1 tablespoon olive oil. Arrange around the salmon. Roast 25 minutes. Set aside.

Meanwhile, place remaining 3 tablespoons olive oil into large soup pot over medium heat. Add orzo and stir to coat with warm oil. Toast until lightly browned and fragrant, stirring occasionally.

Add water halfway up the pot. Add 2 tbsp. fine or coarse sea salt and bring to a boil. Cook until tender, usually 9-11 minutes. Drain and rinse orzo and set aside in a medium bowl.

Place basil leaves into a quart-sized or other high-sided container. Add pistachios, 1 cup extra-virgin olive oil and a pinch of fine sea salt. Using an immersion blender, purée the mixture. This can also be done in a food processor.

Pour half the pesto into orzo. Break salmon into chunks and add to orzo. Add mushrooms and artichokes. Season with 1/2 tsp. fine sea salt. Toss to combine.

Place into a bowl or serving platter and drizzle with remaining pesto. Best served warm or at room temperature. Yield: 6 to 8 servings.

For the makings of a good and sweet new year.

CHICKEN NEGEMAKI WITH RED PEPPER CHUTNEY

From Kosher by Design.

Red Pepper Chutney
1 red bell pepper, seeded
1 clove garlic
1/2 cup rice vinegar
1/2 cup light brown sugar
1/2 tsp. dried red hot pepper flakes

Chicken Negemaki
8 boneless, skinless chicken breasts
2 bunches scallions, separated into individual strips with roots trimmed
1 red bell pepper, sliced into very long, thin strips
2 cloves garlic, minced
1/4 cup soy sauce
2 tbsp. rice vinegar
2 tsp. toasted sesame oil sesame seeds
3 tbsp. peanut oil

For the Red Pepper Chutney

In container of a food processor fitted with metal blade, process red pepper, garlic and vinegar. Place mixture in small saucepan over medium heat. Add brown sugar and red pepper flakes. Simmer about 10 minutes or until reduced. Store in refrigerator until ready to use.

For the Chicken Negemaki

Using a rolling pin or meat mallet, pound chicken breasts between 2 pieces of parchment or waxed paper until even in thickness.

Take 8 of the scallions and trim to same length as red pepper strips. Place remaining long scallions in pot of hot water to blanch and soften a little.

In centre of each cutlet, place 1 strip red pepper and 1 trimmed scallion. Roll chicken around pepper and scallion. Take 2 blanched scallions and tie the chicken rolls about an inch from each end. It's okay if knot doesn't hold perfectly. If scallions are too long, trim after they are tied. Make 7 more rolls in this way.

Place chicken rolls in a zip-lock bag. In a small bowl combine garlic, soy sauce, vinegar and sesame oil. Add mixture to chicken rolls. Seal bag and turn to coat each chicken roll. Marinate in refrigerator 6 hours or overnight, turning bag occasionally.

Spread sesame seeds on wax or parchment paper. Remove chicken rolls from marinade and roll in sesame seeds. Heat peanut oil in large skillet over medium heat until hot but not smoking. Cover pan and cook chicken about 10 minutes or until cooked through, shaking pan and turning occasionally to brown on all sides, adding more oil if necessary.

Transfer chicken to a cutting board. Using a sharp knife, trim edges of each roll so they are flat. Slice each negemaki roll on the diagonal. To serve, stand the two pieces up on a plate and spoon red pepper chutney around it. Yield: 8 servings.

Pomegranates traditional fare for many

By SYBIL KAPLAN
Special to The CJN

For many Jews, pomegranates are traditional at Rosh Hashanah. Some believe the dull and leathery-skinned crimson fruit may have really been the tapuach, the apple, of the Garden of Eden.

The pomegranate originated in Persia, and according to Matthew Goodman (The Food Maven in the Forward), it is one of the world's oldest cultivated fruits, having been domesticated around 4000 BCE. The Egyptians imported pomegranates from the Holy Land in 1150 BCE, and natural pomegranate juice or the juice made into spiced wine was a favourite of the Hebrews living in Egypt. Pomegranate wood could also be carved into skewers on which to roast the lamb for Passover.

The word pomegranate means "grained apple." In Hebrew, it is called rimon – which is also the word for a hand grenade! In fact, the English word grenade is said to come from the word pomegranate, and both the town of Granada in Spain and the stone garnet are thought to come from the name and colour of the pomegranate. The juice can also be made into the concentrated syrup, grenadine.

On the second night of Rosh Hashanah, when it is customary to eat a "new" fruit that has not been eaten during the year, many Sephardi Jews choose pomegranate. They recite the prayer Ken yehi ratzon – "May it be Thy will, O Creator, that our year be rich and replete with blessings as the pomegranate is rich and replete with seeds."

Some years ago, Ann Kleinberg, a food columnist for the Jerusalem Post compiled a cookbook titled Pomegranates, with 64 recipes. Juices and syrups, starters and soups, salads and side dishes, main courses, desserts and drinks are included.

CELEBRATION SALAD WITH POMEGRANATES AND POPPY SEED DRESSING

From Pomegranates.

8 cups mixed salad greens
2 heads Belgian endive, trimmed and coarsely chopped
1 red onion, thinly sliced into half-rounds
1 avocado, peeled and cubed
2 navel oranges, peeled and cut into bite-size pieces, membranes removed
1 red grapefruit, peeled and cut into bite-size pieces, membranes removed
1 cup black olive rings
3/4 cup pomegranate seeds
2 tbsp. poppy seeds

Place greens and endive in large serving bowl and add onion, avocado, orange and grapefruit pieces, olives and 1/2 cup of pomegranate seeds. Add poppy seeds to vinaigrette (recipe below), shake and dress the salad. Toss gently and sprinkle the remaining pomegranate seeds on top. Makes 6-8 servings.

BASIC VINAIGRETTE WITH POMEGRANATE JUICE

1/4 cup pomegranate juice
3 tbsp. white wine vinegar
3 tbsp. olive oil
2 tbsp. canola oil
1 tbsp. freshly squeezed lemon juice
4 tsp. sugar
2 minced garlic cloves
1 1/2 tsp. Dijon mustard
1/2 tsp. salt
pinch of fresh ground pepper

Combine ingredients in a small bowl and whisk well. Pour into cruet or screw-top jar. Shake before dressing a salad.

POMEGRANATE SYRUP

1 1/2 cups pomegranate juice
1 2-in. cinnamon stick
1/4 cup brown sugar
1/4 cup white sugar
1/8 tsp. ground allspice
1/8 tsp. ground nutmeg

In a saucepan, heat pomegranate juice with cinnamon stick, brown sugar and white sugar to boiling. Reduce heat and simmer for 10 minutes or until juice is about 1/2 cup. Add nutmeg and allspice and cook 1 minute. Discard cinnamon stick. Strain. Good over regular or pareve vanilla ice cream.

Food Ideas for the Holidays

Break the fast with something light

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Many years ago, when I was a young bride, I decided to search through my Jewish cookbooks for ideas on what to serve for Yom Kippur dinner and break-the-fast. I opened my 1956 paperback edition of Sara Kasdan's Love and Knishes: How to Cook like a Jewish Mother and found the chapter called Yom Kipper Cookery. But there was one lonely entry on the page: "Ah ha! You looked. Shame on you! You should be fasting!"

Erev Yom Kippur, I usually eat a big bowl of chicken soup with noodles, carrots and boiled chicken for dinner. In order to avoid thirst during the fast, I avoid spicy, salty foods. The experts recommend eating moderate amounts of protein and including foods that are high in complex carbohydrates. Be sure to drink adequate liquids before and after fasting to prevent dehydration.

To break the fast, dairy foods, poached fish, bagels, lox and cream cheese, and a selection of salads are excellent choices for the festive buffet table. Cakes and cookies are always popular choices – apple, carrot, coffee, honey and zucchini cakes, mandel bread and nut horns. This year, I'm invited once again to friends for their annual break-the-fast gathering. Everyone is asked to bring a favourite dish and everyone always eats too much!

NORENE'S QUINOA, BLACK BEAN AND CORN SALAD

Source: Norene's Healthy Kitchen (Whitecap)

Quinoa has a delicate, nutty flavour and chewy texture. It looks similar to raw sesame seeds. This nutritious salad is a fabulous dish for a buffet and can be expanded into a main course easily. Everyone will be keen on quinoa once they taste this!

2 cups vegetable or chicken broth
1 cup quinoa
1 can (19 oz.) black beans, drained and rinsed
1 cup corn kernels
1 medium red pepper, seeded and chopped
4 green onions, chopped
1/4 cup chopped fresh cilantro or parsley
2 cloves garlic (about 1 tsp. minced)
1/2 tsp. ground cumin
1/4 to 1/2 tsp. cayenne pepper (or to taste)
3 to 4 tbsp. lime or lemon juice (preferably fresh)
3 to 4 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
salt and freshly ground black pepper

Bring the broth to a boil in a medium saucepan over high heat. Place the quinoa in a fine-mesh strainer and rinse under cold, running water for 1 to 2 minutes; drain well. (Rinsing removes the bitter coating.)

Add the quinoa to the boiling liquid. Reduce heat to low and simmer, covered, for 15 minutes. Don't overcook. Remove from heat and let stand, covered, for 5 minutes. Fluff with a fork, transfer to a large bowl and let cool.

Add the beans, corn, red pepper, green onions, cilantro, garlic, cumin and cayenne to the quinoa. Drizzle the lime juice and olive oil over the salad. Season with salt and pepper; toss well. Can be made a day ahead, covered and refrigerated. Adjust seasonings to taste before serving. Yield: 12 servings. Keeps for up to 3 to 4 days in the refrigerator.

Couscous and Black Bean Salad

Substitute couscous for quinoa, but reduce broth to 1-1/2 cups. (No need to rinse or cook the couscous.) Combine the couscous with hot broth in a large bowl, cover and let stand for 10 minutes, until liquid is absorbed. Continue as directed to prepare salad.

Recently, I was in touch with Jill Notkin, a former Montrealer and busy work-at-home mom, who now lives in Newton, Mass. When I asked her to share a couple of favourite recipes along with a food memory, she gladly obliged.

Jill wrote: "I will never forget how my house would smell so delicious during the High Holidays when I was growing up. My mother, who was a wonderful cook, made everything from scratch, and so artfully set the holiday table. I so looked forward to this time of the year. Now, in my own home, I try to recreate this same warm feeling for my family by making everything from scratch and taking great care with my table, flowers and dishes.

"For breaking the fast, I'm happy to share my recipe for Spinach and Broccoli Lasagna with your readers. I also make this crazy fantastic Caramel Strawberry French Toast Soufflé that everyone loves. It's so good that it deserves its seven-word title!"

JILL'S CRAZY FANTASTIC CARAMEL STRAWBERRY FRENCH TOAST SOUFFLE

1 cup brown sugar, packed
1/2 cup butter
2 tbsp. light corn syrup
12 slices challah bread
2 cups frozen strawberries (or raspberries) thawed
6 beaten eggs
1 1/2 cups milk
1 tsp. vanilla
1/4 tsp. salt
fresh berries for garnish

Combine brown sugar, butter and corn syrup in a small saucepan over medium heat. Cook until bubbly. Pour mixture into an ungreased 9 x 13-inch baking dish. Place 6 slices of bread on top of mixture. Distribute thawed berries evenly over the top of each slice of bread. Place remaining 6 slices of bread on top.

Combine eggs, milk, vanilla and salt in a large bowl and beat until blended. Pour mixture evenly over bread. Cover and chill for 8 hours or overnight.

Bake uncovered in a preheated 350-degree oven for 40 to 45 minutes or until light brown on top. Garnish with fruit. Yield: 6 servings (or less)!

Lasagna is a crowd pleaser

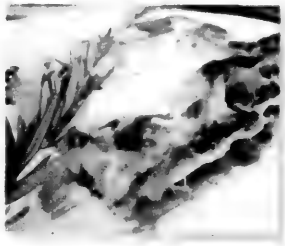
JILL'S AWESOME BROCCOLI AND SPINACH LASAGNA

Lasagna can be boring and veggie lasagna is sometimes dry, but not this one! Jill spent a lot of time perfecting this recipe and uses no-cook noodles. (She can't tell the difference – can you?) It's easy to assemble and is a crowd pleaser for adults and kids. Enjoy!



1 (15-oz.) container ricotta cheese
1/2 of a 15-oz. container cottage cheese, small curd
1 egg
1 (10-oz.) pkg. chopped frozen spinach, thawed and squeezed dry
1 (10-oz.) pkg. frozen broccoli florets, thawed
1 (7-oz.) container pesto
1 (3-lb.) jar tomato sauce
1 (8-oz.) pkg. shredded mozzarella cheese (2 cups)
1 (1 lb.) box no-cook lasagna noodles

Combine ricotta and cottage cheese in a medium bowl. Add egg and mix it in. In another bowl, combine thawed spinach and broccoli with pesto.

Prepare a 9 x 13-inch glass baking dish. Spread a thin layer of tomato sauce on the bottom of the dish. Begin layering noodles, then the ricotta/cottage cheese mixture, then the veggies. Repeat until you have three layers. Finish with noodles, then with a thin layer of sauce. Cover the top with mozzarella cheese.

Bake uncovered at 350 until golden brown, about 40 minutes. Let it settle for about five minutes, then serve. Can be made in advance and frozen. Yield: 8 servings.

Note: You can make this dish lower-fat by using 2 per cent cottage cheese, light ricotta, and part-skim mozzarella cheese.

My friend Susan J. Greene of Pepper Pike, Ohio, and I first "met" through a Jewish food group a number of years ago, and even though we've never met face to face, we've exchanged many delicious recipes and food memories over the years. Susan is an excellent baker, and when she shares a recipe with me, I know that it's tried and true! When I posted a note on Facebook to my pan pals asking them to share one of their favourite recipes for the High Holidays, Susan was the first one to respond.

She wrote: "For the Jewish New Year, my mom often made these fancy little nut horns and I would always help her. This makes scads of tea cookies and takes time to make but is well worth the effort. Tanta Syvia was on the Jacobs' side of my family. This recipe has been modernized to use the food processor. My father adored these cookies. I would even make them and send my parents care packages when they wintered in South Florida. Enjoy!"

TANTA SYVIA'S NUT HORNS

Dough
1 package dry yeast
pinch of sugar
1/4 cup warm water
1/2 lb. (8 oz. or two sticks) pareve margarine
4 cups all-purpose flour
6 tbsp. sugar
3 egg yolks
1 cup sour cream
1 additional cup of flour (if needed)

Filling
1 cup sugar
cinnamon to taste
1 1/4 cups ground walnuts or pecans
1 cup golden raisins

Dough: Proof yeast with a pinch of sugar and 1/4 cup warm water and set aside. Using the dough blade of your food processor, combine margarine, 4 cups flour and sugar in your processor bowl and pulse to combine. Make a well and put the yolks in along with the sour cream and dissolved yeast mixture. Use on/off pulses to combine. If the dough is sticky, add extra flour to firm it up. The dough should form a ball on the top of the dough blade. Remove dough and place it in a plastic bag; refrigerate overnight.

Filling: Mix the sugar, cinnamon, nuts and raisins together.

Assembly: Divide dough in quarters and work with one piece at a time. The remaining dough should be placed back in the refrigerator, covered. Roll the dough very thin; cut long rectangles of dough about 2-inches wide. Cut small triangles from each long piece of dough. Fill with cinnamon and sugar mixture and roll up from the base of the triangle to the tip. (The dough stretches a bit so you want to tuck the ends under so the filling doesn't come out.) Place on a cookie sheet.

Bake at 350 for 15 to 18 minutes, until lightly browned on the bottom. Watch them so they do not burn.

Yield: Recipe makes 4 cookie sheets of small nut horns – I've never counted! Alternately, each quarter of dough can be rolled as a strudel with 1/4 of the filling and baked until done.

Apple cake – a sweet treat at any time

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

I always manage to serve apple cake at some point during yom tov. While Rosh Hashanah is probably the most likely time for its appearance, and break-the-fast is great alternative date, I tend to have it around for all the chagim, as apples are plentiful this time of year and let's face it, apple cake is terrific anytime you serve it.

Most of the following recipes have been sent to me by readers over the past few years and they are all ones I've made time and time again to rave reviews.

CINNAMON APPLE CAKE

Modified from about.com. A great breakfast or break-the-fast cake.

1 3/4 cups sugar, divided
1/2 cup butter or margarine, softened
1 tsp. vanilla
3/4 cup cream cheese, softened
2 large eggs
1 1/2 cups flour
1 1/2 tsp. baking powder
1/4 tsp. salt
2 tsp. cinnamon
3 cups chopped, peeled Granny Smith apples (about 2 large)

Preheat oven to 350. In the bowl of an electric mixer combine 1-1/2 cups sugar, margarine, vanilla and cream cheese and beat until combined. Add the eggs and beat to combine. In another bowl, combine the flour, baking powder and salt. Add the flour mixture to the cream cheese mixture, beating on low until blended.

In another bowl, combine the remaining 1/4 cup sugar and cinnamon and mix to combine.

Chop the apples and then add 2 tablespoons of the cinnamon mixture to the chopped apples. Mix to combine and then add the apple mixture to the batter. Mix to combine.

Grease an 8- or 9-inch springform pan. Pour batter into the prepared pan and sprinkle the remaining cinnamon mixture over the top. Bake for 1 hour and 10 minutes or until the cake pulls away from the sides of the pan. Cool completely and remove spring form side. Cuts best if you use a serrated knife. Serves 10 to 12.

APPLE AND HONEY TORTE

Submitted by Richard Olaphan, St. Louis Mo., modified from epicurious.com

1/3 cup honey
2 tbsp. lemon juice (fresh is best)
3 large tart apples, peeled and each cut into 8 wedges
3/4 cup sugar
6 tbsp. butter or margarine, softened
1/4 cup packed brown sugar
1 tsp. vanilla extract
2 large eggs
1 tsp. lemon zest
1 cup sifted flour
1 tsp.baking powder
1/4 tsp. salt
1 tbsp. brown sugar
1/2 tsp. cinnamon
2 tbsp. ground almonds

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a springform pan and set it aside. In a skillet combine the honey and lemon juice. Heat to a simmer and add the apples. Cook until they start to soften, stirring constantly so that they don't burn or stick, for about 10 to 12 minutes. Remove from heat; set aside. When cool, drain the apples and set them aside

In the bowl of an electric mixer, combine 3/4 cup granulated sugar, butter, brown sugar and vanilla and beat to combine, 3 to 4 minutes. Add the eggs and mix to combine. Add the lemon zest and mix to combine. In another bowl, combine the flour, baking powder and salt, mix to combine. Add flour mixture to the sugar mixture a third at a time, beating to combine between each addition.

Pour the batter into the prepared pan. Arrange the apple slices any way you like on top of the cake. They can even overlap if you like, but make sure you push them slightly into the batter. In a bowl, combine 1 tablespoon brown sugar, ground almonds and cinnamon; sprinkle it over the top of the apples. Bake 1 hour or until cake springs back when touched lightly in centre. Cool on a wire rack. Cut into wedges using a serrated knife. Serves 10 to 12.

NUTTY APPLE TORTE

Modified from an old Gourmet magazine recipe

6 Granny Smith Apples, peeled, cored and finely sliced juice of 1 lemon
3 eggs
1 cup sugar
2 tsp. vanilla
4 tbsp. melted butter or margarine
1/3 plus 2 tbsp. milk or non-dairy substitute
2/3 cup flour, sifted
2 tsp. baking powder
1/2 cup toasted chopped hazelnuts or pecans, chopped
1/2 cup golden raisins
1/2 cup pine nuts
3 tbsp. sugar for topping
1 tsp. cinnamon

Preheat oven to 325. Grease and line the bottom of a springform pan with parchment paper and set it aside. In a bowl, combine the sliced apples in lemon juice, toss to coat and set aside.

In the bowl of an electric mixer, combine the eggs, sugar and vanilla and beat until light yellow, 3 to 4 minutes. Add the milk and butter and mix to combine. In a bowl, combine the flour and baking powder together and then fold them, by hand, into the egg mixture until just combined. Add the ground nuts, raisins and pine nuts. Fold in gently. Gently fold in the apple slices with the lemon juice they have been soaking in.

Pour the batter into the prepared pan and smooth the top. Mix the 3 tablespoons of sugar with the cinnamon and then sprinkle over the top of the cake. Bake for about 1 hour and 20 minutes or until the cake is cooked through. If you find the top browning too quickly, cover with foil and continue cooking. Let the cake sit for about 10 minutes before removing it from the pan. The cake will contract as it cools making removal a lot easier. Cool completely before serving. Serves 10 to 12.

Robots help to enrich lives of the elderly

Next generation of health care arrives at Baycrest

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

Robots may be part of the future of health care at Baycrest.

Goldie Nejat, an assistant professor at the University of Toronto, is currently working on a project to develop a "social robot" to enrich the lives of the elderly living at Baycrest.

"[It would become] someone who would be in the environment, who would be a coach and provide emotional encouragement," explained Bianca Stern, director of culture and heritage at Baycrest.

The robot has been in the making for the past five years, Nejat said, and the partnership with Baycrest began about a year and a half ago.

Nejat has been working with a variety of undergraduate and graduate students, and the robot is named Brian after one of the students initially working on the project who contributed his size as a model for the robot's dimensions.

At this point, Nejat's team has developed the physical, mechanical platform for the robot, and they have moved on to working on its intelligence, Nejat said.

Currently, the robot can give event and activity reminders, have a basic conversation (for example, asking how someone is doing), and it can participate in playing a memory game, where the player has to turn over cards and try to make matches from memory. It can detect which cards have been flipped over and motivate the player throughout the game.

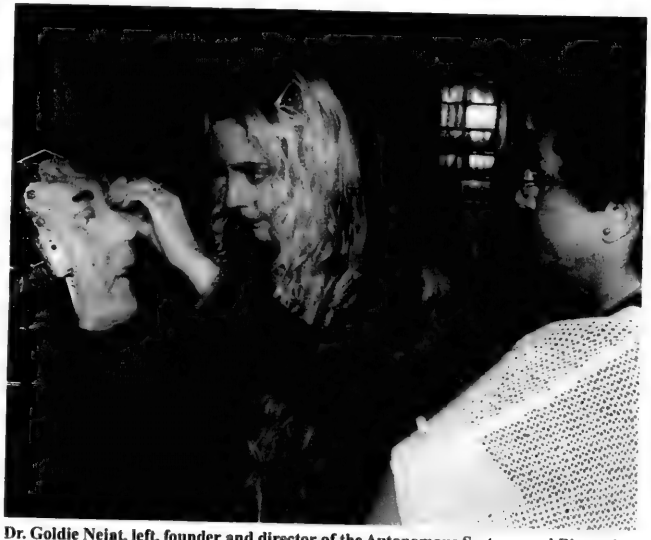
"Maybe they're not making enough matches and they're getting frustrated," Nejat said. "[The robot] provides encouragement."

The existing prototype cost about $20,000 to build, Nejat said, but the realistic cost per robot would be much lower once the the prototype is finalized and the robots become mass-produced.

The first prototype will hopefully be brought in next year, Stern said, which will give the researchers more ideas about how to fine-tune the design.

She stressed that the robot would work alongside human caregivers, not replace them. The goal is to have an addition to the current team of health-care providers.

"It would be a quality of life robot," she said. "It would be a mechanism that would maybe float around the room, recognize the name of the person, ask them if they're enjoying the meal – and that might be a cue [to eat] if they're distracted."



Dr. Goldie Nejat, left, founder and director of the Autonomous Systems and Biomechatronics Lab at University of Toronto, works on "Brian" as Bianca Stern, Baycrest's director of Culture and Heritage, looks on.

Right now, the robot is still a prototype. There is a lot of work to be done on the appearance, but it's never going to look like a human being.

"If a robot looks exactly like a human being, then humans expect it to act like a human being and are disappointed when it doesn't," a concept that's called the "uncanny valley," Stern said.

It will have a face and human characteristics, but it will clearly be a robot.

"It doesn't have to be exactly humanlike, but it needs to be esthetically pleasing," she said.

Nejat acknowledged that people currently living at Baycrest might not be entirely comfortable with a robot, since they haven't grown up with technology. However, it might be something that fits in perfectly with the young generation that has grown up with constant advances in technology.

And with the aging of baby boomers, there will soon be many more seniors who need assistance, and advances will be necessary in order to meet the growing need, Nejat said.

"Artificial intelligence is an area that's developing in leaps and bounds," Stern said. "At Baycrest, we're trying to look at harnessing technology [and determine] what could be a benefit to people who are aging."

New research helps treat thyroid cancer

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Researchers at Mount Sinai Hospital and the University of Toronto have recently discovered a way to quickly detect and treat thyroid cancer.

The research, which was published in the BMC Cancer medical journal about a month ago, included data on the analysis of thyroid cancer tissue blocks from 34 patients over a period of time.

Dr. Paul Walfish, a senior consultant to the head and neck oncology program and endocrine division at Mount Sinai Hospital, led a research team that found a biomarker, called Ep-ICD, in thyroid cancer cells that allows doctors to quickly identify the aggressiveness of the cancer.

Dr. Paul Walfish

A biomarker is a substance that can help researchers measure certain characteristics of a cell.

In this case, the biomarker, Ep-ICD, which is formed when the cells lining the thyroid mutate and become cancerous, tells doctors whether the thyroid cancer cells will be difficult to treat and what kind of treatment would be needed.

After going through some 17 years worth of archival cases, Walfish and his team found that aggressive cancer cells have a larger amount of Ep-ICD in their nucleus, or control centre, and a smaller amount on the membrane or outside of the cell.

"When [Ep-ICD] gets into the cell in abundant levels, it stimulates the development of a cancer," Walfish said. "What we found was that the most aggressive cancer had less [of the substance] outside of it and more [inside]."

Most patients with a larger concentration of the biomarker in the nucleus survived an average of five months after being diagnosed, while those with smaller levels survived for an average of 16 years.

"Ep-ICD in the nucleus shortens life expectancy," he said, adding that this substance is known to cause tumour growth. "We still have a lot to work on, but it's a new finding that tells us how a cell becomes aggressive. This knowledge can be useful in predicting clinical courses."

Knowing how much Ep-ICD is in a cell helps doctors predict what type of treatment and how much of it a patient needs, Walfish said.

The research findings are significant because thyroid cancer is currently the most rapidly increasing cancer in Canada. About 3,000 Canadians are diagnosed annually, 80 per cent of whom are women. Although this type of cancer has one of the lowest death rates, a sub-type, called anaplastic thyroid cancer, has a high fatality rate.

Walfish and his team are currently working on applying this research to other forms of cancer, including breast, prostate, colon and head and neck cancer.

"Our observations are pretty unique so far in the field, except for colon cancer. A group suggested something like this for colon cancer," Walfish said.

Walfish's research was supported by the Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation through their Da Vinci Gala fundraiser, as well as through the Alex and Simona Shnaider Research Chair in thyroid oncology, the Temmy Latner/Dynacare Chair in head and neck oncology and the Mount Sinai Hospital Department of Medicine Research Fund.

Diet cited as key to fighting sun's harmful rays

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — There was a time when factor 15 was considered more than adequate when it came to sunscreen protection, but today it's not uncommon to find factor 50 on the grocery store shelves.

We all know the importance of protecting our skin from the harsh rays of the sun, but a new study in Israel suggests that looking at our food may be a more effective way to do it than reaching for a cream.

Dr. Niva Shapira of Tel Aviv University's School of Health Professions recently published the findings of her study in Nutrition Reviews. In it she showed that a diet such as the one eaten in Mediterranean regions – rich in antixodants and omega-3 fatty acids – can help protect against skin cancer.

Based on her research, Shapira recommends consuming foods such as olive oil, fish, yogurt, whole grains, beans, red wine in moderation, colourful fruits and vegetables and lots of water. These foods, she says, will fight the oxidizing effect of the sun, though wearing sunscreen and using hats and beach cover-ups doesn't hurt, either. "Eating foods high in antioxidants is supposed to complement, not substitute other sun protection measures," she says.

The premise of Shapira's study was that if the body was prepared with sufficient and relevant antioxidants, sun damage could be reduced. Partnering with Prof. Bodo Kuklinski of Rostock University, in Germany, Shapira conducted a study at the Baltic Sea comprised of two groups: one was supplied with a drink high in antioxidants and the other drank carbonated beverages. Both groups spent up to six hours a day in the sun for two weeks.

The researchers found that those who drank the antioxidant-rich beverage had 50 per cent fewer oxidation products in their blood at the end of the study. Further studies proved that these antioxidants had delayed skin erythema, which shows the start of tissue and DNA damage that can result in skin cancer.

The Israel Cancer Association included Shapira's nutritional findings in its Smart in the Sun media campaign, and she is approaching the World Health Organization with her findings in the hope it will include the data in its sun recommendations, too.

So, how much of these foods should you eat? That depends on what you're consuming right now. "If you rarely eat them, you will need a longer time to build the levels of carotenoids in the skin and blood which will support solar self-protection," she says. "But it's good to eat those foods all year round, because even in winter we're exposed to some ultraviolet light."

Shapira estimates that melanoma cases are three to four times higher in the United States than they are in Mediterranean countries. "When we think about protecting our skin, most of us consider it an external problem, which is a mistake," she says. "The body has all the answers, but we have to give it the tools for self-protection."

These findings are important for all of us, but particularly for children up to 18 years old, she says. "Birth to age 18 are the critical years for future melanoma incidence. Sunscreen alone has not proved adequately effective to protect children, and slathering it on may give them the false feeling of protection while increasing their exposure and risk."

Keyboardist's music comes from the heart

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

After a decade in the music industry, indie pop act Stars continues to bring personal emotions and experiences into their songs.

During the writing process of their latest release, The Five Ghosts, vocalist Torquil Campbell's father died, which had a huge impact on the rest of the album, says Chris Seligman, keyboardist and a founding band member.

"Musically, I think stuff somehow subconsciously came from his passing, and lyrically towards Torq expressing some of the feelings he was going through," Seligman, 37, says.

For example, in The Last Song Ever Written, one of the lines says, "This is the last time that you're gonna lose someone. After this, it's you and your friends."

Each of the band's five albums has a specific theme, such as their third release, Set Yourself on Fire, which focuses on the sad aspects of love and relationships. On the latest album, many of the songs deal with dark themes, such as death and ghosts.

"[The music] tends to grow organically," Seligman says. "You have to be conscious of where the music is going and it will lead you places."

The song He Dreams He's Awake is based on nightmares Seligman had while staying in an apartment in Vancouver at the start of the writing process.

"I had these really intense dreams where I was awake," he says. The first time it happened, he says he dreamed he went to the mirror and there was a woman's face staring at him, whose eyes met his own.

"I'd go into rehearsal and I was just a bit of an emotional wreck because I wasn't sleeping and I was freaked out," he says.

Ghosts are depicted on the album cover, a photograph taken by G.S. Smallwood in 1905, says Aaron Seligman, Chris' younger brother, as well as the president of the Cardboard Box Project, which designed the album cover.

The Victorian-era unknown girl in the photo is holding five roses in the picture, corresponding with the number of band members. Also coincidentally, during a tour for their previous album, In Our Bedroom After the War, the band began decorating their stage with roses.

"There are just these layers to the image that it just almost felt like it was meant to be used in the [way] it was used," Aaron says.

Their lyric book and seven-inch vinyl box set displays one ghostly photo per song, based on a theme or a line in the song, he says.

Stars formed 10 years ago, when Campbell and Chris Seligman were sharing an apartment in New York City. The two had been childhood friends ever since they met on a playground when Seligman moved from his hometown of Bolton, Ont., to Toronto in Grade 3.

During the band's early days, Seligman would spend time in their apartment writing fully structured songs, and Campbell would add in a vocal melody and lyrics.

"We knew we had a dream, but we had no idea that 10 years later we'd still be actually doing it," Seligman says. After their first album, Nightsongs, they added guitarist and bassist Evan Cranley, vocalist Amy Millan and drummer Patty McGee.

In 2000, they relocated to Montreal, where they are currently based. That's where the majority of the writing and living happens, Seligman says.

He says his Jewish upbringing manifests itself mostly in his personality traits, for example, describing himself as being a bit neurotic in a Woody Allen fashion. He also credits his Russian and Polish backgrounds as possible sources for his interest in some of the darker sides of music.

Seligman began as a French horn player, performing mostly orchestral music. He studied classical French horn at Boston University, and through that program, began to learn piano theory.

Slowly, he drifted into the pop scene, longing to find his own voice and learn the technique behind pop and rock music.

"It was something that started slow and I've been working on until now," he says, adding that he still finds himself completely fascinated by pop music styles.

And the learning doesn't stop there. He continues to study new techniques for recording and producing, as well as writing material on his own – although he has no plans to release it for a while, and isn't hoping to make money from it.

"It's purely for the sake of me exploring music and for the love of music, which is why I started," he says. "I just think it's something that keeps me really healthy in music, to just do it for the pure love of it and to explore it and to find new things in it."

His musical expertise comes through in his performances, all of which he says is performed live without a prerecorded backtrack.

His setup involves a foot pedal for the sometimes looped "weird ethereal backdrops." When he performs, he's says he's usually multitasking, playing the melodies in one hand while holding down a chord, and triggering sounds with his feet.

Although some bands choose techniques that have keyboard sounds running from a computer, this band aims for as raw a sound as possible, keeping all of the music live.

After five albums, he says people tend to view the band differently, often comparing the old with the new.

A common trend in the indie culture is for fans to view artistic changes in the music as a band losing their meaning and integrity.

But Seligman's attitude shows that the band has simply evolved naturally, and the songs mean as much to him as they did the day they started.

"I have a strong connection to all of them because they're almost like living organisms that you put out into the world," he says.

And at the end of the day, he's just thankful to be able to continue his career as a musician.

The band will embark on a North American tour in the fall. Visit www.youarestars.com for complete dates and ticket information.

Rabbi's 'offensive' comments harm peace, U.S. says

'Remarks do not reflect Netanyahu's views, nor do they reflect the stance of the Israeli government'

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The United States on Sunday condemned remarks by the spiritual leader of Israel's leading haredi party, Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, who said the Palestinians should "perish."

"We regret and condemn the inflammatory statements by Rabbi Ovadia Yosef," U.S. State Department spokesperson Philip Crowley said. "These remarks are not only deeply offensive, but incitement such as this hurts the cause of peace. We note the Israeli statement that the rabbi's comments do not reflect the views of the prime minister." Crowley said.

"As we move forward to relaunch peace negotiations, it is important that actions by people on all sides help to advance our effort, not hinder it."

Rabbi Yosef, the former Sephardi Chief Rabbi, had said during his weekly Shabbat sermon that the Palestinians, and namely Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, should perish from the world. Rabbi Yosef, a founder of the Shas Party, also described Palestinians as evil, bitter enemies of Israel.

"All these evil people should perish from this world... God should strike them with a plague, them and these Palestinians," Rabbi Yosef said.

The 89-year-old is a respected religious scholar, but he's also known for vitriolic comments about Arabs, secular Jews, liberals, women and gays, among others.

Rabbi Ovadia Yosef

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Sunday distanced himself from Rabbi Yosef's remarks, but stopped short of a condemnation.

"Rabbi Ovadia Yosef's remarks do not reflect Netanyahu's views, nor do they reflect the stance of the Israeli government," Netanyahu's office said in a statement.

"Israel plans to take part in peace negotiations out of a desire to advance toward a peace agreement with the Palestinians that will end the conflict and ensure peace, security and good neighbourly relations between the two peoples," the statement said.

Chief Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat slammed Rabbi Yosef's remarks, saying they were paramount to incitement to genocide.

Erekat called on the Israeli government to denounce them and to take action against racist remarks by other elected officials.

No promises to extend settlement freeze: Netanyahu

By BARAK RAVID
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told Likud ministers on Sunday that he had not made any promises to U.S. President Barack Obama or any other American government official regarding an extension of the settlement construction freeze in the West Bank.

"We made no proposals to the Americans on extending the freeze," Netanyahu said. "We said that the future of the communities will be discussed as one of the elements of a final-status settlement, along with the other issues. We promised nothing on this issue to the Americans."

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu

Netanyahu sharply criticized the Palestinian demand for extending Israel's 10-month construction freeze, which expires Sept. 26.

"They are building an entire city with our encouragement, and then they are fighting with us over every house in Judea and Samaria," said Netanyahu.

"The hiatus of construction prior to the cabinet resolution [approving the freeze] lasted 10 months, during which we called them for talks. Now, three weeks before the end of that time, they come to the talks and say that we must continue the building freeze. This raises questions about the seriousness of the Palestinians to enter talks in good faith."

Information and Diaspora Minister Yuli Edelstein also referred to Rawabi, the first planned Palestinian city, which is being built near Ramallah and is meant to house 30,000 people. He said that while the Palestinians were building that city with Israeli support, Israel was being told to freeze all construction.

Although the Likud meeting lasted no more than 30 minutes, Netanyahu was hit with a barrage of questions, all of which had to do with the future of the settlement freeze and the Washington summit which was scheduled to begin Wednesday.

Netanyahu was to travel to Washington at noon on Tuesday.

Deputy Prime Minister Silvan Shalom told Netanyahu he understood the summit would deal with the construction freeze and other substantive issues, despite earlier reports that it would be little more than symbolic.

Netanyahu reiterated his stance that the cabinet resolution on the settlement freeze was limited to the 10-month period of the original hiatus and said he had not discussed with the Americans the possibility of extending it.

Meanwhile, Defence Minister Ehud Barak met on Sunday with Jordan's King Abdullah II, and they discussed the diplomatic efforts ahead of the summit in Washington.

"Peace is a strategic goal of Israel, and we expect the Palestinians to come to the talks with an open heart," Barak told the king.

In a televised speech on Sunday, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas addressed the upcoming resumption of direct peace talks with Israel saying that "Israel will be held accountable for the failure of the talks if settlement construction should continue."

"The negotiations need to bring about serious action that will be able to bring liberation from the occupation and independence," Abbas said.

Mere days before leaving for Washington to take part in a gala summit meeting in Washington, after months of American mediation efforts, Abbas said that the Palestinian agreement to participate in talks is based on Quartet opposition to Israeli construction in settlements. Members of the Quartet of Middle East peace negotiators, which includes the United States, the United Nations, the European Union and Russia, have repeatedly rejected Israeli construction on territory slated for a future Palestinian state.

"In these critical moments in the history of the region, we understand Israel's need for security, as well as our own such need," Abbas said in a speech recorded in Jordan earlier Sunday. "But the need for security is not an excuse to expand settlements and steal land.

"I want to clarify our stance on settlements, and their illegal status," Abbas continued. "I have to say honestly and clearly that we notified all sides, including the American administration, before we agreed to conduct these talks, that Israel alone will bear the blame for the failure of the negotiations if the settlement construction continues in any way on any Palestinian land captured since 1967.

"I hope that we find a partner in Israel that will be able to make decisions and take a responsible stance on ending the occupation," Abbas went on to say. "That way we can achieve true security for both peoples, Israeli and Palestinian."

Abbas is facing internal opposition from Palestinian hard-liners, especially Hamas, for agreeing to return to the negotiating table. The Islamic Hamas, which rules Gaza and has a significant presence in the West Bank, rejects any contact with Israel. Other Palestinians criticize Abbas for not securing Israeli concessions in advance of the talks.

Netanyahu also faces opposition from within.

Gaza blockade legal, advocate general says

By ANSHEL PFEFFER
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Military Advocate General Brig.-Gen. Avichai Mendelblit testified last Thursday before the committee investigating the events of an Israeli raid aboard a Gaza-bound Turkish aid ship, saying that Israel's blockade on the Gaza Strip is entirely legal.

On May 31, Israeli navy commandos boarded a Turkish aid ship headed for Gaza in violation of an Israeli naval blockade. The ship was one of eight boats aiming to deliver aid to Gaza as part of a flotilla. The commandos were met with violence and killed nine Turkish activists in the ensuing clash. An Israeli committee, headed by retired justice Jacob Turkel, has been interviewing top military and government officials as part of its investigation of the incident.

Avichai Mendelblit

In his testimony, Mendelblit addressed two main issues: the legal justification for the initial blockade on the Gaza Strip, and the legal aspects of the military action taken to prevent Turkish ships from violating the blockade.

He told the panel that the naval blockade, imposed by Israel in 2007 after Hamas violently seized power over the coastal Palestinian territory, is in keeping with international law and was imposed due to "pure military considerations" and not as a part of "economic warfare" against Hamas.

Mendelblit added that even before the blockade was imposed, all supplies were transferred to the Strip by land because Gaza has no port. He stressed that despite the naval blockade, all the supplies aboard the Turkish ships were eventually transferred to Gaza by land.

"Every step taken, be it part of classical warfare or economic warfare, aims to bring the other side to do what we want it to do. We want Hamas to stop launching rockets at our citizens. We have no desire to punish the civilian population [in Gaza]," he said. "As an indirect result, the civilian population does suffer, and that is why we have checked the legality [of the blockade]. We've consulted with the attorney general and with the Supreme Court, and found that it is legal and permitted."

The advocate general stressed that the suffering of Gaza civilians did not constitute a humanitarian crisis, since Israel allows supplies to enter the Strip. He said that Hamas' intent, in shooting rockets is to get Israel to fire back, but "we won't fire in an unguided manner into a civilian population. That is exactly what Hamas want. The alternative is to respond with economic warfare," he said.

Mendelblit said that the blockade was imposed "long before anyone ever heard of flotillas" and that no one in the Israel Defence Forces would think to violate international law.

Russia won't cancel its arms deal with Syria

By BARAK RAVID
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Despite Israel's objections, Russia will not cancel its sale of advanced missiles to Syria, the Kremlin announced on Sunday.

Ha'aretz reported on Friday that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had asked his Russian counterpart, Vladimir Putin, to cancel the sale of long-range surface-to-sea cruise missiles to the Syrian army.

Following the Ha'aretz report, Sergei Prikhodko, a senior adviser to Russian President Dmitry Medvedev, told the state-run Russian news agency RIA Novosti that Moscow would fulfil all agreements it had made with foreign countries and would not halt the deal.

"Lately, some Israeli media outlets have been actively disseminating information distorting Russia's position on the implementation of its obligations to Syria, including in the sphere of military and technical co-operation," Prikhodko said. "I would like to stress that the Russian Federation honours all the agreements that were previously signed between Russia and Syria."

The agreement in question is for P-800 Yakhont missiles, a highly accurate Russian weapon with a 300-kilometre range capable of carrying a warhead of up to 200 kilograms.

Israel is concerned the projectiles could significantly improve the Syrian military's ability to target its naval ships. The Chinese-made C-802 missile Syria currently has is less accurate, has a range of just 102 kilometres and can carry a warhead of no more than 150 kilograms, and lacks the accuracy of the more advanced missiles.

Jerusalem also fears the more advanced missiles could fall into the hands of Hezbollah, the Syrian- and Iranian-supported Lebanese militia, which would create a significant threat to naval ships in Israeli ports and the Mediterranean Sea.

In a conversation with Putin last week, Netanyahu told the Russian leader that missiles his country had delivered to Syria were transferred to Hezbollah and used against Israel Defence Forces troops during the Second Lebanon War.

In addition to Syria's transfer of advanced Russian anti-tank missiles to Hezbollah, Netanyahu also mentioned an incident in which Syrian-acquired Chinese-made C-802 anti-shipping missiles were used by Hezbollah to target an Israeli destroyer. He expressed Israel's concern that the new missiles from Russia will also make their way to Hezbollah.

Russian Prime Minister Vladimir Putin

Meanwhile, Ehud Barak was scheduled to travel to Moscow for what will be the first-ever visit by an Israeli defence minister to the Russian capital, where he plans to discuss the matter with Russian Defence Minister Anatoly Serdyukov.

A senior Israeli official, who asked to remain anonymous due to the sensitive nature of the issue, said that Israel and Russia have been engaged in discreet dialogue over arms deals to the region. But as these talks have not yielded positive results, the decision was made to upgrade the level of discussions with a senior political figure.

"We have been working on such a visit for more than a year, and it is very important to us," the official said.

As the Russian defence ministry is considered to be overwhelmingly pro-Arab, the opportunity for an Israeli defence minister to make an official visit is considered a historic development.

The latest arms deal was first reported in late 2009 and is said to include P-800 missiles, which now come in models that can be launched from land. The weapon's unique feature is its ability to cruise several metres above the surface, making it difficult to identify on radar and therefore intercept.

Meanwhile, Israel and the United States want to keep France from selling HOT anti-tank missiles to the Lebanese military, Asharq al-Awsat, a Saudi-owned, London-based newspaper reported.

In a Paris-dateline story, the paper quoted French officials as saying that they had rebuffed such pressure, and that the delay in the delivery of the missiles was caused by the confusion arising out of Lebanon's current political crisis, stemming from tensions over Hezbollah's role.

Western powers want to prop up the Lebanese military as a means of containing the influence of Hezbollah. Israel's wariness of Hezbollah influence into the military intensified after a Lebanese officer shot over the border and killed an Israeli officer on Aug. 9.

Israelis to serve on UN force

An Israeli police delegation will leave for Haiti to serve as part of a UN multinational force, marking the first time Israelis will serve on a UN force. The 14 police officers attended a ceremony at the Western Wall last week ahead of their scheduled departure. The delegation constitutes the first-ever Israeli group to serve in active duty under the command of the United Nations. The police officers will remain in Haiti for an extended period of time. "You are Israel's true face," Israeli Deputy Foreign Minister Danny Ayalon told the officers during a meeting last Wednesday. "This mission will demonstrate to friends and foes alike that Israel is always willing to contribute and volunteer anywhere and at anytime. It is important for people to see Israel beyond the conflict and to see that this is the real Israel. We are not only strong materially but also strong in spirit." Two police officers in the mission reportedly delayed their weddings to participate in the mission.

EU criticism rankles

Israel's Foreign Ministry has slammed the European Union's foreign policy chief for criticizing an Israeli court's conviction of a Palestinian protest leader. Abdallah Abu Rahmeh, an organizer of the weekly Friday protests at the Bil'in security fence, was convicted in an Israeli military court of inciting protesters to attack Israeli soldiers and for holding protests without a permit. He will be sentenced this month. He has been in jail since December. EU representatives attend the trial each day. The body's foreign policy chief, Catherine Ashton, released a statement expressing concern at the conviction, saying, "The possible imprisonment of Mr. Abu Rahmeh is intended to prevent him and other Palestinians from exercising their legitimate right to protest against the existence of the separation barriers in a non-violent manner." Foreign Ministry spokesperson Yigal Palmor said Ashton "should respect the ruling of the Israeli justice system, and refrain from casting aspersions on a legal system that is lauded worldwide by its peers. In Israel, where even those who openly support Hamas and Hezbollah enjoy freedom of speech, such accusations sound particularly hollow. Moreover, interfering with a transparent legal procedure of a democratic country is not just highly improper, but is hardly consistent with promoting European values," Palmor said.

Hamas denounces direct talks

Palestinian negotiators are not mandated to surrender Jerusalem or any part of Palestine, the Palestinian Ma'an news agency quoted Gaza's Hamas Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh as saying last Friday. Haniyeh said the upcoming direct peace talks are the latest in a string of Israeli crimes against the Palestinian people. Earlier last week, Hamas politburo chief Khaled Meshal said that the U.S.-backed direct peace talks between Israel and the Palestinian Authority are illegitimate. Speaking in Khan Younis last Thursday, Haniyeh claimed that "no negotiator who would give up Jerusalem has a national mandate," adding that "Palestinians across the globe will not support any movement holding absurd talks with Israel."

TV documentary explores Jewish High Holidays

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Rosh Hashanah, in Jewish tradition, launches a new year and brings families closer together. It's also a time for reflection, renewal, self-improvement and spiritual cleansing.

Vision TV's hour-long documentary on this important holiday, Rosh Hashanah: The Day of Judgement, is scheduled to be broadcast on Sept. 7 at 10 p.m.

Produced by Luanne Lank, directed by Barry Lank and hosted by Toronto broadcaster Ralph Benmergui, this thoughtful, well-crafted Canadian film should be regarded as a primer.

Call it, if you will, Rosh Hashanah 101.

It explains Rosh Hashanah's historic origins, customs and significance in Jewish life through interviews, file footage, photographs and paintings.

The commentary is by rabbis, religious scholars, community leaders, the proprietors of two Jewish bakeries, the owners of an Israeli-style restaurant and a women's wear shop, a lawyer, an actor and two doctors.

Cutting to the core, a rabbi says, "In Judaism, what we talk about is what we have to do. We have to walk the talk."

The program coordinator of a shul observes, "We have a chance, luckily, as Jews, to make up for our imperfections and to try to do better for the next year."

Still others ruminate on the symbolic meaning of the customs and traditions inextricably linked with Rosh Hashanah, which is part of a 10-day cycle encompassing Yom Kippur.

This is a vibrant documentary.

The locales – Winnipeg, Ottawa, Toronto and Sidonia, Ariz. – are vivid and the images are bright.

Bakers dusted in flour shape dough into challahs. The awesome reddish bluffs of Arizona serve as a spectacular backdrop to comments made by a female rabbi. Benmergui blows a shofar in a venerable synagogue adorned with frescoes from the Bible.

Rosh Hashanah: The Day of Judgement teaches us that we're all essentially works of progress and that it's never too late to make amends and live a better, more fulfilling life.

Actor hooked on Shakespeare

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Ian Lake

Ian Lake used to be a king. Now he's a shepherd. And sometimes a prince.

Lake, 27, is currently in his third season at the Stratford Shakespeare Festival. He's played Berowne, a lord, in Love's Labour Lost, Demetrius in a Midsummer Night's Dream and is currently playing Silvius, a shepherd, in As You Like It and Florizel, a prince, in The Winter's Tale.

And he doesn't plan to stop anytime soon.

"I always want to do Shakespeare. I want to do it all, but I will always want to do Shakespeare," the actor said.

Lake studied at the University of Victoria's theatre program before moving on to the National Theatre School of Canada and the Birmingham Conservatory for Classical Theatre, where he got to play the lead in Macbeth. He was first introduced to Shakespeare as a child, while at the theatre with his mother.

"My mother brought me to see plays growing up in Vancouver, but I didn't understand it yet," he said.

Lake's high school education did nothing to help.

"In high school, I was introduced to [Shakespeare's plays] as literature. It was really quite excruciating and boring."

It wasn't until Lake's first year of theatre school that something clicked.

"The first play I ever did [in theatre school] was The Winter's Tale...We were exploring this play that none of us knew, because it's not often done. It's not Romeo and Juliet or a Midsummer Night's Dream. And it was really amazing," he said.

"It wasn't until doing that play that I started to get a stronger sense of what's really inside the language [of Shakespeare's plays] and how it can be used and not feared."

According to Lake, who teaches at high schools through Stratford's educational programming, the key to understanding Shakespeare is not taking his words too literally.

"I realized these are words that don't have a single literal meaning. One person might read a line and have gleaned a meaning from it, and another person might get an entirely different sense and neither one of them is going to be right or wrong," he said.

For Lake, who grew up in Vancouver, there was never really an alternative to acting. At least, not one that he wanted to pursue.

"It's sort of the age old story, when I was a kid I was always dressing up, eventually I just never stopped," he joked, explaining that he enjoyed acting in high school plays.

"It just never really felt like there was any choice. I couldn't think of anything else I would want to do," he said.

To Lake, acting is an exploration of human nature, something that changes with every role and scene.

"There's just a sort of curiosity about human nature and how to bring a piece of theatre to life and a piece of dialogue to life," he said. "[It's exploring] how the body works, how the mind works. It's not like there's ever a point where you have soaked up the necessary knowledge. For every play you're doing, there's an infinite number of areas you're going to explore."

As Lake, who comes from a secular Jewish family, became involved in the acting community, he began to miss his ties to his religion.

"I was always raised in a very secular household. We weren't going to temple all the time, but we were members of a very strong Jewish community," he said. "I realized in my acting world, I don't have a lot of Jewish friends...In my adult life, I've felt that slipping away, my sense of having a community, specifically a Jewish community, around me."

It was partly because of these feelings that Lake participated in a Birthright Israel trip this past winter.

"It was a bit of a rediscovery because there was a lot about myself as a Jew I didn't really know," he said. "I think I came back with a stronger sense of self. Not only as a Jew, but just in general."

This sense of identity has helped Lake grow as an actor, he said.

"For any actor, you're bringing yourself into a role. The better you can know yourself, the more you'll be able to do that," he said.

The Winter's Tale runs at the Stratford Shakespeare Festival until Sept. 25 and As You Like It runs until Oct. 31. For tickets or more information, visit www.stratfordfestival.ca.

Chaim Topol playing Tevye

Names in the News: Israeli actor Chaim Topol, who's played the role of Tevya in Fiddler On The Roof thousands of times since the late 1960s, has probably sung If I Were A Rich Man more times on stage than just about anyone else. He was supposed to tour with a North American production last year but had to cancel because of a torn tendon in his shoulder.

Having taken out an accident insurance policy with Lloyd's Insurance, Topol sued Lloyd's earlier this year for $1.1 million in lost income. Lloyd's recently offered a compromise settlement of $935,000. According to the London Jewish Chronicle, the 75-year-old actor – who has since returned to the stage – is still deciding whether to accept the offer.

Festival's theatrical productions based on works by I.L. Peretz

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

In celebration of its 15th anniversary, Ashkenaz Festival presents two theatrical productions, both based on works by the late I.L. Peretz, the father of modern Jewish literature.

From France comes Rafael Goldwaser's one-man show, A Gilgul fun a Nign (Metamorphosis of a Melody), on Sept. 1, 7 p.m., at the Al Green Theatre in the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre. Goldwaser is a Yiddish theatre actor, and the director and founder of Strasburg, Germany's Der LuftTeater. Based on a story by Peretz, the show traces a melody by the legendary klezmer fiddler Pedotser.

The other offering – from Brooklyn-raised, New York-based, Grammy Award-winning klezmer trumpeter, composer, and musical director Frank London – is A Night in the Old Marketplace on Sept. 6, 1 p.m. and 5:30 p.m, at the Enwave Theatre at Harbourfront Centre.

London mixes klezmer, jazz and world beats in his unique adaptation of Peretz's 1907 play. A Night in the Old Marketplace, a ghost and love story set in a shtetl, subtitled by Peretz as A Tragic Carnival Play, was more than 10 years in the making, due to its ambition and a shoestring budget. Ashkenaz Festival marks its Canadian première.

"Our story tells of a fantastic one-night adventure," London said. "There is a band on stage, and there are five singers, who each represent a character, and who also double as chorus and minor characters. There is a storyteller, [actor] Marilyn Lightstone. Behind them will be a really big screen where we have projections.

"We ask the local presenter to find someone really fun and interesting to read the narration," London said. "When we performed it in Milano, we translated the narration into Italian, we had a great Italian rock star read the narration. So, the presenters of Ashkenaz got in touch with Marilyn."

According to London, Peretz's A Night in the Old Market Place is one of the most famous and important plays in Yiddish theatrical history. It has been produced only five times in the last 100 years because what Peretz wrote is essentially an unstageable. In the original play, there are more than 100 characters, most of whom walk on and say one line and then walk off.

"I am known for my work in the klezmer idiom and my work with the Klezmatics, which won a Grammy. We are known for taking the tradition and bringing it forward," London said.

"With this piece, I brought all that knowledge, but a lot of the other things that I loved. And, I really worked hard to take the essence of my favourite theatre composers, who are Kurt Weill, especially his work with [playwright] Bertolt Brecht, and also the way Tom Waits worked with Robert Wilson when he was doing [the albums] Alice and The Black Rider. So, I was trying to find this weird nexus between klezmer, Yiddish theatre and Kurt Weill and Tom Waits," London said.

London is featured on more than 100 CDs. His recordings include Invocations, which is cantorial music, and his projects include the folk opera Davenen for the Pilobolus Dance Theatre and the Klezmatics.

Frank London

London said he's equally at home working on stage with violinist Itzhak Perlman or with punk rock innovator Iggy Pop. In fact, London worked with both of them last September within a two-week span.

He's currently working on three major theatre pieces – an opera about Beate Uhse, the woman who founded Europe's largest chain of sex shops; a Yiddish operetta about a 16th-century Cuban Teaino Indian named Hatuey, who led the first armedv rebellion against the conquistadors, and a psychedelic musical spy comedy about nuclear disarmament, the partition of India and Pakistan and psychedelic drugs.

Ashkenaz Festival engages youth culture

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

The Ashkenaz Foundation is trying to break through stereotypes and draw a younger crowd to its biannual festival.

"One thing that always has defined Ashkenaz is that the festival has always represented cutting-edge music and art," said Eric Stein, artistic director of the Ashkenaz Foundation.

The Ashkenaz Festival runs from Aug. 31 to Sept. 6, and introduces a slew of bands inspired by traditional Jewish music but fuse it with more contemporary styles such as reggae, rap, and indie.

Balkan Beat Box and Sway Machinery, two bands that will perform at the festival, both involve guitarist Jeremiah Lockwood, who also provides vocals for Sway Machinery's songs.

Sway Machinery uses cantorial vocal techniques fused with more recent styles, such as blues and rock 'n' roll.

Lockwood said cantorial music was always part of his identity because he spent a lot of time with his grandfather who was a cantor.

"I just kind of made it part of my childhood," Lockwood said. "In order to fully be myself as a musician, it was one of the faces that I needed to wear."

The New York musician said his bands play almost exclusively for a young audience, proving there is definitely a scene where there are people interested in this kind of music.

Performing in New York brought him in contact with many other musicians, including Colin Stetson of the Arcade Fire and Brian Chase of the Yeah Yeah Yeahs, both of whom contributed to the band's music.

The current lineup consists of Lockwood on guitar and vocals, John Altieri on saxophone, John Bollinger on drums, Jordan McLean on trumpet, and Stuart Bogie on tenor saxophone.

Balkan Beat Box will play a free show at the Sirius Stage at Harbourfront Centre on Sept. 5, and Sway Machinery will have a free performance at the centre's Brigantine Room later on the same night.

Geoff Berner is another klezmer-influenced artist performing at this year's festival. He has a different perspective, saying that it's not about attracting young people, but rather being able to appeal to all ages.

"If you're making good weird stuff then weird people of all ages will get into it and then you'll have a career," he said.

His music combines klezmer with a "punk esthetic," and he said he's a big believer in favouring ideas and emotional expression over technical precision and perfection. He will play at the Lula Lounge on Sept. 2 as part of the festival.

To spread the word of the festival, the Ashkenaz Foundation hired Samahra Zatzman, 23, as a youth engagement, education and outreach co-ordinator.

She said the music is definitely attractive to young people, which she defines as 18 to about 30. The problem, she said, is spreading the word.

"A lot of people don't realize how vibrant and how amazing Jewish artists and culture are," she said. "I never realized that Jewish culture could be cool and cutting edge, and Ashkenaz changed that for me."

She has been forming relationships with other organizations directed at young Jews, such as the Birthright Alumni Committee and the Annex Shul, to share the message that there is something for them in the Ashkenazi culture.

"I really believe Ashkenaz fills a niche or hole in the community that is not being reached and has had and will continue to have a profound impact in the arts and culture sector of Toronto and definitely the Jewish scene," she said.

Stein said this goal simply reflects the trends in the community of younger people, particularly artists, going back to eastern European Jewish music and incorporating it in contemporary works.

He said he only became interested in this kind of music about 12 years ago.

"Before that, I had a very stereotypical and superficial understanding of what Jewish music was, and the long and short of it is, it wasn't very cool music," Stein said. But after he delved into the music, he realized he'd "been missing something great for years."

And he's sure that if people give it a try, they'll find the beauty in these traditions.

"Our job is to get the horses to the water," he said. "We know they'll drink it once they're there."

Landscape architect has left an indelible imprint

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Toronto landscape architect Janet Rosenberg has left an indelible imprint on Canada.

Rosenberg, who describes herself as an architect of the land and the environment, has created a series of stunningly designed public and private spaces in Toronto and elsewhere in Canada.

"My heart is into designing a better environment for people to live in," she said in an interview last month in her midtown Toronto office, neatly summarizing her life's work in a single declarative sentence.

Janet Rosenberg

The founder and chief principal of Janet Rosenberg & Associates, she is one of Canada's leading landscape architects, having designed simple yet elegant and ecologically responsible spaces from residential gardens to public parks.

Kept incredibly busy by what seems like a never-ending succession of commissions,Rosenberg, 59, accepts scores of new jobs each year. Currently, she and her staff of 24 are working on something like 60 projects, in various stages of completion.

Often eclectic, these projects blend form, colour, texture and material, in keeping with her philosophy of using new methods, materials and technologies to redefine and reshape spaces and enhance the quality of life.

In Ontario, Rosenberg has designed a park in downtown Newmarket, a civic square facing city hall in Guelph and the landscaping for two subway stations in Toronto. In Calgary, she has designed a park under glass featuring a tropical garden and a children's playground.

Rosenberg, whose cousin is the internationally renowned architect Frank Gehry, has been particularly active in Toronto, having worked on the Martin Goodman Trail, the Franklin Children's Garden on Centre Island, the Royal Conservatory of Music, Baycrest Hospital and a number of luxury condominiums.

Born and raised in Toronto, she works out of a remarkably bland and unprepossessing three storey brown brick building of 5,000 square feet.

Surprisingly enough, the building – which once housed a synagogue and is adjacent to a non-descript dry cleaner – is totally bereft of any landscaping.

Appearances can indeed be deceiving.

Rosenberg, a single mother of two grown daughters whose partner is the physician Abe Chaiton, ascribes her success to several factors – an abiding passion for her profession, a grueling work ethic, an ability to stay current and a dedicated, talented staff.

A graduate of Ryerson Polytechnic Institute (as it was known when she was a student there in the 1970s) and York University, she has been a landscape architect for almost 35 years.

"I always wanted to do landscape architecture," she said, recalling that her parents played a role, even if subliminally, in charting her course.

Rosenberg's mother, Laura Bender, an avid gardener, imparted a love for horticulture. Harold, her father, a manufacturer of children's wear, encouraged her to pursue a career when women usually didn't have careers and defined themselves solely through marriage and children.

Taking his advice to heart, she focused on a career, making a name for herself in her chosen field, which blends horticulture, botany, the fine arts, architecture, ecology, geology and industrial design.

An ornamental garden in Toronto designed by Janet Rosenberg

Married at 35, way past the age most Jewish women of her generation tied the knot, she did not have her first child until she was 38.

By then, she had established a reputation as an innovator who was not afraid to push the frontiers of contemporary landscape architecture.

Since the early 1980s, Janet Rosenberg & Associates has won more than 60 awards, and she has been invited to sit on juries, address conferences and lecture at universities.

She has also taught the planting course at the University of Toronto's faculty of landscape architecture.

Rosenberg claims she hews to no special style.

"I respond to clients' demands and requests," she explained. "We're very flexible. We tap into a wide range of styles and broaden our scope. We do modern and traditional. We try to make each project different. What we do never becomes dated."

Rosenberg, however, is partial to boxwood shrubs, Japanese yews, ginkgo and beech trees, ornamental grasses, lavender, roses, Russian sage and ferns.

As well, she restricts herself to a limited number of plants, colours and patterns so as to achieve a blend of unity and serenity.

"There's a sense of timelessness in our gardens," she observed.

Rosenberg's modus operandi rarely varies. Very involved in a project at the outset, she delegates day-to-day responsibilities to her staff, whom she trusts implicitly.

Judging by the results, the formula has been eminently successful.

Israeli insider writes an engaging political memoir

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

British-born Yehuda Avner was the ultimate Israeli insider, serving four prime ministers as an English speech writer and note-taker. He was privy to a torrent of information not meant for public consumption.

A foreign ministry employee who ended his career as Israel's ambassador to Britain, Ireland and Australia, he worked for Levi Eshkol, Golda Meir, Yitzhak Rabin (during his first term) and Menachem Begin.

In his political memoir The Prime Ministers: An Intimate Narrative of Israeli Leadership (The Toby Press), Avner recalls his association with these leaders and the events that marked their tenures. He discusses three Middle East wars and foreign figures from Harold Wilson, prime minister of Britain, to Jimmy Carter, president of the United States.

Writing in chronological order, Avner first deals with Eshkol who, though lacking charisma, had a nimble mind, keen instincts and an unaffected affability.

Eshkol, upon assuming his position, asked foreign minister Abba Eban what was involved in being prime minister. Despite having turned to Eban for advice, Eshkol regarded him as a fool. As he sardonically said, "Eban never gives the right solution, only the right speech."

Before the Six Day War, Eshkol, in a meeting with Wilson in London, requested top-of-the-line British-made Chieftain tanks for Israel's armoured corps. Wilson fobbed him off, prompting Eshkol to later say in Yiddish, "One talks and one talks, and nobody listens."

Begin, the then leader of the opposition, pressed Eshkol to resign and let David Ben-Gurion, the first Israeli prime minister, lead the nation. "He is a war leader," Begin said. But after talking to Ben-Gurion, Begin realized that the man was completely uninformed and "politically extinct."

As the war raged, Moshe Dayan, the defence minister, informed Eshkol that he opposed the capture of East Jerusalem. His colleague, Yigal Allon, disagreed, and Dayan was overruled.

In 1968, during the War of Attrition, Eshkol met Lyndon Johnson, the U.S. president, at the White House. Eshkol wanted to buy 50 Phantom jets, saying they were crucial for self-defence. Johnson was not keen to let Israel purchase them, but he finally relented.

According to Avner, Eshkol was surprised by Rabin's request to be appointed Israel's ambassador to Washington. "That's the last thing I would have expected," said Eshkol. "Believe me, Yitzhak, you're no diplomat."

Nonetheless, Eshkol gave Rabin the job, being familiar with his "incisive mind" and "diagnostic brain."

Avner's assessment of Golda is incisive: "Her 'talent' lay in the simplification of issues. She went straight to the crux and center of each problem..." Yet Golda, like Israel's generals before the Yom Kippur War, succumbed to a preconceived and rather foolish notion that neither Egypt nor Syria would mount a major offensive to retake the Sinai Peninsula and the Golan Heights.

Avner paints a chilling picture of a distraught Dayan confiding to Meir during the 1973 war that the Israeli armed forces were fast running out of vital military equipment. "Golda Meir's face went ivory white. She looked despairingly at her defence minister, covered her face with trembling fingers, then rose to stare out the window." Recomposing herself, she said, "Moshe, one way or another I'll get you your weapons."

In the aftermath of the war, Meir resigned, her reputation in tatters. Looking for a "fresh face," the ruling Labor party chose Rabin as her successor. "Though still a political novice, he seemed a fitting candidate," Avner observes, listing the reasons for his selection.

When Rabin refused to relinquish the Mitla and Gidi mountain passes in the Sinai, the United States turned on Israel. Rabin accused Henry Kissinger, the U.S. secretary of state, of orchestrating the "reassessment" of American policy in the Middle East. Retorting, Kissinger declared, "Do you think that the president of the United States is a puppet and I pull his string?"

Levi Eshkol and Lyndon Johnson during bilateral talks at the White House.

Several months later, Rabin changed his mind, concluding that an Israeli withdrawal from these passes would be in Israel's interests.

Rabin, believing that Jewish settlements should not be built in densely Arab-populated areas of the West Bank, told Begin that the territories should be used as a bargaining chip in future negotiations with the Arabs.

Begin's view that Israel should keep the West Bank at all costs would sour his relationship with Carter, Avner notes.

At his first meeting with the new U.S. president, Begin argued that the settlements were critical to Israel's security and that they were an expression of the "inherent right of the Jewish people to settle in any part of their historic homeland." In response, Carter said that Israel's occupation of the West Bank would "close off" the possibility of peace with the Arab world.

The Lubavitcher Rebbe, who met Begin shortly afterward, congratulated him on his "firm stance on Eretz Yisroel."

Britain's foreign minister, Lord Carrington, reprimanded Begin over the settlements, calling them "a barrier to peace." Begin declared, "Their construction is an assertion of our basic historic rights, not to speak of their critical importance to our national security." Margaret Thatcher, the prime minister, concurred with Lord Carrington. But in a nod to Begin, she added, "Please do not allow yourself to get upset. You are truly among friends here."

Although Ronald Reagan, the U.S. president, regarded himself as pro-Israel, he clashed with Begin over Israel's decision to annex the Golan and invade Lebanon in 1982.

Avner, eager to settle scores with people he dislikes, takes a poke at the British queen's husband, Philip, the Duke of Edinburgh. Avner's animus is based on Philip's sarcastic comments on Israel and the Arab-Israeli conflict.

The queen is also not immune from Avner's acid pen. After he presented his credentials as Israel's ambassador, she remarked on the fact that he was born in Britain. This prompted a response from Avner that his ancestors in Palestine had been expelled by Roman legions.

"Were they really?" said the queen. "How unfortunate!" And she began to talk about the weather. This was something to behold. There I was, alluding to the mysteries of Jewish history's conundrums and there she was, talking about the weather."

Israeli reaches doubles semis at Rogers Club tennis

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — Israeli tennis star Shahar Peer could have left Montreal angry after being upset by Estonian Kaia Kanepi 6-3, 6-3 in the first singles match beginning the Rogers Cup tournament held at Uniprix Stadium last month.

Instead, Peer turned a stunning defeat into victories, teaming with Romanian Monica Niculescu to a semifinal finish in doubles. Peer became the first Israeli woman to reach the semifinals in singles or doubles in the 109-year history of the tournament, originally called the Canadian Open.

Peer and Niculescu defeated Chai-Juang Chang (Taiwan)/ Olga Govortsova (Belarus) 6-1, 6-4; then upset fourth seeded Vania King (United States)/Yaroslava Shvedova (Kazakhstan) 0-6, 7-5 (10-7) and sixth seeds Yung-Jan Chan (Taiwan)/Jie Zheng (China) 4-6, 6-4 (11-9); before losing 6-2, 3-6 (10-4) in the semifinal round to second seeds Gisela Dulko (Argentina)/Flavia Pennetta (Italy).

Peer and Niculescu's most memorable match came against King/Shvedova. After not winning a game in the first set, Peer/Niculescu squeaked out a second-set victory and then trailed 4-1 in the 10-point tie-break before rallying with nine of the next 12 points to seal their win.

"I am very happy to make the most of my week by doing well in doubles with Monica as we upset two good teams. My ranking in doubles [currently No. 39] will go up and the efforts will improve my singles play as well," said 23-year-old Peer following her semifinal match.

Despite her first-round singles loss at the Rogers Cup, Peer continues to have her best year in tennis. Currently ranked No. 18, Peer reached a career high of No. 14 in the pro women's tennis rankings in June following her fourth-round finish at the French Open. No Israeli man or woman has ever been ranked that high in the history of pro tennis.

Israeli tennis player Shahar Peer

Peer's year is highlighted by her semifinal finish in February at the Dubai tournament. Under heavy security, playing only on an outside court and being secluded in her hotel away from the other players, Peer prevailed, upsetting three seeded players, before losing in the semifinals to Venus Williams .

Only a year earlier, Peer was a victim of Middle East politics when the United Arab Emirates refused to give her a visa to enter the 2009 Dubai tournament, but the move to ban Peer backfired.

Peer received worldwide support from the biggest names in her sport, the tournament was fined $300,000 and Peer was guaranteed entry into the Dubai tournament for the next five years.

"I will remember this year's tournament at Dubai for the rest of my life. I proved to the world that sports and politics do not mix. I was proud of focusing on my tennis, beating three players ranked ahead of me," said Peer.

"I can't imagine playing well under these circumstances," said Venus Williams. "Shahar is courageous. I don't think anyone in tennis could have done what she did in Dubai."

Peer's status in Israel and the worldwide Jewish community has become legendary since the 2009 Dubai incident. She has been honoured in her nation as Woman of the Year (2009) as well as Athlete of the Year four years in a row (2006 to 2009) and is in demand to be honoured by Jewish organizations whenever she travels playing in tournaments.

"Shahar is the most well-known Israeli athlete in the world today, being a symbol of her nation's courage and has used her status in ways to benefit the world," said Ken Meyerson, Peer's agent.

Peer used her status well by leading this year's March of the Living in Poland on April 10. Peer led 10,000 students going to Auschwitz and Birkenau concentration camps accompanied by her maternal grandmother, Yuliana Eckstein. Eckstein, now 80, lost her parents and brother at Auschwitz and was liberated at the end of World War II.

"She (Eckstein) never told me the horrors until she went with me to see the camps. Leading the March of the Living has given me strength, values that make winning or losing a tennis match not seem that important anymore," said Peer.

Four other Jewish players, American Julia Cohen, Stephanie Cohen-Aloro (France), Sharon Fichman (Toronto) and Tamaryn Hendler (Belgium) competed in the qualifying round at the Rogers Cup and all lost their first-round matches.

Dembe wins doubles in tourney

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — Joel Dembe, a member of Canada's national wheelchair tennis team, picked up some valuable international ranking points for his performance at a recent tournament in Montreal.

Dembe, 26, of Toronto, and American Marcus Causton won in men's doubles, defeating Russians Sergei Ivanov and Anatoli Polyatykin 6-2, 6-2 at Les Internationaux Savaria. The tournament was held at Le Club West Island in Beaconsfield from Aug. 20-22. The event is sanctioned by the International Tennis Federation (ITF).

In singles, Dembe reached the semifinals before losing to Montrealer Philippe Bédard, who went on to win the tournament, in a close contest 6-4, 5-7, 7-6 (7-5).

Dembe is now ranked 79th in the world in singles and 63rd in doubles by the ITF. Nationally, he has reached the third spot, making him one of the top amateur Canadian Jewish athletes today.

He is now at an even 8-8 in singles wins and losses for the year and 10-4 in doubles.

Dembe's goal is to compete at the 2012 London Paralympics Games.

Dembe has used a wheelchair for 20 years, ever since he was left partially paralyzed as a result of an operation to remove a tumour on his spine that he was born with.

He began playing tennis competively in 1998 and was Canada's number one junior player from 1998-2003. The rules of wheelchair tennis are similar to those of regular tennis, except that two bounces are allowed before returning the ball.

Easing the pain

NEW TO CANADA
By NINA SHENHAV

I'm sure I've already told you that my childhood wasn't the best ever. Let's just say that I had to enter twice through a door, in order to be noticed once.

That's why I decided finally, and especially before the High Holidays, to do some self-analysis with the help of a psychologist.

I entered a very posh-looking specialist's clinic, sat in the waiting room and looked respectfully at the many fancy doors, expecting to meet my new psychologist.

After a few minutes, a warm-looking lady opened one of the doors, and welcomed me in.

I sat down in front of her hesitantly. The doctor introduced herself by name. I looked around. "And where is the famous sofa?" I asked cynically.

The doctor smiled. "We can sit here through the introduction part," she said, and then asked me the unavoidable shrinks' preface: "How are you?"

Well, an experienced warhorse like me wouldn't fall for this so easily, yet I found myself telling her about my troubles. "So, my parents preferred to fill me with junk food and sweets, instead of listening to my aches, listening to what I had to say," I confessed bravely.

She nodded and kept listening, and then she said, "So from an early age, you ate sweets and sugars in order to ease the pain. And whenever something hurt, you taught yourself to ignore the pain instead of treating it."

"Exactly." I responded sadly.

I was talking and sharing with her, starting to feel some relief. Her questions were so accurate.

"And where, exactly, do you feel the pain?" she asked empathetically, and I pointed at my heart.

Then she said, "You know, we often tend to describe pains in our heart. You need to understand that we're talking about a process, a painful process here, and it could take time. In a very, let's say, technical way, we need to take all the past mistakes, the unawareness, the ways you've been treated before, postponing the opportunities to ventilate things and touch the pain. You were afraid to do it. You were afraid to deal with the hurt, with the knowing that the pain has to move out of your body. No more sweets and denial. Together we'll be able to remove the aching, to ventilate, to clean and to put in a healthy, new substance instead of this empty, void space."

I found myself crying, as she handed me a tissue. "You're so right," I said. "A new notion, a healthy one that will replace the old, rotten one that was put into my body and soul... no more fears, no more bad habits."

The good doctor just smiled at me with her benign smile and nodded. We were silent for a couple of minutes.

"Thank you so much doctor," I said finally, shaking her hand, feeling I could take the next breath easily. "I'm very optimistic. I think you're an amazing psychologist."

Her hand stopped shaking mine, and her eyes filled with a troubled gaze. "Psychologist? I'm not a psychologist, I'm a dentist. The psychologist is next door."

Now, do as I did, and again look carefully at all that happened here, word by word. See?

Oh, and by way, I needed to search my problems from the roots up, so it may as well be through some root canal treatments...

Dancing for fun and health

FITNESS CORNER
By FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

I met an amazing couple, David and Rose, who reminded me how easy it is to stay young and healthy.

David, 78, and Rose, 74, have been dancing together for more than 55 years and it shows. They go dancing three to four nights a week for about four hours, doing dances such as the fox trot, the rumba, the merengue, the cha-cha and the tango. They started dancing in high school, when they used to go to Jewish community centre dances.

Rose's eyes sparkled as she told me that once she and David were married, they, and four other couples, hired a dance instructor. They would take a dance lesson and then everyone would go for coffee. Dancing became part of David and Rose's lives, and they love it.

Throughout the years, they always found places to dance to live bands. When they go on vacation, dancing is a priority, so David and Rose take a cruise or go to Las Vegas, where they can dance till the early morning hours.

They both still work four days a week in a family-owned business. After work, David takes a rest and then the couple goes to one of their favourite dance halls for the evening.

Both of them have tried other forms of recreational exercise. Rose walked with a friend for years, and David went to a gym in the 1980s, but they have always loved to dance.

David believes dancing helped him to recover from bypass surgery faster. That was 20 years ago, and he is still dancing. With a big smile, he said his heart surgeon tells him two things when he sees him for checkups: don't stop working and don't stop dancing!

David and Rose remind us dancing is a great way to get and stay healthy. Want to learn more? E-mail me at felycesfitness@rogers.com.

Returning to Israel: a phobic point of view

URBAN WRITER

In 5770, I returned to Israel. This Rosh Hashanah, I will meditate with thankfulness for having been able to do so. Here is Part 1 of my experience. Fight your fears. Make 5771 a special year. L'Shanah Tovah.

It had been 16 years since I'd been in Israel. Agoraphobia had prevented me from visiting her.

For you who suffer from phobias – and what Jew doesn't – know that I, too, believed I would never see my beloved Israel again. It was heartbreaking to hear family members and colleagues speak about their trips to the Holy Land.

Israel was forever vivid in my mind and I missed her deeply. I wondered if the North African Jewish man was still sitting at the entrance to the Kotel selling prayers for shkalim. I could envision the exquisite panorama in Haifa, the quaint little towns like Hazor, and I thought about the ancient roads where Josephus, the first-century Jewish historian and hagiographer, must have walked, sat and written.

I would tell myself it was fine that I hadn't said Kaddish at my father's gravesite in the Jerusalem Hills since 1994. I had almost convinced myself the Dead Sea no longer held an allure for me and the Galilee was not as lush and seductive as Northern Ontario.

None of this was true though.

I craved the chance to recite the mourners' prayer and place a stone on the edge of my father's tombstone. I wanted ever so badly to try and flip over onto my stomach while swimming in the sea, and to travel on the northerly Kvish HaSargel, the straight and flat Ruler Road heading to Afula.

It was almost 20 years, and my agoraphobia had made me feel like the desert Jews prevented by God from entering Israel.

I departed Toronto on June 24 with a colleague from work. He knew about my fears and was wonderfully accommodating. We flew Air Canada so that I wouldn't have to switch planes in New York. Phobics make many plans, and then some, even if it means being unsupportive of a Jewish airline and putting one's Zionism on hold.

After being in the sky for one hour, recognizing that I couldn't escape from this massive metal cigar, I began to feel a panic attack welling up in my gut. Death would be more welcomed. Phobics understand this.

But I was prepared. I had meds in my pocket (and my carry-on, and my luggage) and all I had to do was pop a couple and life would be relatively manageable again. I did. I was fine. (We live in good times. I wondered about the Holocaust survivors who fought in the War of Independence and how they coped with their anxiety.)

We landed in Israel 12 hours later, and like a man who has recently fallen in love, I felt a warm embrace pass through me. I teared up and felt a total connectivity and pervasive disbelief at being in the Middle East, at having returned to my Israel. I was wishing I could walk on the tarmac. I wanted so badly to kiss the ground.

I couldn't stop smiling. I began conversing in Hebrew and was proud my extensive vocabulary was quickly returning. I feared it had disappeared together with my hope of ever returning.

I spoke to everyone unabashedly about my return, including one of the airport janitors – a brother, a courageous soldier of the Jewish People willing to struggle for his Zionism. That's how I saw him. That's how I saw my Israel and its people.
